Sufficient circulation having been already provided, the Government must now borrow like any other employer of capital temporarily requiring more than income will supply, and rely for the credit which will secure advantageous loans, upon good faith, industrial activity, accumulated though not immediately available capital, and satisfactory provision for punctual payment of accruing interest and ultimate reimbursement of principal.

To subscriptions for the remaining five-twenty and deposits for temporary loan, therefore, must be directed all reasonable expectation of means for the service of the current year, except from negotiations under the act of last session. The sums to be looked for from these two sources have already been stated, and amount to $126,959,600. If this aggregate be deducted from the amount to be provided by loans for the last seven months of the current year, already shown to be $352,226,539, there will remain the sum of $226,166,999 to be provided by negotiations under the act of last session; and, under some like act, must be provided in like manner, if the continuance of the war shall make it necessary, the sum of $544,978,548 93, estimated as likely to be required from loans for the fiscal year 1865.

The act of last session authorized the loans supposed to be required for the fiscal years 1863 and 1864; and of the amount required for the service of these two years to the 1st of December now current, $150,000,000 in United States notes, and $50,000,000 by a loan for two years five per cent. Treasury notes have already been provided under that legislation. The act is so well conceived and expressed that little other legislation for the loans of 1864 and 1865 will be required than the application to those years of its leading provisions. It will doubtless be thought expedient this session, as last session, to authorize the borrowing, in some form, of $300,000,000 for the current, and $600,000,000 for the next fiscal year. Indeed, the only modifications of the act of last session necessary to adapt it to the requirements of the current and coming year seem to be: (1) the omission of all reference to United States notes beyond the giving a simple authority to the Secretary to ascertain from time to time the amounts destroyed or lost, and to replace them by new issues; (2) the repeal of the existing limitation of the deposit loan to $100,000,000, and the substitution of a provision for a reserve equal in amount to half the deposit; (3) the permission of the negotiation of loans redeemable absolutely at pleasure, or at pleasure after a time fixed, not more remote than forty years; and (4) the omission, perhaps, of the clause taxing circulation and deposits, as being more appropriate to an internal revenue bill. It is hoped that the other provisions of the last may be retained in the new loan act.

Under such legislation, the Secretary entertains little doubt of being able to obtain whatever funds will be needed, through loans, at reasonable rates of interest, for bonds or Treasury notes.

For a warrant of this confidence, however, he must not omit to say that he relies much on the support to be given to the public credit by the national banking system and by the nationalization of the currency. There is, as he thinks, no possibility of a permanently successful administration of the finances, under circumstances involving the creation of large debts, unless loans can be effected in a medium of general and equal credit throughout the country, and not liable to variation in quantity or in value except under the operation of national legislation and the general laws of trade.

Only two kinds of currency fulfill these conditions: the first, a circulation of coin; the other, a circulation of notes of uniform description and value, issued by the Government, and either paid directly to Government creditors, or supplied to banking associations to be employed in general business.

The circulation now generally used in this country, except so far as it consists of bank notes, is of the latter sort; and no circulation, not immediately convertible into coin, can be better.

It is an error to suppose that the increase of prices is attributable wholly or in very large measure to this circulation. Had it been possible to borrow coin enough, and fast enough, for the disbursements of the war, almost, if not altogether, the same effects on prices would have been wrought. Such disbursements made in coin would have enriched fortunate contractors, stimulated lavish expenditures, and so inflated prices in the same way and nearly to the same extent as when made in notes. Prices, too, would have risen from other causes. The withdrawal from mechanical and agricultural occupations of hundreds of thousands of our best, strongest, and most active workers, in obedience to their country's summons to the field, would, under any system of currency, have increased the price of labor, and, by consequence, the price of the products of labor, while the prices of many things would have risen, in part from other causes, as, for example, the price of railroad bonds from vast increase of income through payments for military transportation, and the price of cotton from deficient supply.

Much the greater part of the rise of prices not accounted for by the causes just stated, as well as much the greater part of the difference between notes and gold, is attributable to the large amount of bank notes yet in circulation. Were these notes withdrawn from use, it is believed that much of the now very considerable difference between coin and United States notes would disappear. Certainly there ought to be no difference in favor of coin, when it is remembered that United States bonds bearing six, or even five, per cent. coin interest are intrinsically worth, unless the theory of national bad faith or national insolvency is to be admitted, more than their amount in coin; and yet such bonds can now be had for their amount in United States notes.

Nor can a condition of affairs in which excessive prices prevail, or national notes command less than par in coin, be regarded as of permanent duration. While it lasts, it must be borne with patience, and made tolerable by economy. No useful remedy will be found in extravagant increase of salaries and disbursements, but an aggravation rather of the evil. All proper measures should be adopted to hasten the return to the normal condition of prices and business; the patriotism and intelligence of the people must be relied on for the rest.

The Secretary has heretofore expressed the opinion that whatever may be the true degree in which the currency of the country is affected by a bank-note circulation, issued without national sanction and by corporations independent of national authority, and not receivable for national dues, it cannot be questioned that in some similar degree the negotiation of national loans must be prejudiced and their value to the national finances diminished. This opinion is confirmed by observation and experience.

Impelled, therefore, by a profound sense of the present necessity of a national currency to the successful prosecution of the war against rebellion, and of its utility at all times in protecting labor, cheapening exchanges, facilitating travel, and increasing the safety of all business transactions; and at the same time unwilling to urge even salutary and necessary reforms in such a way as needlessly to disturb existing conditions or impair the value of existing investments of capital, the Secretary recommended, in two successive reports, the authorization of national banking associations, to which the capital of the corporations now issuing notes for circulation might be transferred, with advantage to the parties in interest as well as to the general public.

The sanction of Congress was given to these views at the last session; and the simple assurance thus given that henceforth the country is to have a national currency secured by a pledge of national bonds, and the belief that this currency will at no distant day take the place of the heterogeneous corporate currency which has hitherto filled the channels of circulation, at once inspired faith in the securities of the Government, and more than any other one cause enabled the Secretary to provide for the prompt payment of the soldiers and the public creditors.

If the policy thus indicated shall be fairly and judiciously pursued, and proper measures adopted to induce the conversion, at the earliest practicable period, of the bank corporations of the States into national banking associations, and of the corporate circulation into national currency, the Secretary believes, and, as he thinks, not without good grounds, that all the money needed for prompt payment of troops, and for the most vigorous prosecution of the war, can be obtained by loans on reasonable terms; while all interest on debt, and all ordinary expenditures, and a considerable part also of the extraordinary expenditures caused by this war, will be met by the ordinary resources. Nor does he doubt that, through wise legislation, sustained by intelligent popular will, and supported by prudence and energy in civil and military administration, national currency can be so approximated in recognized value to coin, that a resumption of payments in specie can be brought about much sooner than even sanguine persons now permit themselves to hope.

The Secretary has already referred in general terms to the reports of the heads of the various bureaus and branches of administration in his Department. A peculiar interest is felt at this time in their operations, and especially in the operation of those most recently brought into existence.

The Comptroller of the Currency reports the organization under the national banking act, prior to the 29th of November, of one hundred and thirty-four associations; all which, upon the suggestion of the Secretary, have adopted the name of National Banks, distinguished by order of organization and by locality. These banking associations have been formed in seventeen States and the District of Columbia, and have an aggregate capital of $16,081,200. The great care and labor required for the preparation of suitable notes for the new national currency has delayed its issue beyond expectation; but the printing is now begun, and the several associations will be supplied with the amounts to which they are respectively entitled within a few weeks. Besides the associations reported as actually organized, there are many others in process of organization. There is hardly a State not controlled by the rebellion, and hardly a considerable city, in which a national banking association has not been organized, or is not being organized. Even New Orleans is not an exception to this statement.

Thus the great work of introducing a permanent national currency has been entered upon in a spirit and with an energy which promise perfect success. The Secretary thinks he risks nothing in saying that within the present year the benefits of the system will have so approved themselves to the sense and patriotism of the people, that it will be beyond the reach of successful assault.

The Comptroller has indicated some amendments to the law, which the Secretary concurs with him in regarding as important to its success. As among the most essential of these, the Secretary asks the special attention of Congress to the proposition for a uniform rate of interest, and the repeal of the section which connects the issues of national currency in any degree with State banks. The Secretary also recommends, as likely to be useful, a provision to be made by law for the deposit with national banks, and also with the Treasurer and Assistant Treasurers, at such rates of interest and for such periods of time as the Secretary may prescribe, of moneys paid into or invested under the orders of judicial courts. It is not impossible that in this way many millions would be placed in the Treasury at moderate rates of interest.

The Secretary has already referred to the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in favor of increased duties. He cannot add anything to the general considerations he has already urged in favor of augmenting revenue by these methods. It may be useful, however, to invite special attention to some considerations which enforce the recommendation of a duty of two and two fifths per cent. a year on corporate note circulation.

The proposition contemplates a duty of one fifth of one per cent. per month on circulation; and the Secretary suggests, in addition, one twenty-fifth of one per cent. on deposits in each month, making twelve twenty-fifths a year. Under the existing law the duty on circulation is one per cent. a year on a certain proportion; two per cent. on amounts exceeding that proportion, and one fourth of one per cent. on deposits. The small addition proposed will not be regarded as unreasonable or onerous, when it is considered that all corporate circulation is in fact a loan by the people to the banks without cost, except that of preparation, and without interest, except the duties imposed on it. The whole question then resolves itself into this: is the duty proposed, added to the State taxation, and the cost of preparation, more than equivalent to a fair interest for the loan? If not, surely it should be paid without demur as a reasonable contribution to the common welfare. The duty proposed on deposits is much lighter, for obvious reasons. Its whole amount is less than one half of one per cent. per annum; and being in the nature of a tax on profits, rather than on property, will distribute itself among all who partake of the benefits of the deposits, and press hardly on none.

It is proposed to make the duty payable in small percentages, because it will be thus distributed over the business of the year; and because, by requiring monthly returns of circulation and deposits with reference to the duties, information will be regularly obtained in respect to the amount of circulation of all descriptions in the whole country, the publication of which will be an important benefit to all men of business, as well as a valuable guide to financial legislation and administration.

Monthly returns are now required of many of the national banking associations, and should be required of all; and from them, as well as from the banks not organized under national legislation, should be required a fair contribution to the general burdens of the people. The Secretary refers to Congress the question, whether the duty on national currency and the deposits of national banking associations shall correspond with the duties on other circulation and deposits. He thinks that for the present, at least, some discrimination in favor of the national associations may be properly admitted in consideration of the indispensable importance of a national currency, not adapted only, like United States notes, to temporary emergencies, but permanent in its very nature, and adequate to all demands of business, and capable, at no distant period, of being made equal to and convertible into coin, and therefore its real representative and equivalent.

The operations of the Mint have been of less importance than usual during the last year.

The amount of coinage was increased over that of last year at San Francisco alone. The value of the bullion received was $24,824,101 31; in gold $23,149,495 41; and in silver $1,674,605 90; from the total of which must be deducted the bars made at one branch and deposited for coinage at another, making the actual amount deposited $23,701,837 31. The coinage of the year was $24,688,477 12; of which $20,695,852 was gold coin; $1,949,877 90 gold bars; $1,174,092 80 silver coin; $390,204 42 silver bars; and $478,450 cents. Of this coinage $4,184,497 37 in 49,108,402 pieces was effected at Philadelphia; $18,551,598 68 in 2,872,173 pieces at San Francisco; and

The branch mint at Denver has been organized and put in operation during the year, but its operations are confined, for the present, to melting, refining, assaying, and stamping bullion.

A report has been made on a site for a mint in Nevada; and measures will be taken for its establishment as soon as possible.

The Secretary renews the recommendation of preceding reports in relation to the universal measure of commercial values by an international decimal coinage.

The operations of the Treasury proper have reached unprecedented magnitude. These are conducted, under the direction of the Secretary, by the Treasurer, the Assistant Treasurers, and the designated depositaries, by whom moneys which come into or go out of the national Treasury are received and disbursed. As receipts and payments have increased in number and amount, and assumed new forms, the labors and responsibilities of these officers have taken vaster proportions of magnitude and importance. The general operations of the year are seen in the statements already made of receipts and expenditures, but no general statement can convey an adequate idea of their variety, extent, and perplexity. The labor and care and anxiety incident to the borrowing, receiving, and paying of the sums necessary to meet the debt becoming due during the year, or, in other words, the making and applying of the loans necessary to the renewing of maturing loans, make little show in the report, and yet embrace transactions, often complex and necessarily multitudinous, which reached, during the year, an aggregate of more than $181,000,000. The responsibility and labor of the whole money operations of the Treasury may be inferred from this statement concerning a comparatively small part.

The receipts at the office of the Treasurer in Washington during the last fiscal year were $1,348,029,543 93, and the disbursements $1,334,615,175 57. At the office of the Assistant Treasurer in New York the receipts were $637,051,546 63, and the disbursements $622,842,627 92. At the office of the Assistant Treasurer in Boston the receipts were $118,900,000, and the disbursements $115,750,000. At the office of the Assistant Treasurer in Philadelphia the receipts were $113,248,031 27, and the disbursements $109,733,346 03.

The receipts and disbursements at the offices of the Assistant Treasurers at San Francisco and St. Louis, and of the designated depositaries, especially at Baltimore, Cincinnati, and Louisville, have been large beyond precedent, imposing labors and responsibilities correspondingly large. The Secretary cannot express too strongly his satisfaction with the manner in which these officers have generally performed their onerous and multifarious duties.

The act of Congress relating to captured and abandoned property, approved March 12, 1863, and the proclamation of the President of the 31st of the same month, devolved upon the Secretary the duty of regulating commercial intercourse in conformity with the acts of July 13, 1861, and May 20, 1862, and, under license of the President, between the States declared to be in insurrection and the other States of the Union; or, to use the description commonly employed, between the rebel and the loyal States. This duty has been found exceedingly arduous and perplexing.

Prior to the act and proclamation of March, the Secretary had attempted some restrictive regulations with the view of preventing supplies to rebels; but the state of the law and the terms of the original proclamation made it difficult to act with much efficiency or usefulness, and the regulation of the trade was assumed almost exclusively by the military authorities. Immediately, however, on the publication of the proclamation of March, the Secretary issued regulations of trade, framed on the best information and with the best consideration he was capable of giving them; and earnest and persevering endeavors were made to bring the whole subject under their control and under proper supervision. Experience revealed defects in the regulations, and they were revised, amended, and republished in September last.

The subject is too vast and complicated, the appetite for trade is too eager and exacting, and the impatience of all restraint, however salutary or necessary, is too great, to allow any hope of avoiding many and sometimes just complaints. But the Secretary has kept steadily in view the plain duty prescribed by the law of preventing any supplies from being carried into districts controlled by rebels; the equally plain duty of allowing and securing, so far as practicable, without intercourse with rebels, supplies of necessities to the inhabitants of districts in which the rebellion has been suppressed; and the clear policy of supporting and facilitating the efforts of loyal citizens to obtain wherever obtainable, without going beyond the lines of national military occupation, cotton, sugar, tobacco, tar, rosin, and such other products of the rebel States, for the benefit of loyal commerce. To this end he has selected persons of known intelligence and probity as supervising special agents, and through them others of like characters as assistant and local special agents, to exercise the necessary powers over intercourse, and has imposed, with the sanction of the President, and as conditions of license, such fees and contributions on the trade permitted, as were thought necessary to defray the cost of supervision, and add something to the means for the prosecution of the war. The agents of all grades have generally been diligent and faithful in the discharge of their several duties. A few of subordinate grade have proved incompetent or unworthy, and have been dismissed; and the same measure will be promptly applied to all, of whatever grade, to whom public duty may require its application.

By an order of the Secretary of War, issued on the last of October last, the care of abandoned plantations and other real estate has been devolved upon the supervising agents, who have been instructed to accept the charge and use their best endeavors in its execution. The charge of abandoned lands and plantations necessarily carries with it, to some extent, the charge of freedmen.

The whole charge is at present under military sanction only; for the acts of Congress concerning abandoned property relate exclusively to personality. The order is of too recent date to allow receipts of reports concerning its practical effects. It is only very clear that some system should be adopted and steadily pursued which will best serve the great objects of restoring tranquility, order, and prosperity to the States and parts of States in which the national authority is or may be re-established, and at the same time securing the rights and welfare of the loyal and enfranchised people. To these results the labors of the commissioners of direct taxes, as well as judicial action under the acts relating to confiscation, must largely contribute. Already, under the sales for direct taxes in South Carolina, considerable properties divided into small tracts have passed into loyal possession, and are cultivated successfully by the labor of freedmen. In this connection the Secretary asks permission to repeat a suggestion heretofore made, that the proceeds of cotton, raised by the freedmen before emancipation, and collected from those properties, should be applied in some judicious way for the benefit of those who raised it. The whole subject will doubtless command the attentive consideration of Congress.

The important and responsible duty of securing and keeping, under the direction of the President and War Department, commutation money from drafted citizens, has been assumed by the collectors of internal revenue, at the instance of the Secretary of War. In the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury this money should be paid directly into the Treasury, and drawn out upon requisitions for the purposes to which it is appropriated by Congress. The Secretary of War thought, however, that the other mode of collection and disbursements would be less burdensome to drafted men, and more convenient for the payment of substitutes. His wishes were promptly complied with, and the whole matter is now submitted to Congress.

Under a resolution of the Senate, adopted on the 12th of March last, the Secretary has taken measures for the preparation of the fullest statement possible, with existing means of information, of the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States, including that of the Pacific coast.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Secretary of War.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

The learning and ability of the gentlemen employed in this work warrant the expectation that a very instructive account will be obtained of the condition and prospects of our foreign commerce from and to the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, as well as overland, northward and southward, and of our internal and inter-State commerce, including the trade between loyal and rebel States, and between the bread producing and gold and silver producing districts of our country. The materials for a proper statement of this internal commerce must be sought in reports of State commissioners of statistics, of boards of trade, of railroad and canal companies, and occasional or periodical publications relating to trade and business. This is a department of statistics comparatively new and difficult of exploration, but no pains will be spared in the search, in the hope of being able to submit to Congress a result, of no insignificant value to the business community and to those charged with the duties of legislation and administration, which will itself suggest the action "necessary to enlarge and protect the important interests involved."

Under the sanction of the acts relating to the subject, the Secretary has taken measures for preparing and printing fractional currency, bonds, and notes in the Treasury Department, with a degree of success which already assures decided economical advantages, and warrants the expectation of satisfactory results.

The Secretary has already invited attention to the reports of the Register, the Comptrollers, and the several Auditors.

The Report on Commerce and Navigation for the fiscal year 1862, prepared in the Register's office, has been greatly delayed by causes explained in his report. The same report for the fiscal year 1863 is also nearly ready, and will be sent to Congress within the next month. Its important information will be found much better classified and arranged, and much more clearly stated, and therefore much more acceptable for use than heretofore. The Secretary suggests that it will promote the interests of commerce and expedite future reports if provision be made for the monthly, or at least semi-annual, publication of the returns of imports and exports.

The suggestion of the Second Comptroller, that the salaries in the offices of the Comptrollers should be higher than in those of the Auditors, and that promotion should take place from the latter to the former, is respectfully commended to legislative consideration. If sanctioned by law, it will doubtless promote accuracy and promptitude in the revision of accounts.

The vast expenditures of the war, in life and treasure, have devolved unexpected labors on the Auditors' Bureaus, and especially those of the Second and Third Auditors; and the difficulties attendant on the organization of a proper force for the settlement of the suddenly accumulated accounts have caused some delays which the most strenuous efforts have been made in vain to avoid. It is hoped, however, that the accumulation will now be arrested, and henceforth steadily reduced. The Secretary respectfully suggests that some provision be made by which officers of the Department may be enabled to attend the armies and collect information, and especially in regard to the wounded, the missing, and the killed, which will facilitate the promptest settlement of the claims made in behalf of destitute families and widows and orphans.

The report of the Solicitor will exhibit the action of that officer in the investigation of frauds perpetrated by certain persons formerly employed in the New York custom-house. The legislation of last session, the prompt dismissal of the guilty parties yet remaining in office, and the measures of prevention devised and adopted, will, it is believed, sufficiently protect the Government against the repetition of these or the commission of like frauds.

The Secretary renews the recommendation, submitted in his last report, of the purchase of the Merchants' Exchange in New York, now occupied under lease as a custom-house.

The operations of the Coast Survey have been distinguished by even more than usual activity. On the northern coast the work has been vigorously prosecuted, notwithstanding the existence of the war; while, in compliance with applications from military and naval commanders, parties have been detailed for work on the southern coast, on the rivers of the interior, and, indeed, wherever their services could be made available. From these labors, of an importance cordially acknowledged by the officers to whom they have been rendered, the value of the Survey, and the merits of those by whom it is conducted, receive fresh illustration.

During the last summer a number of rebels ran into Portland harbor in the night and seized the revenue cutter lying there, its commanding officer being sick on shore, and a portion of the crew absent on leave. They succeeded in leaving the harbor unobserved; but early in the morning the collector of the port, hearing of the affair, took instant measures for pursuit by chartering two passenger steamers, arming them with whatever could be most promptly obtained, and providing the necessary force of volunteers, citizens and soldiers. In a few hours the rebels had been compelled to abandon their prize, after setting her on fire, and being themselves taken prisoners. The value of this capture can best be estimated by the damage inflicted on commerce by the same rebels in the Tacony, a vessel every way inferior to the one they had seized. The Secretary deeply regrets that the collector no longer lives to read this acknowledgment of his prompt, energetic, and judicious action.

The report of the Board of Supervising Inspectors of steam vessels, to whose supervision Congress has wisely committed the employment of steam in water transportation, is herewith transmitted. The importance of its action may be inferred from the simple statement that there have been inspected during the past year 933 steam vessels, valued at $10,135,057, with an aggregate tonnage of 405,000 tons, which have carried, for shorter or longer distances, 6,420,000 passengers. The Secretary invites attention to the suggestion of a safe system of signals, by sounds and lights, adapted to the use of steam vessels, whether in the merchant or national service; and which may, perhaps, be extended so as to embrace sailing vessels also. Such signals, understood by all, might avert many disasters, and be the means of many benefits, without at all interfering with any peculiar system required for special communication between vessels of the Navy.

The Secretary renews the recommendation of his last report, that authority be given to sell the buildings erected, but not needed or used, for hospitals, and also such other buildings as are unoccupied or not required for their intended purposes.

The operations under the charge of the Light-House Bureau have been satisfactorily prosecuted during the year. The Cape Charles light-house, at the entrance of Chesapeake bay, was destroyed by guerrillas in August last. Its reconstruction is of great importance to commerce, and should be immediately authorized and provided for.

The light-house system of the United States, unlike those of commercial nations generally, is maintained wholly at our own cost. The Secretary suggests the expediency of providing for its support and enlargement hereafter, so far as treaty stipulations will permit, by a small duty on tonnage for light-house purposes. The benefits of the system accrue to foreign as well as to American commerce, and its burdens should be apportioned accordingly.

In this report the Secretary necessarily omits many things; but he cannot omit the expression of his cordial appreciation of the zeal, intelligence, and fidelity which the officers of the Department generally have brought to the discharge of their several duties. To their labors he sensibly feels and gratefully acknowledges that he is indebted, in great part, for the measure of success which has attended its administration.

Still less could he excuse himself should he omit to say how distinctly he recognizes, on looking back through the year, the tokens of that divine Providence which has led our country through perils of every kind. How steadily and grandly, and through what a sea of troubles, under that benignant care, the Great Republic has moved on! How confidently may we trust its future to the same sacred guidance!

S. P. CHASE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Report of the Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, December 5, 1863.

MR. PRESIDENT: A general summary of the military operations of the past year is furnished by the report of the General-in-Chief, herewith submitted. A list of the detailed official reports that have been returned to this Department by the generals commanding also accompanies this report. The influence of these operations, in suppressing the rebellion and restoring the authority of the General Government, cannot be overestimated. The victories of Stone river and of Gettysburg, the operations before Vicksburg and Port Hudson, the occupation of East Tennessee, the battle of Chickamauga, and the recent splendid successes before Chattanooga, and other engagements of less note, are events that evince skill, courage, and loyal patriotism, and a brilliancy of military achievement by the forces of the United States unsurpassed in any age; while the less fortunate battles of Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville manifested the spirit and fortitude of our troops in a degree worthy of the highest admiration.

By the reduction of Vicksburg and Port Hudson the navigation of the Mississippi river has been opened, and the national commerce is rapidly and securely returning to that great highway of the continent. The rebel territory has been cut in twain; the States west of the Mississippi no longer furnish their ample supplies to the rebels, while the people of those States are showing such signs of returning loyalty that a speedy restoration of civil government may confidently be anticipated.

In this view, the reduction of strongholds, the capture of prisoners by thousands, and the acquisition of immense stores of munitions of war, are not more important than the political consequences of these great military achievements. The occupation of East Tennessee by the forces under General Burnside, and the operations resulting in the occupation of Chattanooga, and the defeat of Bragg's army by the forces under General Grant, not only shed luster upon our arms, but, by affording protection to a loyal population, they cannot fail greatly to weaken the rebel strength, and operate strongly in restoring the authority of the Federal Government.

The combined operations against Charleston have not yet accomplished all that was expected from them, but the seizure and occupation of Morris island by the forces under command of General Gillmore, the reduction of Forts Wagner and Sumter, are exploits in which the skill and gallantry of the officers and the valor of our troops have been exhibited in a degree of which the country is justly proud.

In the State of Texas the flag of the Union has, during the whole war, been upheld by a small force at Franklin, so that the rebels have never succeeded in wholly excluding Federal authority from that State. The large force under General Banks now operating in Texas will afford protection to the loyal population, who have long been anxiously looking for sufficient military power to enable them to reestablish civil government. That period appears now at hand. By the occupation of that State the chief avenue of the rebels for foreign commerce and foreign aid is cut off.

In the East the position of military affairs has not undergone material change. In June the long-cherished design of the rebel leaders to transfer the seat of war from their own territory to the loyal States was undertaken by their favorite commander and their principal army. But the defeat of General Lee, by the forces under command of General Meade, at Gettysburg, destroyed their expectations, and drove back the enemy to his accustomed shelter in the mountains of Virginia. The armies of General Meade and General Lee now occupy, relatively, nearly the same position as at the date of my last annual report. The numerous combats and engagements between detachments of these armies have been attended with perhaps equal loss on both sides, and without any material advantage to either.

Western Virginia is reported by the commander of that department to be now clear of any rebel force, and the people of that newly organized

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Secretary of War.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

State are enjoying, in comparative peace, the blessing of civil government.

The military operations in the Northwest department have routed, and, in a great measure, destroyed, the hostile Indians, and afford protection to the people in that region from Indian barbarities. In the department of Missouri the rebel forces have been driven beyond the Arkansas line.

No military operations of any magnitude have taken place in the departments of Virginia and North Carolina. A threatened siege of Norfolk and Suffolk, by the rebel General Longstreet, was thwarted by the vigilant energy of General Dix, and a siege of Washington, in North Carolina, by the rebel General Hill, proved abortive.

The Federal force is now firmly planted in every rebel State; and there is reason to hope that under its protection the loyal people of those States will soon cast off the yoke of their leaders, and seek within the Union that peace and security for life, liberty, and property which, in blind madness, were recklessly thrown away.

The success of our arms during the last year has enabled the Department to make a reduction of over two hundred million dollars in the war estimates for the ensuing fiscal year.

In the operations that have been alluded to, prisoners of war to the number of about thirteen thousand have fallen into the hands of the enemy, and are now held by them. From the commencement of the rebellion until the War Department came into my charge, there was no cartel or formal exchange of prisoners; but at an early period afterwards a just and reasonable cartel was made between Major General Dix and the rebel General Hill, which, until recently, was faithfully acted upon by both parties. Exchanges under that cartel are now stopped, mainly for the following reasons:

First. At Vicksburg over thirty thousand rebel prisoners fell into our hands, and over five thousand more at Port Hudson. These prisoners were paroled and suffered to return to their homes until exchanged pursuant to the terms of the cartel. But the rebel agent, in violation of the cartel, declared the Vicksburg prisoners exchanged; and, without being exchanged, the Port Hudson prisoners he, without just cause, and in open violation of the cartel, declared released from their parole. These prisoners were returned to their ranks, and a portion of them were found fighting at Chattanooga, and again captured. For this breach of faith, unexampled in civilized warfare, the only apology or excuse was, that an equal number of prisoners had been captured by the enemy. But, on calling for specifications in regard to these alleged prisoners, it was found that a considerable number represented as prisoners were not soldiers, but were non-combatants—citizens of towns and villages, farmers, travelers, and others in civil life, not captured in battle, but taken at their homes, on their farms, or on the highway, by John Morgan and other rebel raiders, who put them under a sham parole. To balance these men against rebel soldiers taken on the field would be relieving the enemy from the pressure of war, and enable him to protract the contest to indefinite duration.

Second. When the Government commenced organizing colored troops, the rebel leader, Davis, by solemn and official proclamation, announced that the colored troops and their white officers, if captured, would not be recognized as prisoners of war, but would be given up for punishment by the State authorities.

These proceedings of the rebel authorities were met by the earnest remonstrance and protest of this Government, without effect. The offers, by our commissioner, to exchange man for man and officer for officer, or to receive and provide for our own soldiers, under the solemn guarantee that they should not go into the field until duly exchanged, were rejected. In the mean time, well-authenticated statements show that our troops held as prisoners of war were deprived of shelter, clothing, and food, and some have perished from exposure and famine. This savage barbarity could only have been practiced in the hope that this Government would be compelled, by sympathy for the suffering endured by our troops, to yield to the proposition of exchanging all the prisoners of war on both sides, paroling the excess not actually exchanged; the effect of which operation would be to enable the rebels to put into the field a new army forty thousand strong, forcing the paroled prisoners into the ranks without exchange, as was done with those paroled at Vicksburg and Port Hudson; and also to leave in the hands of the rebels the colored soldiers and officers, who are not regarded by them as prisoners of war, and therefore not entitled to the benefit of the proposed exchange.

The facts and correspondence relating to this subject are detailed in the accompanying report of Major General Hitchcock, commissioner of exchanges. As the matter now stands, we have over forty thousand prisoners of war, ready at any moment to be exchanged, man for man and officer for officer, to the number held by the rebels. These number about thirteen thousand, who are now supplied with food and raiment by this Government, and by our benevolent and charitable associations and individuals. Two prisoners, Captains Sawyer and Flynn, held by the rebels, are sentenced to death, by way of a pretended retaliation for two prisoners tried and shot as spies by command of Major General Burnside. Two rebel officers have been designated, and are held as hostages for them.

The rebel prisoners of war in our possession have heretofore been treated with the utmost humanity and tenderness consistent with security. They have had good quarters, full rations, clothing when needed, and the same hospital treatment received by our own soldiers. Indulgence of friendly visits and supplies was formerly permitted, but they have been cut off since the barbarity practiced against our prisoners became known to the Government. If it should become necessary for the protection of our men, strict retaliation will be resorted to. But while the rebel authorities suffer this Government to feed and clothe our troops held as prisoners, we shall be content to continue to their prisoners in our hands the humane treatment they have uniformly enjoyed.

The operation of the act of Congress for enrolling and calling out the national forces is exhibited in the accompanying report of the Provost Marshal General. At the time that law was enacted it was known to be very imperfect, many intelligent persons considering its execution wholly impracticable, while few dared to hope for any important benefit. The law has been enforced in twelve States. It has brought from these States fifty thousand soldiers, and has raised a fund of over ten millions for procuring substitutes. With all its imperfections it is demonstrated that the act can be made an efficient means for recruiting our armies and calling out the national forces. The principal imperfections and the required amendments will be submitted to Congress through the appropriate committees. The most important to be considered is what is called the three hundred dollar commutation. This feature of the act has been much discussed, and opposing opinions are nearly balanced as to the operation and effect of this provision. While some claim that it is oppressive upon poor men and favors the rich, others contend that it places rich and poor on an equal footing, and enables the poor man to obtain exemption from military duty for a sum within the reach of every one. Without undertaking to reconcile or decide between these conflicting opinions, it is certain that this clause of exemption, as it stands, occasions delay in calling out the military force. The drafted man is exempted, at the end of a long proceeding, by the payment of a sum of money. Supposing that sum to be adequate for procuring a substitute, considerable time unavoidably elapses before a competent substitute can be procured. The question whether this clause shall remain or be stricken out requires the early attention of Congress. The fund of $10,000,000 raised by the act as commutation money is deposited with the United States Assistant Treasurers, and is being applied to procuring substitutes by the payment of bounties and premiums.

Volunteering is going on, in some States, with much spirit. The prime importance of filling up the old regiments, and the superiority of such force over new regiments, is a point on which all military experience and opinions agree. The bounty paid by the Government is, therefore, limited to volunteers who go into old regiments, or to veteran regiments that renew their term of service. To veteran volunteers going into old regiments the maximum bounty of the Government is paid. Reports from the armies indicate that a large proportion of the troops whose term expires next year will reenlist—it being stipulated by the Government that they shall have at least one month's furlough before their present term expires. The indications are that the force required will, in a great measure, be raised by volunteering without draft. It is proper to add that commanding generals bear testimony that the drafted men who have gone into the ranks acquit themselves well, and make good soldiers. An immediate appropriation for bounties should be made.

An invalid corps has been organized under the direction of the Provost Marshal General. In the sanguinary battles and engagements of this war, and by camp diseases, many officers and soldiers have been disabled for active service who are yet able to perform duty in garrison, or as depot and prison guards, military police, and in the arrest of skulkers and deserters. To give honorable employment to this meritorious class, who have suffered in the service of their country, and to liberate able-bodied soldiers from duty that can well be performed by the invalids, was the purpose in organizing this corps. It now numbers over twenty thousand officers and privates, who are fully employed; and their service has increased the strength of the armies in the field, while by their vigilance desertion from the Army has in a great measure been checked. The beneficial results anticipated from this organization have been more than realized. For the details in respect to this organization reference is made to the report of the Provost Marshal General, which is also referred to for details in respect to the operation of the act enrolling and calling out the national forces, and the required amendments.

Immediately after the President's emancipation proclamation diligent efforts were commenced, and have continued until the present time, for raising colored troops. The Adjutant General was sent to the Mississippi valley to organize the system there. A bureau, to have in charge all matters belonging to such troops, was organized in the War Department. The report of its chief shows what progress has been made.

Over fifty thousand men are now organized and in the ranks, and the number will rapidly increase as our armies advance into the rebel States. The raising of these troops has been retarded, first, by the military operations in progress; and, second, by the removal of the slaves into the interior beyond reach of our recruiting agents. This obstacle, it is hoped, will soon be entirely overcome.

Many persons believed, or pretended to believe, and confidently asserted, that freed slaves would not make good soldiers; that they would lack courage, and could not be subjected to military discipline. Facts have shown how groundless were these apprehensions. The slave has proved his manhood, and his capacity as an infantry soldier, at Milliken's Bend, at the assault upon Port Hudson, and the storming of Fort Wagner. The apt qualifications of the colored man for artillery service have long been known and recognized by the naval service, and the subjoined extract from an official report shows what he can do in cavalry service:

"On the 17th instant, thirty men of company A, 1st Mississippi cavalry, (African,) in connection with fifty men of the first battalion 4th Illinois cavalry, while on a scout up the Yazoo valley, met, one mile beyond Sartasia, one hundred and fifty picked men of the 1st and 3d Texas cavalry. The 1st Mississippi behaved nobly, neither lacking courage nor steadiness, firing with coolness and precision. The engagement lasted half an hour, the Texans being totally routed and demoralized, we capturing twenty-eight stands of arms and seven prisoners."

The colored troops have been allowed no bounty, and, under the construction given by the Department, they can only, by existing law, receive the pay of ten dollars per month, while soldiers being paid thirteen dollars per month, with clothing and a daily ration. There seem to be inequality and injustice in this distinction, and an amendment authorizing the same pay and bounty as white troops receive is recommended. Soldiers of the Union, fighting under its banner, and exposing their lives in battle to uphold the Government, colored troops are entitled to enjoy its justice and beneficence.

The fortunes of war have brought within our lines a large number of colored women, children, and some aged and infirm persons. Their care, support, and protection rest a solemn trust upon the Government. Their necessities have, to some extent, been supplied by the order of this Department, but a general and permanent system for their protection and support should be speedily adopted by Congress. Even if they are to be regarded as in some degree a burden upon the Government, they are a greater loss to the enemy. Every woman and child, from nine years old to sixty, has to the rebel planter a high market value. Their labor in the cotton field is a source of profit to him. Is it not better that we should feed them than that they should support the rebel master who is in arms against us?

The reports of the several chiefs of bureaus in this Department exhibit fully their respective operations during the last year.

The Adjutant General reports that the business of his office has greatly increased during the past year by the creation of the Provost Marshal General's Bureau and the Bureau for the Organization of Colored Troops. He recommends:

First. That the term of enlistment in the regular service be fixed at three years, instead of five, in accordance with the act of July 29, 1861, which expired by limitation on the 1st of January, 1863.

Second. That the law regulating the payment of chaplains be amended so as to allow half pay and rations during absence on leave occasioned by other cause than wounds or sickness, and to full pay without rations when absent for those causes.

A serious evil arising from the absence of officers from duty has, in the past year, been in great part remedied. Two boards are in session, one at Annapolis, the other at Cincinnati, before one of which all officers who have left their commands in consequence of ill health are ordered to appear as soon as they are able to travel. They undergo an examination by the board, and are recommended, according to their condition, for light duty, for further leave of absence, or for medical treatment in a general hospital of the city where the board is in session. But if found fit for duty, the president of the board orders them forthwith to their regiments. The reports of the boards are a guide to the Adjutant General in making details for mustering, recruiting, or other light duty, and in recommendations for leave of absence or discharge, where the nature of the disability requires. The reports of the boards, taken in connection with regimental reports of absent officers and the surgeons' certificates from such officers, form a complete system of accountability for absence from duty.

The specific duty of the Ordnance department is to supply arms and munitions of war for sea-coast and frontier fortifications, and for the forces in the field.

The expenditures for these purposes during the last fiscal year amount to $42,313,630 21.

The cannon, small-arms, accoutrements and equipments for men and horses, and ammunition obtained during the last fiscal year, by purchase and manufacture, were as follows:

1,577 field, siege, and sea-coast cannon, with carriages, caissons, and other implements.
1,082,841 muskets and rifles for foot soldiers.
282,389 carbines and pistols for mounted troops.
1,251,995 cannon balls and shells.
48,719,862 pounds of lead and lead bullets.
1,435,046 cartridges for artillery.
259,022,216 cartridges for small-arms.
347,276,400 percussion caps.
3,925,369 friction primers.
5,764,768 pounds of gunpowder.
919,676 sets of accoutrements for men.
94,639 sets of equipments for cavalry horses.
3,281 sets of artillery harness, each set for two horses.

An immense amount of material has been prepared at the different arsenals, and work in metals, wood, and leather, in large quantity, is advanced towards completion, for the manufacture and repairs of all the various machines and implements of war in use in the service.

The quantities of the principal articles of ordnance materials in the control of the Department at the beginning of the war, the quantities of those articles that have since been procured, and the quantities of those articles on hand on June 30, 1863, are shown in the following table, namely:

The resources of this country for the production of arms and munitions of war have only commenced their development, yet their extent may be inferred from the enormous quantity of supplies shown by the foregoing tabular abstract to have been furnished during the last two years. At the beginning of the war we were compelled to rely upon foreign countries for the supply of nearly all our arms and munitions. Now all these things are manufactured at home, and we are independent of foreign countries not only for the manufactures, but also for the materials of which they are composed.

The excellence of arms and munitions of American manufacture, which have been supplied by the Ordnance department to the Army, has been so obvious that our soldiers are no longer willing to use those which have been imported from other countries.

The efforts made during the war to extend and improve the manufacture of arms and munitions have resulted in discoveries of great importance to the country in peace as well as in war. Among the arts thus improved is the manufacture of wrought iron, now rivaling the finest qualities of the iron of Sweden, Norway, and England, so highly prized in the arts.

This country, until the present year, has relied upon those countries for material to make gun-balls, bridle-bits, car-wheel tires, and other articles requiring iron of finest quality. The iron of our own production is now superior to that obtained abroad for all these purposes.

The law of 1808 made provision for the annual expenditure of $200,000 for arming the militia of the States. That sum is insufficient for the wants of the increased population of the country. Two million dollars should be annually appropriated for that purpose, until all the States are supplied, in proportion to their population, with the same number of arms that have been distributed in some of the States to meet the exigencies of the war.

From the report of the Chief of Engineers, it appears that the grants made by Congress for fortifications, at its last session, amounted to $5,250,000 for permanent works, and $700,000 for temporary works. These liberal provisions allowed of very material progress being made upon the important class of fortifications now under construction, and of essential modifications being effected in old works and existing batteries, to obtain largely increased efficiency, by preparing them to receive ordnance of greatly increased calibers, and to store greater bulks of ammunition, with additional security afforded therefor.

These important objects have been very generally realized. The difficulties existing last year in the procurement and transportation of materials, and in obtaining the requisite amount of skilled and ordinary labor, have increased; but these difficulties have been surmounted or avoided to such a degree that the general result is very favorable, and our seaboard and border fortifications are now in condition to afford a formidable defense, decidedly stronger than last year.

The report of the annual board of visitors of the Military Academy is herewith submitted. There being no representation from the rebel States in the Academy since the war commenced, there existed accommodation for a considerable number of cadets beyond those furnished from the loyal States. There seemed to be no good reason why the advantages of the Academy should not be enjoyed to the fullest capacity, and accordingly the vacancies were this session filled up by appointments from loyal States, the generals commanding armies being invited to furnish the names of deserving young men from their respective commands; and in this way the number of cadets allowed by law have been admitted to the advantages of military education in the Academy at West Point. The usual statement, showing the condition in life of the cadets for a number of years past, and a list of the present officers and cadets of the Academy, accompany the report of the Chief Engineer.

The operations connected with the survey of the northern and northwestern lakes have been actively continued, and during the past season have consisted in a survey of Portage entry, on Lake Superior, and in resuming the survey of Green bay and its entrance from Lake Michigan; also of the periodical examination of the channels of the St. Clair flats, and of Lake George of St. Mary's river. Observations for the determination of geographical positions, of the fluctuations of the elevation of the surfaces of the lakes, and of the meteorological phenomena, are embraced in the operations of the survey. The number of lake charts distributed to navigators to the 1st of October, 1863, exceeds 24,000, of which over 4,000 were distributed the past year.

By the direction of this Department, an experienced and skillful officer has been detailed to examine and report what temporary works are required to guard the lake shores from rebel and piratical raids.

The department charged with the disbursement of the funds for surveys for military defenses has, in addition to its current duties, prepared for military purposes (to which their distribution is necessarily restricted) an aggregate of 8,841 maps, of which 6,927 were engraved and lithographed, and 1,914 were photographed.

The clothing and equipment of troops, their shelter and transportation; the purchase of wagons, horses, and mules; the supply of forage; the construction, repair, and working of military roads; and the supply of boats for transportation by water, constitute important duties of the Quartermaster General's department. The detail of these operations, so far as is proper for public information, is contained in the acting Quartermaster General's report, and need not here be recapitulated. The adequate supply of mules and horses, and their subsistence, are among the most arduous duties of the service. To systematize this branch of service, with adequate supervision and proper economy, so far as practicable, a Cavalry Bureau was established a few months ago, and is now in operation at Giesboro. It is believed that by this means much improvement may be made, with proper diligence and fidelity on the part of the officers intrusted with this important duty.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

The Quartermaster General has for some months been making a careful personal inspection of his branch of service in the different military departments, but his report has not yet been received.

The report of the Commissary General of Subsistence shows that the subsistence for the Army, with the exception of fresh beef and flour, has in great part been procured by advertising for bids, and selecting the lowest for suitable articles, in the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cincinnati, Louisville, and St. Louis. Flour has, when possible, been procured in the same manner, at points nearer to our armies. Fresh beef has been obtained in general by contract, sometimes on the hoof, and at other times from the block. On the coast of the Carolinas and the Gulf, and for a large portion of the year at New Orleans, beef has been forwarded on the hoof from New York. It is believed that at every point the troops have been supplied with abundance of good wholesome food, and that if, in movements of our armies, a temporary want has been felt, it has not been due to any cause over which the officers of this Department had control. In addition to the troops, subsistence has been furnished to all prisoners, whether political or war, to large numbers of contrabands, and to suffering Union families found by our armies in the rebel States. Great improvement has taken place in the rendering of accounts by volunteer officers, although cases of neglect still exist. The few regular officers of this branch of the service have had heavy labors and responsibilities imposed upon them, and have exhibited intelligence, integrity, and zeal.

The Paymaster General reports that, except where payments have been postponed by commanding generals, on account of pending operations, the various armies in the field are substantially paid to the 31st of October, 1863, the latest period allowable by law and regulation, and that funds have been provided and placed in the proper hands for full payment of all the troops in service up to the date mentioned.

By the report of the acting Surgeon General, the Department is informed that the latest reports received give one hundred and eighty-two general hospitals, with a capacity of 84,472 beds. The number of patients remaining in general hospitals June 30, 1863, was 9.1 per cent., and in the field 4.4 per cent. of the entire mean strength of the Army, of whom 11 per cent. were sick, and 2.5 per cent. wounded. The corps of medical inspectors, by the system of inspections established, has added materially to the efficiency of the medical and hospital service, and a marked improvement in all matters of sanitary precaution and police is exhibited. Companies of the second battalion, invalid corps, have in many instances been advantageously substituted for contract nurses, attendants, and cooks in the general hospitals. Appropriations are asked for the payment of washing in those hospitals and on transports where a sufficient number of matrons cannot be employed; for the collection and preservation of pathological specimens in the Army medical museum; and for the preparation and examination of drugs, in connection with the purveying depots. The health of the troops has been good, and the mortality less than the preceding year.

The signal corps was organized under an act of the last Congress. The average number of officers on duty is reported as one hundred and ninety-eight. The full capacity of this branch of service has not yet been developed, and different opinions as to its value seem to be entertained by commanding officers. In combined land and naval operations it has been considered useful, and commanding officers of western armies have commended it with favor. The continuance of the corps is recommended by this Department, with proper restrictions upon the number of officers, and limiting them to their proper scope of duties.

The military telegraph, under the general direction of Colonel Stager and Major Eckert, has been of inestimable value to the service, and no corps has surpassed, few have equaled, the telegraph operators in diligence and devotion to their duties.

From the superintendent's report it appears that the military telegraph lines required by the Government have been constructed over an extensive and scattered territory, embracing the District of Columbia, parts of the States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Arkansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri, Kansas, and the Indian territories.

Under the immediate direction of Major Eckert, assistant superintendent, of the department of the Potomac, three hundred miles have been constructed during the year. Under the direction of Captain Smith, assistant superintendent, of the department of Missouri, five hundred and forty-eight miles have been constructed during the year, one mile of which was submarine. Under the direction of Captain Bruch, assistant superintendent, of the departments of the Ohio, Cumberland, and Mississippi, five hundred and ten miles have been constructed during the year. Under the direction of Captain David, assistant superintendent, of the department of Western Virginia, ninety-seven miles have been constructed during the same period. Under the direction of Captain Bulkley, assistant superintendent, of the department of the Gulf, three hundred miles have been built, one mile of which was submarine. On the 1st day of July, 1862, there were 3,571 miles of land and submarine lines in working order. During the fiscal year 1,755 miles of land and submarine line were constructed, making the total number of miles of land and submarine military telegraph lines in operation during the year 5,326, being length of line sufficient to girdle more than one fifth of the circumference of the globe. By a close estimate, it appears that at least one million two hundred thousand telegrams have been sent and received over the military lines in operation during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1863, being at the rate of about thirty-three hundred per diem. These messages have varied in length from ten to one thousand words and upwards, and generally were of an urgent or most important character.

Pursuant to acts of Congress passed February 16, 1863, and July 12, 1862, three commissioners were appointed to examine and report upon all claims arising under the act of March 25, 1862, entitled "An act to secure to the officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri, their pay, bounty, and pension." The sum of $100,000, or so much as should be necessary, was appropriated by an act passed May 14, 1862, to pay the claims awarded. The commissioners have reported in favor of claims amounting to the sum of $890,612 13. No power of apportionment being vested in the Department, further legislation or a larger appropriation will be required to carry these acts into effect.

Many claims are presented to the Department for the use of land occupied by the Government as forts, camping grounds, and other public works, for forage and other property used or injured by the troops. Some of these claims are just, others doubtful, and many exorbitant or fraudulent. The Department has no mode of investigating them, and no appropriation to pay them. It is submitted that provision should be made by act of Congress for their speedy adjustment and payment.

Diligent effort has been made for the enforcement of discipline, the detection of frauds, and their prevention and punishment by summary dismissal, or by the conviction and sentence of guilty parties by court-martial and military commission. In this respect much has been accomplished by the Judge Advocate General and his assistants. From his report it appears that, since the commencement of the rebellion, vast as has been the increase of the duties and labors of his office, there has been no legislative provision enlarging the instrumentalities for their performance. The machinery of the office remains as when the Army consisted but of some thirteen thousand men. This condition of things is the more striking when it is remembered that in every other branch of the military service legislation has kept pace with the wants created by the emergencies of the war. It is essential that the force of this office be increased to meet the emergencies of the service. The following is a summary of the business dispatched in the Judge Advocate General's office from the 1st September, 1862, to 1st November, 1863, a period of fourteen months: Number of records of trials by general courts-martial and military commissions reviewed, 17,357; Number of reports made as to the regularities of the proceedings, on applications for restoration to the service, and for the pardon of offenders, and remission or commutation of sentences, 2,318. Miscellaneous reports on other questions referred to the office, 172.

While many of these reports are brief, many are long and elaborate, involving an examination of complicated masses of fact, and of difficult legal questions. As recorded, they occupy about two thousand quarto pages.

It gives me pleasure to bear witness to the general diligence, ability, and fidelity manifested by the chiefs of the several bureaus of this Department. Whatever success may have attended its administration is, in a great measure, due to them and their subordinates.

In conclusion, I may be permitted to express the hope that the next annual report from this Department may announce the complete overthrow of the rebellion, and the restoration of peace and the establishment of the Union on a sure foundation in all the bounds of the United States.

Respectfully submitted.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 7, 1863.

SIR: The naval operations of the year have been varied, and more arduous as well as far more extensive than ever before under the Government. A blockade commencing at Alexandria, in Virginia, and terminating at the Rio Grande, has been effectively maintained. The extent of this blockade, according to an accurate table of measurement carefully prepared at the Coast Survey office, covers a distance of 3,549 statute miles, with 189 harbor or river openings or indentations, and much of the coast presents a double shore to be guarded. In addition to the coast blockade, a naval force of more than one hundred vessels has been employed in patrolling the rivers, cutting off rebel supplies, and cooperating with the armies in the suppression of the rebellion. The distance thus traversed and patrolled by the gunboats on the Mississippi and its tributaries is 3,615 miles, and the sounds, bayous, rivers, and inlets of the States upon the Atlantic and the Gulf, covering an extent of about 2,000 miles, have also been penetrated and watched with unceasing vigilance.

The blockade is becoming more effective and complete. Progress has been made in repelling the rebels from the coast, and circumscribing their limits. The Mississippi and its tributaries have, after a protracted, persistent, and severe struggle, in which the whole energies and efforts of the insurgents were engaged to obstruct and prevent our success, been reopened to navigation and commerce. As the rebels have never possessed an open port for either belligerent operations or commercial purposes, nor a naval or commercial marine, their maritime trade and proceedings have been chiefly derived from foreign adventurers and foreign capital. If, in the early period of the war, the unscrupulous and unprincipled traders who, in violation of law and public morality, embarked in illicit schemes to violate the blockade, and furnish the rebels with supplies, were successful, the general results of the year, now near its close, have been to them most disastrous. The vigilance of our naval forces and the stringency of the blockade have operated with great severity on those who have risen in arms against their country, and have caused heavy losses to those who have abetted or have been in sympathy with the rebellion. I do not propose, in this report, to enter upon the details of our naval operations since my last annual communication, but shall append the official reports of the officers themselves, which best narrate their respective labors and achievements. No nobler enormity can be awarded them than the plain statement of their deeds, and no summary can do justice to their unassuming communications.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

The cruising grounds of the several blockading squadrons remain unchanged since my last report.

NORTH ATLANTIC SQUADRON.

Acting Rear Admiral Lee continues in command of the North Atlantic squadron, faithfully and ably discharging his duties in a position of great responsibility, and, in some respects, of great embarrassment. Seconded and sustained as he has been by officers of zeal and efficiency, the rivers of Virginia and the sounds of North Carolina have been penetrated, watched, and guarded, as well as the entire coast, so that all intercourse with the rebels has been cut off with the single exception of the port of Wilmington, to close which has been difficult from its two inlets, thirty miles apart, flanked by extensive batteries. Some of the fastest steamers from the Clyde and other quarters, of light draught, have, under cover of darkness, succeeded in eluding capture, but most of even that description of vessels have fallen into our hands or been driven on shore. With these exceptional cases, all foreign and coastwise commerce with the rebels has ceased in that quarter. At Washington, Newbern, and elsewhere on the inner waters of North Carolina, and also on the Nansemond, York, and other rivers of Virginia, our naval officers have been sleepless sentinels, and they have exhibited examples of heroic bravery and daring in repelling the rebels and protecting and succoring the Army when in difficulty, which reflect honor on themselves and the service.

SOUTH ATLANTIC SQUADRON.

The South Atlantic squadron has continued to enforce the blockade with vigilance and effect. It is not known that any vessels now elude the vigilance of the fleet or effect communication with the rebels on that coast. So long as the blockading force remained off Charleston, instead of getting within the bar, the illicit trade at that point was prosecuted with some success, and no vigilance or activity could wholly prevent it. With a view of intercepting all traffic, and, if possible, of capturing Charleston itself, the original seat of insurrection and of disunion, preparations were made by this Department; commencing more than a year ago, for the occupation of the harbor and the reduction of the defenses. The completion of the iron-clad vessels was urged forward with all the energy the Department could infuse into the contractors; and such other efficient vessels as could be made available were ordered to the squadron to add to its power and efficiency. Delays and difficulties intervened, and it was not until the 7th of April that a demonstration was made. On the afternoon of that day, Rear Admiral Du Pont, in the New Ironsides, accompanied by seven turreted vessels of the Monitor class and the gunboat Keokuk, proceeded up the harbor and made a vigorous assault upon Fort Sumter. From some difficulty or defect, the Admiral's ship was unable to get into action, but the others proceeded onward to the attack, and sustained a terrific concentrated fire from numerous batteries.

Owing to the submerged obstructions, the character of which was not understood, it was not deemed advisable to attempt a passage up to the city, and, after a contest of less than two hours, the signal was given to withdraw the fleet. But comparatively slight injury was sustained by the turreted vessels, and only one life was lost in this remarkable contest. No ships ever before sustained such a concentrated fire, and the enduring qualities of this class of vessels were fully proved. It was intended to have renewed the attack on the following day, but this intention was subsequently abandoned, and the vessels were withdrawn from the harbor, under an apprehension that they could not withstand the storms of the season and the fire of the rebel batteries. But important considerations rendered it proper that the force should remain inside the bar, and orders were sent to Rear Admiral Du Pont to that effect.

The report of the superintending engineer as to the injuries which the turreted vessels had sustained was satisfactory, and confirmed the Government in its determination to close effectually and completely the port, so as to prevent the ingress or egress of a single vessel, and also to promote operations against the defenses in the harbor.

Rear Admiral Du Pont having expressed a willingness to relinquish the position which he had occupied for eighteen months, Rear Admiral Andrew H. Foote was detailed to relieve him. That brave and distinguished officer prepared with great alacrity and promptitude for the duty; but, when on his way to his command, was seized with fatal illness, and died in New York. His associate and second in command, Rear Admiral John A. Dahlgren, proceeded immediately to Port Royal, and, on the 6th day of July, assumed command of the squadron. A combined operation of naval and Army forces, the latter under General Gillmore, was instituted for the occupation and possession of Morris island, on the south side of the entrance to Charleston harbor. After a long and severe struggle, the army operating upon land with the efficient coöperation of the Monitors and the Ironsides, Morris island, with all its batteries, was captured. Sumter was soon made a pile of ruins by the fierce artillery of our forces, although the rebels contrived to continue a small but powerless force there under the protection of the surrounding batteries. In the slow operations of this protracted siege of over five months, as well as in the demonstration of the 7th of April, both the resisting and attacking power of the Monitors has been illustrated and proven.

Since the fleet under Admiral Dahlgren has remained inside the bar, and we have had possession of Morris island, the commerce of Charleston has ceased. Not a single blockade-runner has succeeded in reaching the city for months, and the traffic which had been to some extent, and with large profits, previously carried on is extinguished. As a commercial mart Charleston has no existence; her wealth with her trade has departed. In a military or strategic view the place is of little consequence; and whether the rebels are able by great sacrifice and exhaustion to hold out a few weeks more or less is of no importance.

The most marked and extraordinary conflict within the limits of this squadron, or indeed in the service during the year, and in some respects one of the most significant and instructive naval battles of the war, took place on the 17th of June, in Wassaw sound, between the Weehawken, a vessel of the Monitor class, and the formidable armored steamer Atlanta. Like the contest in Hampton Roads, in March, 1862, when the Monitor and the Merrimack were engaged, this battle was between armored vessels and of great disparity in size, but the result was vastly more speedy and decisive. The Atlanta was a powerful steamer, had been iron-plated by the rebels, and prepared for war purposes at immense expense. In the confidence of certain victory over her comparatively diminutive antagonists, the Weehawken and the Nahant, she was accompanied by boats loaded with gay parties to witness her triumph, but the brave officers and men of our turreted vessels knew their power and sought the encounter. This battle was to test not only the vessels but the new fifteen-inch ordnance, then for the first time brought into naval warfare, and concerning which there had been, as well as with respect to the vessels themselves, some variety of opinion. The conflict was so brief and decisive that only one of the two Monitor vessels, though not widely separated and each eager for the fight, was able to participate in the engagement. The Nahant, having no pilot, followed in the wake of the Weehawken, but before she could get into action the contest was over. Such was the brevity of the fight that the Weehawken, in about fifteen minutes, and with only five shots from her heavy guns, overpowered and captured her formidable antagonist before the Nahant, which was hastening to the work, could discharge a single shot at the Atlanta. This remarkable result was an additional testimony in favor of the Monitor class of vessels for harbor defense and coast service against any naval vessels that have been or are likely to be constructed to visit our shores. It appears also to have extinguished whatever lingering hopes the rebels may have had of withstanding our naval power by naval means.

EASTERN GULF SQUADRON.

Acting Rear Admiral Bailey has continued in command of the Eastern Gulf squadron, closely blockading the Florida peninsula from Cape Canaveral, on the east, to Pensacola, on the west. There having been no important military movements within these limits, a close watch of the coast and of the adjacent waters has been maintained by the Navy, resulting in the capture of many prizes, and the almost entire annihilation of all illicit traffic. Some important boat expeditions for cutting out vessels and destroying rebel salt-works have been projected and executed with success. Lying adjacent to Cuba, and not far distant from Nassau, the coast of Florida presented many available points for eluding the blockade chiefly by small vessels, which were capable of penetrating the shallow harbors and inlets which indent its shores. But the trade has not been carried on with impunity; more than one hundred craft of various descriptions have been captured or destroyed by this squadron during the current year.

WESTERN GULF SQUADRON.

The duties of the Western Gulf squadron have been diversified and exacting. For a considerable part of the year Rear Admiral Farragut felt himself compelled to employ many of his most efficient vessels in active river service, coöperating with the Army, with a view to reopening the navigation of the Mississippi, and expelling hostile forces from its banks. Impressed with the great importance of this work, and aware of the determination of the Government to promptly and firmly reestablish the national authority in that quarter, so that the ocean outlet of the great central valley of the Union should be unrestricted and secure, Rear Admiral Farragut committed the subject of the coast blockade to others of his command, and devoted his unremitting personal attention to the energetic and vigorous prosecution of the conquest of the rebels, to overcoming and reducing their batteries, and to removing every obstacle with which they sought to oppose the navigation of the river or to resist the authorities of the Union. Soon after the capture of New Orleans, in the spring of 1862, and as the natural result of that event, the naval forces formed a junction; and could the Army at that time have furnished an adequate coöperating land force, the reduction of Vicksburg might have been accomplished, and the occupation and navigation of the river easily secured. But the omission to do this gave the rebels opportunity to immensely strengthen Vicksburg, and also to fortify Port Hudson and Grand Gulf in addition. What, therefore, might have been accomplished with comparatively little effort in the summer of 1862, was a work of immense and almost incredible labor and difficulty in 1863. It was indispensable that communication should be opened with Rear Admiral Porter, of the Mississippi squadron, and General Grant, both of whom were operating against Vicksburg. Rear Admiral Farragut, therefore, moved up in strong force from Baton Rouge in March, intending to pass the batteries at Port Hudson, but only his own flag-ship, the Hartford, and the Albatross were successful. With these he succeeded in approaching Vicksburg, and in communicating with Rear Admiral Porter across the peninsula. This gallant act of Rear Admiral Farragut being effected, the Navy had command of the river between Vicksburg and Port Hudson, and was enabled to establish a blockade of Red river, and thus intercept the supplies from Texas destined for the rebel armies. The insurgents felt this to be one of the most serious and fatal blows inflicted on them during the year, and from the effects of it they have never recovered. This accomplished, the Admiral left his flag-ship, the Hartford, and returning below by way of the Atchafalaya, he resumed operations for a final assault on Port Hudson. To meet the requirements of the occasion a force was kept always ready to coöperate with the Army in its movements; and on the part of the Navy a continuous shelling of the place from mortar boats, vessels, and a naval battery on shore, manned by seamen, was maintained, seconding the Army. Nearly three thousand 13-inch shells were thrown into the works by the mortar vessels, and the naval battery of four 9-inch guns, used as a breaching battery, performed good service. In consequence of the capture of Vicksburg, on the 4th of July, the reduction of Port Hudson became inevitable, and the garrison finally surrendered, on the 9th of July, to General Banks, who, for some weeks, had besieged the place.

This was the last stronghold of resistance to the national authority on the banks of the Mississippi.

The river being now opened to peaceful commercial pursuits, Rear Admiral Farragut turned over to Rear Admiral Porter the entire control of the western waters above New Orleans, and departed himself for that city. Deeming that his long service and useful labors of eighteen months entitled this gallant officer to special consideration, the Department tendered him a respite, which he accepted, and Commodore H. H. Bell, the next officer in rank, was appointed to command the squadron in his absence.

The blockade of the Gulf has been, in the main, efficient and successful, although reverses at Galveston and Sabine Pass occurred, and, for a time, reckless adventurers and foreign capitalists to some extent succeeded, by perverting neutral privileges and fraudulently abusing neutral rights on the Rio Grande, in carrying on illicit trade with the rebels through Matamoras. The Rio Grande being the boundary between the United States and Mexico, is open to the navigation of both countries, and could not therefore be blockaded. With a knowledge of this fact, a multitude of schemes were projected, and, under the disguise of neutral trade, Matamoras suddenly became a great commercial mart for the rebels and their friends. But the shrewdly devised schemes were soon interrupted with disastrous consequences to most of those who participated in them, and the occupation of the Rio Grande and Brownsville has put a final termination to the lately extensive commerce of Matamoras, which is becoming as insignificant as it was before the rebellion.

MISSISSIPPI SQUADRON.

The Mississippi squadron has been actively engaged in successful efforts to overcome the rebels and restore the national ascendancy in the great central valley of the Union.

Rear Admiral Porter, whose activity, energy, and readiness of resources eminently fitted him for that command, has exhibited extraordinary vigor in various naval expeditions on the Mississippi and its tributaries, and in zealous coöperation with the Army in most of its important operations.

The capture of Arkansas Post, on the White river, in January, the destruction of the batteries at Grand Gulf in May, and, in coöperation with the Army, the reduction of Vicksburg, which finally surrendered on the 4th of July, are the most prominent of the remarkable achievements of this squadron, some of which are marked by incidents of singular and romantic daring. In the appendix to this report will be found correct records of the extraordinary adventures attending the efforts to get control of the Yazoo by sweeping from its channel the network of torpedoes, explosive machines, and contrivances for submarine warfare, near its confluence with the Mississippi. These efforts were followed by the novel and singular "Yazoo Pass Expedition," and the expedition of "Steel's bayou and Deer creek." On the right bank of the Mississippi scenes of interest were also enacted by the hardy sailors and boatmen on the rivers of Arkansas and northern Louisiana. The Cumberland and the Tennessee have been actively patrolled by our vigilant and skillful naval officers, and the exciting chase of Morgan by our steamers on the Ohio, over a distance of five hundred miles, intercepting him and his band when attempting to escape, naturally attracted the attention of the country. But the great and important exploits of this squadron were in the vicinity of Vicksburg, where the main strength of the naval as well as of the military forces was centered. The magnitude of the defenses of this place, which were intended to repulse any force, naval or military, or both combined, which could be brought against them, made the siege formidable, and seemed for a time to defy all attempts at their reduction. In overcoming them, the Navy necessarily performed a conspicuous and essential part. For forty-two days, without intermission, the mortar boats were throwing shells into all parts of the city, and even into the works beyond it. Heavy guns, mounted on scows, commanded the important water batteries, and for fourteen days maintained an incessant fire upon them. Thirteen heavy guns were landed from the vessels, and officers and men (where they could be spared) were sent to man them. The gunboats below the city, in coöperation with the Army, were continually engaged in shelling the place. During the siege sixteen thousand shells were thrown from the mortars, gunboats, and naval batteries upon the city and its defenses before they capitulated.

The creation and organization of this large squadron, which has done such effective service on the Upper Mississippi and its tributaries, extending over a distance of more than three thousand miles, may be justly considered among the most wonderful events of the times. It is but little over two years since we had not a naval vessel on all these waters, where we now have a squadron of one hundred vessels, carrying 462 guns, with crews amounting in the aggregate to about 5,500 men. Kentucky, Tennessee, and Arkansas, the upper portions of Mississippi and Louisiana, and the southern portions of those States which border on the Ohio river on the north, have been relieved and liberated through the instrumentality of the gunboats acting by themselves, or in earnest and cordial coöperation with the armies. Rear Admiral Porter has well sustained the renown which the gallant and lamented Foote so nobly earned, and has carried forward to successful results a larger and more powerful force than was ever at the disposal of that heroic officer. In creating and organizing this squadron, and arming and manning the vessels, it must not be forgotten that the service labored under many and great disadvantages, for the Government had no navy-yard or establishment of its own on which the Department could depend. In the absence of any governmental yards, shops, storehouses, and other necessary facilities and aids for a naval establishment, and also of mechanics and workmen, it became necessary to collect and send out and receive supplies from some central and secure position. This work has been performed chiefly at Cairo, under the superintendence and management of officers who have devoted themselves to their less conspicuous but not less indispensable work with an assiduity and labor not surpassed even by their more active associates who are facing the enemy.

POTOMAC FLOTILLA.

Allured by high prices and the prospect of gain, mercenary adventurers as well as rebels and rebel sympathizers have continued to carry on to some extent illicit and contraband traffic between Maryland and Virginia, rendering it necessary to maintain a considerable force on the Potomac. The flotilla, under command of Commodore Harwood, has kept a close watch and guard to intercept and prevent, as far as possible, communication with the rebels, and many captures have been made; but the punishment inflicted on those who attempt to deal with traitors and furnish them supplies has been so light, that these petty contrabandists, as well as the more open blockade-runners, have carried on their employment with some degree of impunity. In one or two instances armed bodies of men have appeared on the Virginia shore, as if with the intention of molesting navigation, but they have abruptly fled on the approach of a gunboat. To guard against possible contingencies, at the time of the invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania, which terminated in the battle of Gettysburg, vessels were stationed at what were deemed available points along the upper waters of the Chesapeake to coöperate with the military authorities. A gunboat was sent up the Susquehanna to Havre-de-Grace, another up the Gunpowder, a third up the Blackwater, while one was also posted at Annapolis, and another at Wilmington.

PACIFIC SQUADRON.

The force in the Pacific remains the same as at the date of my last annual report, with the addition of the Saginaw and the Farallones, storeship, at Acapulco.

Acting Rear Admiral Charles H. Bell continues in command of the squadron, and has attended to our interests in that quarter. The vigilance of this officer and of Captain Thomas O. Selfridge, commandant of the navy-yard at Mare Island, with the active coöperation of the custom-house and revenue authorities on our western coast, has intercepted and suppressed all attempts to fit out rebel piratical cruisers on the Pacific.

The schooner J. C. Chapman was detected in the harbor of San Francisco in the month of May last, and seized by the sloop-of-war Cyane, with men, armament, and military supplies on board, evidently intended to prey upon our commerce. Some indications of a scheme to fit out a rebel cruiser having been communicated by our consul at Victoria, Admiral Bell dispatched the Saginaw to Washington Territory to ascertain the facts, and, if necessary, to take prompt measures in regard to them. Although it was ascertained that some proceedings had taken place sufficient to give rise to reports of a design to fit out a piratical craft under the rebel flag from British waters, there were no substantial grounds to apprehend that such a scheme could be carried into effect, especially in view of the friendly disposition and earnest resolve of the colonial authorities to discountenance and prevent such illegal proceedings. The Saginaw, therefore, returned to San Francisco from a satisfactory mission to the northwest coast. The vessels of this squadron have during the year visited the principal ports on the Pacific coast, and by their presence strengthened our diplomatic and consular representatives, and imparted a feeling of security to American citizens and American interests wherever they have appeared.

VESSELS IN THE EAST INDIES.

In the East India and China seas the Jamestown and the Wyoming have guarded American interests during the past year, and, with the exception of a disturbance which it is to be regretted occurred at Japan, all has remained quiet in that region. In the month of July, while the Wyoming was at Yokohama, information was received that the American steamer Pembroke had been fired upon by Japanese vessels. Commander McDougal immediately proceeded to the locality of the outrage, where he was fired upon from six land batteries, and a naval force consisting of a steamer, a bark, and a brig. An action of one hour followed, in which it is stated that the steamer of the enemy was blown up, the bark sunk, and the brig made a complete wreck in her upper works, while considerable damage was done to the land batteries. The Wyoming withdrew after thus vindicating the honor of the American flag, having sustained a loss of eleven killed and wounded.

THE NAVAL FORCE.

I have mentioned in former reports that the naval force at the commencement of this Administration consisted of 76 vessels, and of these only 42 were in commission. The additions which have since been made have elevated the country into a first-class naval Power. In the following table an exhibit is presented of the actual number and description of our naval vessels at the date of my last report and at the present time:

There have been added to the Navy during the past year, by purchase, some thirty tugs, over fifty steamers for blockading and supply purposes, and over twenty other vessels for tenders and store-ships. At least twenty of the steamers were captured in endeavoring to violate the blockade.

IMPROVEMENTS IN NAVAL VESSELS.

Upon the assumption that the United States are to occupy a leading position among maritime nations, a primary object with the Government must be the maintenance of a naval force adequate for defense against all foreign aggression. The thorough transformation which has taken place in the character of naval warfare is the result of a change not less complete in the character and structure of naval vessels. The sailing ships-of-war, whose construction had been brought almost to perfection, were superseded first by paddle-wheel steamers, and they in turn have given place to vessels propelled by submerged screws. Steamers, however, are liable to disaster in battle from which sailing vessels are exempt. A single chance shot may totally disable the most powerful steamer; and this exposure, rendering vessels of this class unsafe and dangerous, has led to precautions and safeguards for their protection in the form of iron armature, by which a first class man-of-war is made invulnerable to the ordnance formerly used in naval warfare. But this new form of defense has developed with it a corresponding improvement in the form and force of attack; and thus the proper naval armament of the present day, consisting of ordnance of a caliber, reach, and power heretofore regarded as impossible, has become as novel and experimental as the new naval structures and defenses which it is intended to assail. These successive changes, introducing into naval war vessels powerful machinery to insure speed, armature for its protection, and heavy ordnance for assault, have led to a necessary constant increase in the size of our ships, until the attainment of sufficient dimensions for a first-rate man-of-war steamer, properly armored, and with suitable armament and room for supplies, requires proportions which at first view seem enormous. Yet without such greatly augmented size, the essentials of invulnerability, speed, heavy armament, and space for the necessary supplies for cruising operations, cannot all be secured.

In the responsible task of applying to naval vessels and naval armament the principles which modern invention and improvement have developed, the Department has been compelled to pursue a path hitherto, to a great extent, unexplored. The Monitor class of armored ships, with revolving turrets and few guns of heavy caliber, has proved itself to be well adapted for harbor defense and coast service, and in some emergencies these vessels, from their great powers of endurance, have shown themselves to be efficient and serviceable in offensive operations. This form and description of vessel, which originated in the inventive genius of Captain John Ericsson, will perform not only all that should be expected of them to make our harbors secure, but, when of enlarged capacity, may supersede ships of higher pretensions. To maintain our rightful maritime position, and for predominance upon the ocean, vessels of greater size than any turreted vessel yet completed may be essential. Not only must they carry guns of a heavier caliber than have heretofore been used at sea, but, in order to make long cruises and to cope successfully with any force, these vessels must have all possible strength, endurance, and speed. Their structure must, therefore, afford space enough for full sailing power, and for the most powerful steam machinery, and the large supplies of fuel needed to keep it at work. Being, unlike the other great maritime nations, without distant colonies, where coal depots can be established on the shore of almost every sea, we must conform to the necessities of our condition, and build ships with capacity enough to take on board fuel sufficient for a long cruise. The space for other supplies, for munitions of war, and for the accommodation of officers and crews, should also be ample, and, in addition to this, each of these vessels must, in order to accomplish its work, present in its construction, armor, armament, and propulsion, all the power that the resources of modern invention and mechanical science and art can furnish for attack, resistance, and pursuit. A vessel of this description must, of course, cost a large price. But then a wise statesmanship will not fail to perceive that the possession of even a very few such unconquerable ships must, while vastly augmenting the force and renown of our Navy, afford us, at the same time, an inestimable guarantee of peace with foreign nations; nor, in counting the cost of such floating structures, can we forget that, large as that cost may be, it yet sinks into insignificance in contrast with the expenditures and sacrifices of a single year or even a month of foreign war.

In order that we may have at our command a navy which shall fulfill these unexampled and exacting conditions of efficiency, a commensurate public establishment for its construction and preparation is indispensable. A navy-yard on a large scale, and, in many respects, of a new plan, amply furnished with all the proper facilities and aids for its operations, where machinery for steamers can be manufactured, iron vessels constructed, iron armature made and tested, and repairs of every description executed, is an absolute necessity. In view of these facts, I had the honor, on successive occasions, to urge this matter upon the attention of the last Congress; and the omission of that body to take even the preliminary measures towards the procurement and formation of such an establishment is a misfortune which the country is now made to feel.

The nature of the service to which our naval vessels have been subjected by long and continuous blockade, their exposure during all weathers and seasons, the necessity of keeping them under constant steam or their fires banked ready for any emergency, have put them to severe tests. Of course all vessels must at times be withdrawn for repair and refitment, and steamers subject to such hard usage must often be seriously damaged. Weeks and sometimes months have been required for the renovation or restoration of their engines and machinery. Such delay has been still further protracted by the inability of our public yards and shops to execute the work, and the Department, depending in a great degree on private industry, has been in a constant struggle to dispatch the steamers sent in for repairs. The limited facilities for manufacturing and repairing steam machinery at the public navy-yards render them totally inadequate to meet a moiety of the demands made upon them. Even with the aid of private establishments, no inconsiderable portion of our naval force is waiting, unemployed, and detained from active service, to the injury of the country. As an instance of the delay attending the repair of our ships, and the insufficiency of our public works to meet our wants, it may be mentioned that the steam frigate Niagara, ordered to Boston for repair and refitment, was detained fourteen months for its completion. I again, therefore, most earnestly invoke the attention of Congress to the manifest and inauspicious fact that our Government has made no sufficient provision in its public establishments for the existing requirements of naval warfare. So long as our ships-of-war were to be built of wood and propelled by sails, our facilities for their construction were ample and complete. At former periods the Government, in view of its then present and prospective wants for naval purposes, incurred large expense in establishing dock-yards and otherwise providing for the service, but new defenses and armament, vessels of iron, new motive power, and different material in their structure, require new dock-yards and workshops; the introduction of steam, the submerged propeller, the iron vessel, the armored ship, call for a different description of artisans, as well as different materials and workmanship. Our country is better prepared for this change than almost any other maritime nation, for we have but few sailing vessels of the large class, and these few to which steam cannot be applied may be used to advantage for other than fighting purposes; one of them, the Vermont, has been fitted and used as a storeship, and the New Hampshire, formerly the Alabama, a ship of the line, is being prepared for a similar purpose. They are each available and useful for this object, are adapted to it in every respect, and can be made capable of defense against attack. But for cruising and the objects held in view in their construction, these magnificent specimens of the old naval architecture and of the skill of our mechanics, although in their day they elevated the naval dignity and attested the power of the Republic, have now become comparatively useless.

The strength and durability of wooden vessels are in some respects inferior to those made of iron, and consequently they are less capable of sustaining the heaviest armament, and when they are plated with iron the disparity is increased. Consequently large ships-of-war, by which maritime supremacy is to be achieved and maintained, will, in all probability, be ultimately constructed chiefly of iron. The comparative advantages and disadvantages of iron and wood as the material to be used in the construction of vessels are obvious and practical. Among the considerations in favor of iron-clad vessels with hulls of wood, are the rapidity with which they can be built, the abundance of material on our whole coast, and the facility with which workmen can be procured. Such vessels, moreover, can be coppered, and thereby retain their speed for a longer period. They will be less affected by a solid shot below the armature or plating, and the fracture made by the shot can be more easily mended. The disadvantages of wooden vessels are, want of strength, as compared with those of iron structure, and the more rapid decay of the material, particularly when covered with iron plating; the action of the immersed iron armor on the copper sheathing near it, causing the copper to become foul and the immersed armor plates to waste; the difficulty of keeping the vessels tight under the armor plates, and the probably greater damage to which they are exposed from shells. On the other hand, the greater strength of iron permits the construction of ships of greater size and finer lines; and having greater internal capacity, they can be at any time inspected in all their parts, are safe from fire, and are better protected from great leaks, as they can have water-tight compartments; their repairs can generally be more easily made, and, from their great durability, they are probably in the end not more costly. An iron vessel, moreover, can be taken from the water and placed on land for preservation, which cannot be done with wooden vessels. The disadvantages of iron vessels are, the serious local weakness of the thin plates composing the bottom of an iron ship; the danger that would result from getting on rocks or submerged obstructions; their liability to rapidly become foul in salt water, whereby their speed becomes greatly impaired, thus requiring to be frequently docked for cleaning; the great danger from a shot striking below the armor plating as they roll; the injury caused by the splinters of iron when the plates are broken or smashed by shot; the corrosion inside from bilge-water; the difficulty in making temporary repairs of shot holes; and the limited number of artisans yet to be procured having skill in this description of employment. It should also be borne in mind that, while we have several navy-yards for building wooden vessels, the Government possesses not a single yard and establishment for constructing those of iron, nor even for making plates and shafting.

While the principal attention of the Department has, in this crisis of our affairs, been necessarily given to present and more pressing necessities, it has, nevertheless, kept in view the important end of establishing our naval power on a permanent basis. Proposals were issued for an iron-clad ship of the largest class, (under the authority contained in the appropriation bills,) but the cost, as shown by the propositions received for a ship of the necessary magnitude, was so great that it was deemed advisable to enter into no contract involving so large an expenditure, except by the express sanction of Congress.

In order, however, that justice should, in some degree, be done to the naval branch of the public service, and that it might be able to sustain its rightful position upon the ocean in the event of a foreign war, the parties competing for the large steamers were invited to make proposals for one of about half the proposed tonnage. One offer made under this invitation, at the most reasonable rate that could be obtained, and which it was deemed the interest of the Government not to exceed, was, with some modifications, accepted.

There are no parties in this country fully prepared to build iron vessels of the magnitude and description proposed, and the present high prices of material and labor unavoidably enhance the cost. The Government itself is unprepared to execute any such work, having no suitable yard and establishment, and is consequently wholly in the hands of private parties, to demand what they think proper, and prescribe their own terms. On former and repeated occasions, and elsewhere in this report, the Department has fully expressed its opinion of this policy and the necessity why the Government should be prepared to build iron vessels, and the necessary machinery, of the largest class.

Besides the turreted vessels for coast defense and large armored ships for naval conflict, we need and should have steamers of high speed constructed of wood, with which to sweep the ocean, and chase and hunt down the vessels of an enemy. Fortunately, we are able to supply ourselves with vessels of this description, and a competent and healthful competition exists for their construction. A large portion of the establishments adapted to the construction of nautical engines have been enlisted by the Department in the manufacture of steam machinery for vessels building at the navy-yards and at private establishments.

NAVY-YARD AND ESTABLISHMENT FOR IRON VESSELS AND MACHINERY.

In consequence of the omission of Congress to take any action on the subject of enlarging the present circumscribed navy-yard at Philadelphia, or to signify its acceptance or rejection of League Island, tendered to the Government for naval purposes by the city of Philadelphia, or in conformity with my suggestions to initiate means for establishing a suitable yard, workshops, and docks for an iron navy and the machinery and armature which modern improvements render necessary, no progress has been possible during the year on that important subject. The Government is destitute of a suitable establishment for the construction or repair of iron vessels, their machinery or armature, nor has it any place for preserving them when laid up in ordinary. Some proper and suitable accommodations for vessels of this description are necessary where there is fresh water, and, as stated in my communications to the last Congress, it has appeared to me that no place combines so many advantages as are to be found on the Delaware, in the vicinity of Philadelphia. A commission of naval and scientific gentlemen was appointed under the authority of Congress to examine League Island, and also to "make a survey and examination of the harbors of New London, Connecticut, and its surroundings, with reference to its capacity and fitness for a naval depot and navy-yard, and whether the public interest will not be promoted by establishing a naval depot and navy-yard in or near said harbor of New London instead of League Island, and that they also make the same investigation in regard to the waters of Narragansett Bay." The majority of this board recommended the establishment of an additional navy-yard at New London. On that subject it is unnecessary that the Department should express an opinion. It is a question for Congress, which instituted the inquiry, to decide whether an additional navy-yard on the old plan is wanted at New London, and should it be in the affirmative, it will be the duty of this Department to carry that decision when made into effect.

But aside from and independent of the question of an additional navy-yard, is that of more extended accommodations and more ample facilities on the Delaware than we now have in the narrow and wholly insufficient limits of the navy-yard at Philadelphia. Those limits, as stated by the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks in his able and practical report, can be enlarged to about double the present area by purchase at an expense of about $300,000; but with that addition the yard would still be wholly inadequate to the public necessities, and too small for such an extensive establishment as the wants of the Government require. It would undoubtedly be the part of wisdom and true economy to procure ground with ample water front for such an establishment as the increasing public wants demand, in the vicinity of Philadelphia, and so soon as it can be made available, to dispose of the present grounds and apply the proceeds towards improving the new location.

The chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, whose experience and judgment entitle his opinions to consideration, suggests another locality than League Island, at Marcus Hook, a few miles below Philadelphia, on the right bank of the Delaware, which he supposes may, perhaps, be procured at a reasonable rate. From the examination which I have been enabled to give this subject, I am not prepared to say that the advantages are, to my mind, such as to counterbalance those attainable at League Island, which has been tendered to the Government for its acceptance, nor is there assurance that land near Marcus Hook can be procured at any price. Either place, however, might, I apprehend, be satisfactory, and, as I have already stated to Congress, there is no doubt that for the purposes of a navy-yard, and establishment for an iron navy and its wants, the banks of the Delaware present advantages that are not to be found elsewhere in the United States. Prompt and judicious action by the legislative branch of the Government upon this subject is, in my judgment, urgently needed, and will, when it shall have been had, be carried into effect by this Department with all possible activity.

NAVAL DEPOT ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

I deem it proper to again allude to the expediency of establishing at no distant day a naval depot, yard, and foundry at some accessible and suitable point on one of the rivers in the valley of the Mississippi. The selection of an appropriate location for this purpose, where vessels can be constructed and repaired, is a question of national importance. The United States have at this time one hundred naval vessels on the Mississippi and its tributaries. Iron and coal, as well as wood, with all the materials for ships-of-war, are abundant, and may be found contiguous to eligible situations.

Steamers of iron will endure for years in fresh water, and the naval vessels which the Government may place on those rivers will be preserved. Should the projected water communication connecting the northern lakes with the great interior rivers by an enlarged ship canal be carried into effect, the Mississippi squadron could be made available for the defense of our northern frontier when circumstances required it.

EDUCATION OF ENGINEERS, ETC.

To attain and maintain our true position as a naval Power, the best talent in the country must be found among the officers who are to conduct the varied operations of the service, and adequate provision to secure such ability and accomplishment should command the attention of those who have charge of our naval affairs. Our Naval School is producing officers of skill, well educated for their profession; yet if our ships and steam machinery are not at the highest attainable point of perfection, and the engineers are not skillful, the education and accomplishment of our officers will be unavailing to give us the naval superiority we should obtain.

By the introduction of steam into naval operations a new corps is ingrafted into the naval service of men combining science with mechanical skill and genius, whose professional attainments and practical power demand the fostering care of the Government. Our naval engineers, like those of the Army, should be thoroughly educated to their profession, for on them the motive power of our vessels and the efficiency of our steam machinery must hereafter depend. Steam engineering should indeed be one of the important studies of all naval officers, and should be taught at the Naval Academy. It would be well to encourage such young men as exhibit aptness for mechanical studies to cultivate their peculiar talents, whether as naval constructors or engineers, in that department in which they can render the highest public service. Other Governments pursue this course, and we shall find our advantage in giving similar encouragement to the young men of our own country.

It is a question, indeed, as sailors are subordinate to steam, whether every officer of the line ought not to be educated to and capable of performing the duties which devolve upon engineers. The means of acquiring practical as well as theoretical knowledge of the subject should be furnished by the Government, and it would be well if every midshipman were to receive instruction in this now important branch of his profession. If the public is not yet prepared to combine what at present are two distinct pursuits, and make every naval officer an engineer as well as a sailor, I would recommend the formation of a class at the Naval Academy of youths, giving a preference to those who may have already evinced mechanical skill and aptitude for engineering, who might be educated with special reference to their profession as engineers. After two years' study they could be received into the corps by conferring on them the appointment of third assistant engineers and assigning them to duty. The naval service and the country have suffered injury that can scarcely be estimated from the want of thorough, capable, and well-educated engineers. Many of our most efficient vessels have been disabled and crippled in the midst of their cruise, and sometimes even at the very commencement of their service, in consequence of the incapacity of the engineers, whereby the country has been deprived not only of the use of the vessel for weeks and sometimes even for months, but the officers and crew have been constrained to inactivity, instead of being employed against the enemy. Some measures are necessary to correct and prevent these disasters, so injurious to the country, and I know of none so thorough and complete as that of publicly educating and training engineers to the service. The most important branch of study at the Naval Academy is, very appropriately, seamanship. A general knowledge of the application and use of steam and of practical mechanics should follow as almost equally essential. Line officers of the Navy, of whatever rank, should, moreover, have the privilege of attending lectures and pursuing the study of steam, mechanics, and, indeed, every branch that may be taught at the Naval Academy, and it is recommended that arrangements be made for carrying into effect these suggestions.

Having recommended the enlistment and training of boys for the Navy, I deem it scarcely less important to suggest the policy of giving employment to our seamen in time of peace. Our commercial marine and fisheries have been and are valuable nurseries for sailors, on which the Government must rely in time of war for such additions as may be necessary to its force of thorough-bred naval seamen. But to build up and sustain a navy that shall be capable of asserting and maintaining the rights and honor of the country, the Government, in peace as well as in war, must foster that hardy and adventurous class who, in every conflict, at home and abroad, have always gallantly upheld the flag. A formidable navy at the commencement of our present difficulties would have caused foreign nations to abstain from aiding the rebels and brought the war to a speedy conclusion. Why might not the Government, in time of peace, employ its own fast steamers for ocean mail service, and, perhaps, other important transportation, such as carrying specie and packages of small bulk but high value? A slight armament of few guns on national vessels would be sufficient to exercise the men and to give character and security to the ship. Fronting as our country does on the two great oceans, this system would insure to us, first, vessels built and ready, at all times, for fighting purposes; second, an organization of able and efficient officers, with well trained and educated seamen, actively employed and always ready for naval service; third, rapid mail communication with different parts of the world; the whole furnishing a nucleus for the Navy, where both its officers and better class of seamen would be constantly improving and fitting themselves for the highest public usefulness. No better school or training could be instituted for modern naval warfare, when seamanship is so much in advance of that which prevailed when only sailing vessels were known to the Navy. Such a system would, besides being a nursery for the Navy, contribute to the expansion of our commerce, which it would stimulate and encourage, and with which it would not come in competition. Under it the naval and merchant service would fraternize and be educated together when the country is at peace, and in time of war would combine the power of both for national purposes. Such employment of our national vessels would conduce to the interests of peace. These suggestions are intended to invite the attention of Congress to the important subject of establishing some system for the permanent benefit of the Navy after the present hostilities have ceased.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS—PROMOTIONS, ETC.

The important service rendered by volunteer officers, and the courage and skill displayed by them, as also their adaptation to the profession, commends them to the consideration of Congress. While it cannot be expected, and would not be desirable, to incorporate permanently into the Navy all who hold temporary appointments, there are among them some whose abilities and worth should not be lost to the service. Those who have served long and faithfully, and by their conduct, zeal, and ability merit it, should be promoted to volunteer lieutenant commanders, and a limited number of volunteer officers might be brought into the line.

It would doubtless conduce to the benefit of the service, were officers of the line to undergo an examination for promotion to successive grades after leaving the Academy, until they attain the rank of commander. Such a regulation would avoid the necessity for retiring boards, and be an incentive to excellence, and a just reward to those who strive to acquire professional knowledge after graduating from the Academy and entering on their career of active duty. Such a rule is established with the engineer corps and medical officers, and is productive of beneficial results. A like rule should be established with assistant paymasters, who ought not to be promoted until after the ordeal of an examination.

Suitable means should be taken to receive, prepare, and train boys for the naval service. For this purpose one of the old ships of the line, now useless for cruising, might be stationed at some suitable place, perhaps at the Naval Academy, where boys between the ages of twelve and eighteen might be enlisted and educated as seamen. The sons of sailors and others in the public naval and military service, should be entitled to consideration for admittance to this school-ship; and it would be well to select annually from those most proficient, at least five to be transferred to the Naval Academy as midshipmen. The same ship might, if judged expedient, also answer for such a gunnery-practice vessel as has been frequently recommended by the Bureau of Ordnance.

PIRATICAL ROVERS.

The recognition of the rebels as belligerents by the principal maritime Powers at the commencement of hostilities, gave strength and character to the insurrection, which it could never have had but for that recognition. A declaration of neutrality between the belligerents went abroad from Governments with which we were in amity, carrying with it the semblance of fairness, but which, in its operation, is most unjust towards this Government and country. The United States had an extensive commerce which penetrated every sea, while the rebels were without commerce or ships. The United States had a navy and squadrons on almost every ocean; the rebels had not a single armed vessel at home or abroad. With a full knowledge of these facts, the principal maritime Powers of Europe hastened to recognize the rebels as belligerents, and to declare that both the belligerents should be treated alike in their ports; that the public armed vessels of neither should remain more than twenty-four hours in their harbors, nor receive supplies or assistance, except such as might be absolutely necessary to carry them home, and for three months thereafter they should not again receive supplies in any of the ports of those Governments. While this proclaimed neutrality did not affect a single ship of the rebels, for they had not one to be affected, it excluded the naval vessels of the United States from the ports of the principal maritime Powers throughout the world, except under the restrictions enumerated.

When the Sumter, a vessel stolen from our merchants, made her escape and went abroad armed, but without a recognized nationality, to seize and destroy our merchantmen upon the high seas, she found, unlike the Algerine corsairs, refuge and protection within the maritime jurisdiction of the great European Powers with whom the United States were in friendship; and finally, after being followed by our cruisers into the harbor of Gibraltar, she was permitted by the authorities to remain not only twenty-four hours, but more than twelve months, and was eventually transferred to an English purchaser, went to an English port, was refitted, and left the English shores with a contraband cargo, and has since run the blockade, carrying supplies to the rebels.

The Alabama, the Florida, the Georgia, are armed cruisers built in England, have an English armament on board, and are manned by crews who are almost exclusively European. Sailing sometimes under the English and sometimes under the rebel flag, these rovers, without a port of their own which they can enter, or to which they can send a single prize for adjudication, have roamed the seas, capturing and destroying the commercial ships of a nation at peace with Great Britain and France; but yet, when these corsairs have needed repairs or supplies they have experienced no difficulty in procuring them, because it had been deemed expedient to recognize the rebels as belligerents. Not one of the many vessels captured by these rovers has ever been judicially condemned as a legal capture. Wanton destruction has been the object and purpose of the captors, who have burnt and destroyed the property of their merchant victims.

This theory of recognizing rebels as belligerents so soon as they lift their arms against the Government, and thus declaring them entitled to national privileges on the high seas and in the harbors of the world, although without a port or navy of their own, is the inauguration of a new policy in the history of nations. For a long succession of years it has been an important point in the progress of civilization, and particularly among the maritime Powers, that the police of the seas should be guarded and maintained by the subjection of captures to the adjudication of tribunals administering the law of nations, which receive from the hands of the captor his prize into the custody of that law to be disposed of by its rules; but the course pursued in fostering and giving encouragement to the rebel robbers who, without a recognized national flag or a port at their command, or any means of bringing their captures to judgment, are committing their predatory acts, is a restoration of that Algerine and Tripolitan system which long afflicted the civilized world, but which, under the lead of our Government, was exterminated in the early part of the present century.

Thus far these rovers have escaped capture. While in the West Indies they were protected whenever they were enabled to flee into a neutral port, or get within a marine league of the shore of a neutral Government—a privilege that was never in any quarter extended to the Mediterranean corsairs. Unfortunately, most of the colonial authorities, and no inconsiderable portion of the population of the European dependencies, influenced by the professed neutrality which elevated insurgents, and sought to degrade the national authority to an equality with them, were in sympathy with the predatory rovers, and, while lending them aid and often furnishing them with information, interposed obstacles and manifested unfriendly feelings to the lawful operations of the naval forces of the Union.

Compelled, as we have been, to withdraw to a great extent our foreign squadrons, in order to establish and enforce the blockade, the commerce of the United States, spread abroad upon every sea, has been annoyed, and often plundered and destroyed, by these unlicensed rovers. With none of the nobler attributes of gallant and daring qualities which characterize naval warriors, and particularly the American sailor, these robbers of the sea shun a naval antagonist. Their prowess exhibits itself in plundering peaceful commerce, and their victims have been unarmed merchantmen. Traversing the seas as they do, without a country of their own to which they can resort, it has been difficult to trace or meet them; and thus far they have, with the shelter and assistance of Governments which recognize them as belligerents and equals, managed to elude our cruisers.

Their early operations were in the West Indies, where we have an extended commerce, and where they had coadjutors among those foreign adventurers who were engaged in illicit traffic, and sympathizers in a large portion of the colonial authorities. To protect our interests in that quarter, and especially to guard the treasure-ships in their transit to and from Aspinwall, a flying squadron was established in the autumn of 1862, and placed under the command of Acting Rear Admiral Wilkes. That officer, by his energy and decision, contributed to break up one of the several lines of illicit traders organized to carry supplies to the rebels in ships ostensibly bound to Matamoras, but with cargoes having a contingent destination to Texas. While, however, he displayed efficiency in seizing that class of blockade-runners, and was successful in breaking up one of the many cunningly contrived arrangements, he failed to capture the piratical rovers.

The Department, anticipating that the Alabama and her associates would find it necessary to abandon the neighborhood of the Antilles, and satisfied of the direction they would then take, ordered the Vanderbilt, a fast steamer, on independent cruising duty, first in the West Indies, and then onward to the south. The orders to Commander Baldwin, of the Vanderbilt, under date of January 27, 1863, were: "When you are perfectly satisfied that the Alabama has left the Gulf or the West Indies and gone to some other locality, you will proceed along the coast of Brazil to Fernando Noronho and Rio de Janeiro, making inquiries at such places as you may think advisable. From Rio continue your course to the Cape of Good Hope," &c., &c.

In derogation of these special and explicit orders, Acting Rear Admiral Wilkes, on falling in with the Vanderbilt, transferred his flag to that vessel, and, attaching her to his squadron, detained her in his possession so long as to defeat the object and purpose of the Department. He did not release her until the 13th of June, when Commander Baldwin proceeded to carry out his instructions, but he was too late. He arrived at Fernando Noronho on the 4th of July, at Pernambuco on the 6th, and at Rio de Janeiro on the 14th; thence he proceeded, on the 2d of August, to St. Helena, instead of going direct to the Cape of Good Hope. The unfortunate detention of the Vanderbilt wholly defeated the plans of the Department for the capture of the Alabama, Florida, and Georgia. They, as the Department anticipated, arrived in those latitudes and visited those ports in May; but the Vanderbilt, instead of being there to receive them, as the Department intended, was improperly retained in the West Indies until after that period.

In addition to the few vessels stationed abroad to guard our national interests, others have from time to time been dispatched in pursuit of the rovers, all of which were built in and have gone abroad from foreign ports to prey upon our commerce. The details of all the measures which have been adopted by the Department in this view it is not necessary here to disclose. But with most of our naval vessels engaged in enforcing the blockade, and without a clue to guide our independent cruisers on the trackless ocean, they have thus far been unable to encounter these semi-piratical vessels, which always seek to evade a naval antagonist. Were the probabilities greater than they are, however, of encountering them, and were our public naval vessels permitted to enter the ports of the maritime Powers for fuel and other supplies when in pursuit, it would not promote the interests of commerce nor the welfare of the country to relax the blockade for that object. We have, however, no excess of seamen, nor even a sufficient supply for the immediate and imperative duties that are pressing upon us, and although it would be inexpedient to make public all the means that are taken and causes that control the action of the Government, it may not be improper to state that one of our largest and fastest steamers, destined for foreign service, has been detained for months in consequence of an inadequate supply of seamen to man her. Other vessels are also short of their complement.

SEAMEN.

The operation of the draft has been, in some respects, detrimental to the naval service. No exemption of sailors or mariners having been provided for in the acts of the last Congress, these men, who may be deemed and are experts, fostered and cherished by all Governments, and of whom no sufficient supply can be obtained, are liable to be withdrawn from the element to which they have been educated, and where they properly belong, and compelled to serve as soldiers. In this respect not only a hardship is inflicted on the men, but the Navy and the country are injured. It has been the wise policy of the Government at all times to encourage and cherish its supply of seamen. By express provision of the act of May, 1792, "all mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States" were exempted from militia duty. Bounties have been paid to the fishermen, and by former laws, not only men-of-war-men, but all mariners, have been exempt from militia service, it being considered that they performed an equivalent duty, or were liable to be absent when a draft took place. Under the recent enactment petty officers, acting engineers, and others indispensable to a ship's complement and efficiency, have, as well as seamen, been subject to the draft while on shipboard and in naval service. Some of them on distant stations have been enrolled, drafted, and put to great inconvenience in their efforts to obtain relief, not unfrequently subjecting their commander and the seamen themselves to embarrassment. It certainly could not have been intended by Congress that persons in actual service afloat should be withdrawn from the Navy, where they were faithfully discharging indispensable duties, and then be compelled, under the penalties of the law, to go into the Army.

In enforcing the draft on any community which has furnished a large number of sailors, proper deductions ought doubtless to be made from the quota required for the Army. Of the thirty-four thousand seamen in the naval service a large proportion are from the maritime towns on the seaboard. A committee of the township of Gloucester, in Massachusetts, in addressing this Department on the subject, state that their township alone has furnished to the Army over thirteen hundred soldiers, an excess of more than one hundred beyond the number required; but in addition to these they have given to the Navy about six hundred sailors; yet under the new call for volunteers no allowance is made for seamen who have enlisted. As a community they are entitled to relief for the men that they have supplied to the Navy, and so with other places similarly situated. Unless these facts are rightly considered and acted upon, the existing law will tend to the prejudice of the Navy, for every community will encourage its men to go into the Army at the expense of the Navy, because there is no relief or credit or mitigation of the draft in consequence of enlistments in the naval service. In another respect the laws are in their effects made to operate to the prejudice of the Navy. The high bounties for enlistments into the Army induce many sailors to enlist as soldiers, although their services would be vastly more useful to the country on the element to which they have been trained and accustomed. The result is, that there are many seamen in the Army, serving as soldiers, who have been drafted, or drawn thither by bounties or other causes, who desire to be transferred to the Navy, and have frequently made application to that effect, but it is understood that the law does not authorize such transfer. As it is difficult to procure educated, trained, and able seamen in such numbers as are wanted, and skillful and experienced sailors are worth more to the country in the Navy than they can be in the Army, it would be productive of great benefit if the law authorized such transfer to be made. No well-directed efforts should be spared to increase our naval strength, for it is mainly on the ocean that our rightful position as a nation is to be secured and maintained. The sailor is always and everywhere true to his flag. When, in the early days of the rebellion, the recreant officers in numbers deserted the Government to which they owed and had sworn allegiance, they could not shake the loyalty and fidelity of the crews. These remained faithful to the flag under whose folds they had carried into every sea and to every clime the honor and power of the Republic. It has been the policy of every commercial country to extend encouragement and give strength to the navy which protects its commerce. Such should be our clear and unquestionable policy. Under the extraordinary expansion of our Navy and the pressing demand for seamen, it is a public duty not only to permit those seamen who are in the Army to be transferred, but to encourage such transfers, and at the same time, in so far as may be possible, to make the inducements to enter the naval service at all times fully equal to those offered to soldiers on their enlistment. No nation, and least of all the United States, can wisely strengthen its Army by weakening its naval power.

Unfortunately for the country, the disunion element which for some years gave direction to public affairs, so shaped the measures of Government as to keep down and cripple our Navy. Aware that it was a branch of the service which could have no sympathy in a denationalizing or disunion scheme, or be made subject to rebel control; knowing, moreover, that there were no sailors in the disaffected region, these men, in anticipation of their insurrectionary movements, and in their whole policy and action, were hostile to the Navy. But the changed condition of affairs, the loyalty of our sailors, the great service which the Navy has everywhere rendered in the cause of the Union, and its importance for our peace and security abroad and at home, demand it should have all due encouragement.

The number of seamen in service on the 1st of July last, including the Mississippi squadron, was about 34,000. The number of enlistments from January 1 to October 1 was 19,000, mostly landsmen. From causes, to some of which allusion has already been made, the difficulty of procuring a sufficient number of seamen for the increase of the service has been great, and at times vessels have been detained and unable to proceed to sea for the want of crews. The lack of sufficient seamen arises from no diminution in the monthly number of enlistments, but from the increased wants of the service. During the year 1862 the average number of enlistments was 1,529 per month. During the present year the average has been over 2,000 per month. Unfortunately, the policy which it has been deemed necessary to pursue is such as in its effect to weaken the Navy by offering extraordinary bounties to soldiers, by subjecting mariners to the Army draft, without permitting them to enter the Navy if they desired to do so, and by omitting to make any provision to relieve from its operation those communities which furnish the seamen to man our ships. The large bounties offered by the General and State Governments, and often also by the local municipal authorities, as inducements to enter the land service, have had the effect of enticing into that service many professional seamen, who, but for those extraordinary inducements, would have enlisted in the Navy. Towns on the sea-coast, where the population is to a great extent of a maritime character, as I have specified in a single instance, have been obliged to furnish their quota for Army service, thus largely diminishing the number from whom naval enlistments would naturally be expected.

The proclamation of September last must, from these causes and the operation of our laws, still further draw upon the limited number whose proper field is upon the ocean, and who should by every dictate of policy be encouraged by the Government to enter the Navy, instead of being enticed from it by pecuniary bounties or forcibly withdrawn by draft. Besides the exhausting governmental influence adverted to, we are compelled to meet the high prices and active competition of commercial enterprise.

The present and prospective difficulty of procuring seamen in numbers sufficient to man our ships is such as to call for the action of Congress. Our legislation should not be in its effects detrimental to that branch of the public service which it is the policy of every wise Government to promote. Were as large a bounty to be paid to those who enlist in the Navy as to those who enter the Army; were the quota of towns and communities under any call for the increase of the national forces, to be credited with the men furnished to the Navy; and were seamen who may be drafted permitted the choice of entering either the land or naval service, the Navy would be relieved of serious embarrassment. There is no draft, and there can be none, to reinforce the Navy as there may be to supply the Army. While every able and sound man of proper age can be made a soldier and put into immediate service, there are comparatively few of our population who can be employed as sailors. The latter may be considered experts, and instead of bounties, allurements, or drafts to withdraw seamen from the element to which they belong, the reverse should be the fact. Our mariners have given marked and distinctive superiority to the cause of the Union in this contest. The rebels have some naval officers of reputation and ability, but not sailors. Yet that branch of the service which in this and in every war must give character and nationality to the country, has been, is, and will be subjected to embarrassments and deprived of a portion of its legitimate effective force by the operation of existing laws. The whole subject being of great importance in every respect, is commended to the early and considerate action of Congress.

NAVAL ACADEMY.

The Naval Academy, which at the commencement of the insurrection was removed from Annapolis, is still continued at Newport, Congress having taken no measures relative to its permanent location. The total number of midshipmen on the 12th of November was 463. Of these, 208, standing highest in academic rank, are quartered on shore in buildings rented for the purpose. The residue are on board the school-ships Santee and Constitution, the junior class being on the latter ship.

The Macedonian, which has her full battery on board, is moored near the school-ships. All the midshipmen are stationed at quarters on board her, and exercise at stated times at divisions and general quarters, in the most thorough and careful manner.

In consequence of the reduction of the number of the officers at the period when the Navy was expanding, it became important that the full complement of midshipmen should be appointed, and permits were therefore issued one year ago to supply deficiencies caused by the rebellion. A similar course has been adopted the present year, in order that the Government shall not be deprived of its legal quota of properly educated naval officers, by reason of the insurrection.

38TH CONG., 1ST SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

For a period the pressure for trained officers was so great that volunteer appointments were conferred on those who left the Academy and the regular service, but the example and influence were thought to be unfavorable, and the practice was therefore discontinued. No appointments of this description have knowingly been made during the current year.

The annual board of visitors for the Naval Academy for 1863 convened at Newport, Rhode Island, on the 18th of May, and were engaged until the 1st of June in witnessing the examination of the several classes of midshipmen and in inspecting the police and management of the institution. In consideration of the importance of the Academy to the public service, and the interest naturally felt in its management, it was thought proper to associate some gentlemen in civil life from different parts of the country with the naval officers upon the board of visitors, and the board was accordingly composed of Rear Admiral L. M. Goldsborough, Hon. Edward Everett and Charles Eames, Sidney Brooks, Esq., Commodore H. K. Hoff, C. H. Cathcart, and Jacob Baile, Esqs., and Commodore R. B. Hitchcock. In their full and carefully considered report, the members of the board unanimously expressed a high and even unanticipated degree of satisfaction with the accommodations of the students, both on shipboard and on shore, with the organization of the commissariat and supply departments, with the sanitary regulations of the establishment, and its discipline and government, and with the various professional exercises of the midshipmen afloat and ashore. From what they saw of the field exercises, they were convinced that ample instruction is given and adequate proficiency acquired at the institution to enable the young officers to train and command crews of seamen for efficient co-operation with a military force of infantry or artillery on land, and in the practical departments of professional education the instruction given to the students, and the skill exhibited by them, merited their highest commendation.

They regard the whole system of superintendence, police, and discipline under the present management of the institution as one of its most admirable features, and evidence was presented to them showing the abundant willingness of the authorities of the city of Newport to cooperate with the government of the Academy in the endeavor to remove the temptations which are apt to beset the footsteps of youth. In their personal intercourse with the students, the board say that they were much impressed by their habitually gentlemanlike manners and well-bred style of demeanor.

In the removal of the Academy temporarily to the quarters at Newport, it is the opinion of the board there has been no perceptible diminution of its efficiency or the good order of its discipline. The quartering of the students on shipboard during at least the first year of their attendance is approved of, and is said to possess unquestionable advantages in the management of the institution. In the general plan and organization of the Academy, the board think it will compare favorably with the best naval schools in the world.

Several recommendations are made by the board, and among them, provision for thorough instruction, both theoretical and practical, in steam engineering. Upon an invitation from the municipal authorities of Newport, they visited Coaster's Harbor Island, which has been offered by that city to the Government as a permanent site for the Naval Academy. Without expressing an opinion as to the expediency of permanently removing the Academy from Annapolis, the board deemed it proper to say, that in the event of such removal, they considered the island in question admirably adapted for the purpose indicated.

Upon the occasion of the delivering of diplomas to the graduating class, the Hon. Edward Everett, at the request of the superintendent and officers of the Academy, and at the instance of his associates, addressed a public valedictory discourse to the assembled classes, which, in its comprehensive and statesmanlike appreciation of the position and influence of the institution, its patriotic spirit, and characteristic eloquence, cannot but have a salutary influence, and at the request of the board it has been published.

ORDNANCE.

The present condition of our naval ordnance, as presented in the report of the chief ad interim of that bureau, will be read with interest. It exhibits a gratifying advance in that department of the service since the commencement of the rebellion, and furnishes evidence that in general efficiency we are in a condition to maintain a standing at least equal to that of any other Power. Aided by private enterprise, the necessities of the country, which were great, have been surmounted, and, dispensing with the old artillery to which we for a time were compelled to resort, our naval vessels have now an armament worthy of the service.

The suggestions embraced in the report of the Chief of Ordnance are commended to the consideration of Congress, and those which relate to the magazines and a gunnery ship are entitled to special regard.

PRIZES.

The number of vessels captured by the squadrons and reported to the Department to the 1st of November is 1,045, classified as follows: schooners, 547; steamers, 179; sloops, 131; brigs, 30; barques, 26; ships, 15; yachts and small boats, 117. This is exclusive of a large number destroyed on the Mississippi and other rivers and on the coast. A table giving their names, dates of capture, and other particulars, is appended to this report.

At the close of the war of 1812 there were 301 vessels, including armed gunboats and tenders, in the Navy, and the entire number of captures of armed and unarmed vessels made by them was 291. Five hundred and seventeen commissioned privateers were afloat during the war, and their captures numbered 1,428—making the total number of captures by public and private vessels 1,719.

The value of prizes sent to the courts for adjudication since the blockade was established is not less than $13,000,000. The value of those already condemned, and of which notice has been received at the Department, is $6,538,683 40; the expenses have been $607,407 64, leaving for distribution $5,897,970 36, as appears by the following table:

	No. of cases.	Gross amount of sales.	Costs and expenses.	Net amount for distribution.
Boston	13	$964,329 15	$25,188 44	$939,140 71
New York	89	2,218,553 29	281,102 07	1,937,451 21
Philadelphia	57	1,850,434 76	149,806 06	1,700,628 70
Key West	71	1,423,523 30	133,291 55	1,290,231 75
Washington	44	72,001 62	11,960 12	60,041 50
Illinois	11	91,619 28	5,393 40	86,225 88
Total	285	$6,538,683 40	$607,407 64	$5,897,970 36

* The sum of $39,115 73 allowed to claimants by decree of court.

One half of the net proceeds arising from the sale of prizes is by law set apart as a fund for the payment of naval pensions. The pension-roll on the 6th of November last amounted to $159,812 55, and the estimated increase during the remaining eight months of the fiscal year is $32,570. The moiety of prize money dedicated as a pension fund, and now accumulating, should be made a permanent investment in registered Government securities. Were such the case, it is believed that the annual interest would be sufficient to meet all liabilities for naval pensions. At least $2,500,000 can now be invested without interfering with the prompt payment of pensions. I recommend that the fund now on hand be made permanent, and that hereafter, whenever the amount shall reach $100,000, at least one half shall be invested in registered Government securities bearing six per cent. interest.

BOUNTIES FOR DESTRUCTION OF ENEMIES' VESSELS.

The fourth section of the "Act for the better government of the Navy," approved July 17, 1862, provides "that a bounty shall be paid by the United States for each person on board any ship or vessel of war belonging to an enemy at the commencement of an engagement, which shall be sunk or otherwise destroyed in such engagement by any ship or vessel belonging to the United States, or which it may be necessary to destroy in consequence of injuries sustained in action, of $100, if the enemy's vessel was of inferior force, and of $200 if of equal or superior force; to be divided among the officers and crew in the same manner as prize money."

Since the enactment of this law there have been repeated cases in which the right to the bounty has accrued to the officers and crews of vessels of the Navy, particularly on the western waters; but there being no appropriations to which the expenditure could properly be charged, the claims to the bounty have remained unsettled, and the just expectations of those entitled to the reward have been disappointed. The amount necessary to pay the claims which have accrued would probably not exceed $250,000; and it is desirable that an early provision be made for the payment of this just debt. In the event of an appropriation for the purpose, a board will be appointed by the Department for the examination of the claims, or they may be ascertained in any other manner which Congress may be pleased to direct.

PRIZE LAW.

The interest of the naval service in the distribution of prize money, and the duties imposed by law upon this Department in that connection, have necessarily drawn its attention to the present state of our legislation upon the whole subject. It is not doubtful, in my judgment, that some modification of existing laws, and some additional legislation in relation to prize proceedings and the distribution of the proceeds of prizes, are necessary. The several statutes now in force upon the subject appear to have been, in some of their provisions, hastily drawn, and they certainly fail to embody and carry into effect, with due promptness and convenience, a consistent and well-defined public policy. It is my purpose, at an early day, to communicate to Congress, through its appropriate committee, the views which I entertain as to the defects of our present laws in relation to prizes, and to suggest such remedy in legislation as the interests of the public service seem to require.

FLEET ENGINEERS AND PAYMASTERS.

The large increase of our naval force, and the organization and size of squadrons, have made it necessary to detail certain officers to duty for which no legal provision has been made. By the act of 1828, the appointment of a surgeon of a fleet was authorized. At that time there was not a steam vessel in the Navy, whereas we have now five others. Under this change the necessity of a fleet engineer is, to say the least, quite as urgent as that of fleet surgeon. A fleet paymaster is also required for each of the squadrons, and will contribute to true economy, and the correct management of the financial and property accounts of the squadrons. As the express legal authorization of these officers, who are now detailed by regulation of the Department, will cause no increase of salary, I would invite the required legislation to sanction the appointment of a fleet engineer and fleet paymaster for the respective squadrons.

The appointments of acting assistant paymasters provide for an existing necessity, but it will be advisable to increase the corps of regular paymasters above the present limited number, either now or on the general reorganization which must take place at the close of hostilities.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

MARINE CORPS.

Difficulty has been experienced in keeping up a full complement of marines in consequence of the high bounties paid for Army recruits. Many whose time has expired, though preferring to remain with their old corps, have been induced by extraordinary bounties to enter the Army. It has not been the policy of this Department to resort to the system of bounties for either the marine or naval service, but circumstances may render it necessary.

The colonel commandant recommends that the corps, which, when full, consists of three thousand men, should be increased to three thousand five hundred. This increase would not be an undue proportion to the naval increase; but a large portion of the vessels now in commission are of a description that do not require a marine guard. If, therefore, the corps were full, the present number would probably be sufficient for present requirements. On a few important occasions a battalion has been detailed for Army duty; but the want of equipments and other causes render their employment in a service to which they are not drilled, and to which they do not belong, a question of doubtful expediency. It is a question, indeed, whether it would not be better in every respect to attach the corps permanently to the Navy or the Army, and make it exclusively subject to the control of one or the other branch of service, instead of occupying an equivocal position as regards both.

The discipline of the corps is excellent, and among its officers are some who would do credit to any service. It is earnestly recommended by the colonel commandant that justice to the corps requires that its chief should hold corresponding rank with other officers who have like command. I have heretofore respectfully submitted this subject to the consideration of Congress.

COAST SURVEY.

It is due to the officers connected with the coast survey that the assistance which they have given to our squadrons should be acknowledged. The value of the information which they have furnished our blockading forces throughout the war cannot be overestimated. Not only on the coast, but on the great interior rivers, they have aided the service, and promoted its efficiency and its intelligent action. Rear Admiral Porter expresses his great obligation to a small coast survey party that accompanied the Mississippi squadron, for the maps and sketches which were used by him, and consulted by the Army officers in guiding their operations. They were constantly employed in delineating the face of the country, gaining topographical and hydrographical knowledge, compiling maps, and sketching, when the maps were found to be erroneous. The squadron would have been sometimes embarrassed without them. War cannot be successfully carried on without good maps, and the general or admiral who has the best charts will have an advantage which will go far to insure success.

LIGHTS AND SIGNALS AT SEA.

With the view of preventing collisions at sea, some alterations and improvements have been made in the description of lights and signals to be used, and also in the rules and regulations to be observed by sea-going vessels when approaching each other. Heretofore there has not been uniformity in these respects, and disasters have been the consequence. In order that the law and practice may be universal among maritime nations, the Governments of Great Britain and France prepared a set of rules and regulations, which have been submitted to the various maritime Powers, and to which the attention of this Government was invited the early part of the present year. These rules, being very nearly those which had governed the usage of sea-service, instructions were issued to our naval officers to conform to them. But these instructions are mere departmental regulations, and do not extend to vessels in the merchant service. In order to carry them into effect, and give them the force of international maritime law, some legislative sanction seems to be necessary. It is also desirable these rules should apply to vessels in the merchant service, and all vessels on our rivers and inland waters should be required to conform to them.

DEFENSE OF PORTSMOUTH NAVY-YARD.

The exposed condition of the navy-yard and public property at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, requiring protection, and there having been no garrison for the defense of that place, additional measures to insure its safety became necessary. Eleven 8-inch guns were accordingly mounted on the old breastworks on Seavey's Island, in front of the navy-yard, and five guns of the same caliber in the yard itself; and as there were no marines or soldiers to man them, one hundred contrabands were enlisted at Fortress Monroe, and sent North for that purpose. They are in charge of naval officers, and are being drilled in the use of heavy ordnance.

THE BAINBRIDGE.

Following the practice in similar cases heretofore, and with a view to such action as Congress may deem proper, I take this occasion of bringing to your notice, and that of the country, the loss of the United States brig Bainbridge. This brig, under command of Acting Master T. J. Dwyer, sailed from New York on the 14th of August for Port Royal, South Carolina, and, from the statement of one of her crew, who was picked up at sea, and claimed to be the only survivor, the unfortunate vessel capsized in a gale off Cape Hatteras, on the 21st of August. No further tidings of the brig or those who were on board of her having been received, and in view of the time that has elapsed, there seems to be no doubt of her loss with all on board, except the seaman referred to. It rests with Congress to fix a day upon which the vessel shall be regarded as having been lost, in order that the accounts of those who perished may be properly adjusted, and to make proper provision for the families of those who shared the fate of the Bainbridge.

CONTRACTS.

The system of making annual contracts under existing laws, by advertisement and award to the lowest bidder, is attended with many difficulties and embarrassments, and often with loss to the Government. To a great extent the fair and honest dealer is excluded, or deterred from competition, by the devices of the less scrupulous, who resort to contrivances to evade the law, and secure to themselves the contracts. It is the object of the Government to obtain good articles, at a fair price, and the laws were intended to secure this result; but by combinations, fictitious bids, proposals from irresponsible persons, and various artful schemes, the object of the laws is defeated, and the means which were intended by Congress to guard the rights of the fair dealer and the public interest are perverted, to the injury of both.

When proposals are made to furnish the Government with supplies at prices below the market value, as is done in many cases, the transaction indicates fraud. Contractors do not intend to make losing contracts with the Government, and fair and responsible dealers do not make such proposals. Such men are driven from competition by these improper practices. The law, however, permits no alternative but the acceptance of the lowest offer, regardless of the character of the individual who makes it, or the devices he practices.

Were the subject of purchases confided to the respective bureaus, under sanction of the Department, the Government would, I am confident, be better and generally more economically served. A degree of discretion can be entrusted to those officers, who are men of integrity and responsible to the Government, to discharge this duty with fidelity.

ADVANCE IN WAGES.

The enhanced prices in every department of business, and even in the necessities of life, operate with peculiar hardship on many who are in the Government service. In some instances, where there is a fixed legal compensation, the circumstances of the times have so changed values that the remuneration received is scarcely sufficient for the subsistence of those who are in the employ of the Government. The subject is one that peculiarly addresses itself to Congress; and it may be worthy of consideration whether an advance of twenty-five per cent. upon their present compensation ought not in these cases to be made, to continue until one year after the close of the war. In the navy-yards, and public and private establishments generally, as large or larger advance has been made to the mechanics and other employees.

EXPENSES AND ESTIMATES.

The appropriations made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1863, were.....$71,587,052 09
Expenses of the Department during same time.....63,211,105 27

Leaving an unexpended balance of....$8,375,946 82

This amount will, however, be absorbed in the completion and armament of vessels under contract and the payment of other liabilities incurred prior to the close of the fiscal year.

The expenditures have embraced, besides the ordinary disbursements for the naval establishment, the construction, in whole or in part, and the repair, of seventy-one iron-clad vessels on the Atlantic and western waters, the purchasing, repairs, and alterations of three hundred and sixty vessels, as well as the charter money for the ordinary service, and for the search after piratical vessels on the coast.

The estimates submitted for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, are as follows:

Pay of the Navy.....	$19,423,241 00
Construction and repair of steam machinery.....	39,382,000 00
Construction and repair of vessels.....	32,575,000 00
Construction of armor-plated sea steamers.....	18,600,000 00
Ordnance and magazines.....	8,603,946 00
Fuel, hemp, and equipment of vessels.....	7,540,000 00
Provisions and clothing.....	6,915,665 00
Contingent and miscellaneous.....	3,869,850 00
Navy-yards and superintendents.....	2,558,458 00
Marine corps.....	1,445,321 85
Surgeons' necessaries and hospitals.....	358,500 00
Tables of navigation, nautical instruments, and Naval Academy.....	366,673 55

These estimates are large, but they are made upon a war basis, and the present extraordinary cost of material and labor renders a corresponding increase of estimates necessary. On the assumption that the war will continue—and no other rule is a safe one—large additions are to be made to our naval force, and the hard service to which all our squadrons are subjected makes the repair and refitment expensive.

A considerable portion of this expenditure will be an investment for value received, and the vessels and property will remain on hand when the rebellion shall be suppressed. The efficient naval vessels will continue to constitute the armed naval power that will be used to vindicate and defend our national rights, or may be considered an economical investment to insure peace. Such vessels as may not be adapted to naval ocean service can be sold to the merchant marine, from which many of them were procured. Whatever sums may be expended for docks, yards, buildings, machinery, &c., will be permanent investments for the country.

CONCLUSION.

In concluding this report, it is with sincere gratification that I acknowledge the able and efficient aid which I have received in the performance of my official duties from the gentlemen who, in their several grades, have been associated with me in this Department. I have, on former occasions, expressed my high appreciation of the services of the Assistant Secretary and of the several chiefs of bureaus, whose interesting reports are appended. Additional experience only confirms this favorable opinion. I commend, also, the faithful and satisfactory manner in which the largely augmented clerical labors of the Department have been performed. It has fallen to me to conduct the affairs of this Department during a period of trial and sacrifice, in the course of which our country, by an effort which challenges the admiration of the world, has not only created a naval power, but has successfully applied that power in the most arduous naval enterprise ever undertaken. When under such circumstances, devoting all my energies to the duties of my position, and meeting all its grave responsibilities to the best of my ability, I have been constantly cheered and sustained by the assured conviction that the Navy of the United States has achieved a great and new historical renown; that it has expanded and is expanding in a measure commensurate with the exigencies of the country and of the times; that it has done and is doing heroic service in a great and sacred cause, and that its force is wielded by a body of officers and men who have established the highest claim to the gratitude of their country.

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

To the PRESIDENT.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, December 5, 1863.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that manuscript copies of the several reports and accompanying documents from the bureau and other subordinate offices of this Department for the current year, which it has hitherto been customary to communicate to the two Houses of Congress with the annual message, have been placed in the hands of the Superintendent of the Public Printing, in obedience to the requirements of the joint resolution "to expedite the printing of the President's message and accompanying documents," approved the 3d of March, 1863.

For information in detail as to the operations of the public land system, reference is made and attention specially invited to the comprehensive and able report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. It will be seen from it that the quantity of land disposed of during the last fiscal year, for cash, by the location of bounty land warrants, as swamp and overflowed land, for railroad purposes, and under the homestead law, was 2,966,698.43 acres, as against 1,377,922 acres disposed of during the previous fiscal year, and during the first quarter of the present fiscal year 874,850.66 acres, making the entire quantity thus disposed of during the period named 3,841,549.09 acres. The increase arises chiefly from the operation of the homestead law, under which alone 1,456,514.96 acres were taken up since the 1st of January, 1863, when it took effect.

The revenue derived from the sale of the public lands during the last fiscal year amounted to $136,077.93, being an increase of $11,029.65 over the previous fiscal year. During the quarter ending 30th September last the sales amounted to $90,090.55, which is $77,662.59 more than was realized during the quarter ending September 30, 1862. The rapid increase now observable in the sales of the public lands affords additional evidence of the entire confidence of the people in the stability of the Government, and that the industrial resources of the nation have not been materially diminished, notwithstanding the immense armies it has placed in the field.

No subject committed to the management of this Department is of greater importance than that of the public lands, nor has any been more prolific of legislation. Congress, at an early period, recognized the expediency and importance of the speedy settlement of the public domain, and of a liberal policy towards the actual settler. The prudence and wisdom of the system thus early inaugurated, and which has finally culminated in the enactment of the homestead law, are attested by the vast extent of fertile country which has been reclaimed and formed into now populous and flourishing States, which contribute of the superabundance of their agricultural and mineral productions to the necessities of the earlier settled portions of the country and to foreign nations.

The progress being made in the gigantic experiment of a railway to unite still more closely the States on the Atlantic to those on the Pacific will soon attract settlements along its entire route, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with wise forecast, has, with the approbation of the Department, slightly increased the usual surveying estimates, in order to meet the exigencies which will thus be created.

In order to obtain the benefits of the act of May 20, 1862, "to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," certain preliminary acts are required to be performed before the register or receiver for the district of lands in which the settlement is proposed to be made by the party applying in person. This requirement of the law is thought to operate invidiously towards persons who are engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, and, to remedy the evil, it is respectfully suggested that the law might, with propriety, be so far modified as to permit the wife or other proper representative of a person so employed in the public service to take the requisite preliminary steps for the legal inception of his claim. I also concur in the opinion expressed by the Commissioner of Public Lands, that it is expedient and proper to require persons claiming the benefits of this law to pay the full commissions of the register and receiver at the time the entry is made, instead of deferring the payment of one half thereof until the final issue of the certificate, at the end of five years.

At the time of the discovery of the great mineral wealth of portions of the public domain the nation was in the enjoyment of domestic tranquility and unrivaled prosperity, and could well afford to throw open her rich mines of the precious metals to the unrestricted enterprise of the world; but having now been forced into a war for the preservation of our national existence, as unexampled in expense as in magnitude, the question whether we can, in justice to other branches of industry and enterprise, longer exempt this immense source of individual revenue from its equitable share of the public burden, becomes of much importance. A small tax upon the net profits of the gold mines of the United States would largely increase the means of the Treasury; and as no good reason seems to exist why the nation should not, in its hour of need, derive some direct assistance from its extensive fields of gold and silver mines, I earnestly press the consideration of the subject with a view to that end.

The attention of Congress is also called to the necessity of providing by law for the appointment of a surveyor general, and the establishment of a district land office, in the Territory of Idaho.

In view of the disturbing causes that have existed, our relations with the various Indian tribes are as favorable as could reasonably be expected. The experience of the past few years, however, clearly demonstrates the necessity of important changes in the policy hitherto pursued towards them.

While the regions of country occupied by the Indians remained uninhabited by the whites, the plan of setting apart separate reservations for different bands of the same tribe, or for small tribes possessing similar habits and customs, and privileged to roam over common hunting grounds in quest of the means of subsistence, as in Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kansas, and Nebraska, seemed wise and to promise success; but as the country becomes settled, their dependence upon game and the spontaneous productions of the earth becomes more and more precarious, while the necessity for their keeping within the limits of their reservations increases. The Indians are thus left without their accustomed resources, and in the midst of a population with whose customs and arts of life they are wholly unfamiliar. They consequently become discouraged, and, looking solely to their scanty annuities from the Government, or to begging and pilfering, for the necessities of life, fall an easy prey to the sharpers and whisky traders who gather around their reservations for the purpose of obtaining their moneys. The smaller the reservation, the greater are the facilities for the exercise of this pernicious influence, and hence the necessity of concentrating scattered bands and the smaller tribes of similar habits, language, and customs, into as large communities as possible, and their location upon the more remote portions of the public domain. They will soon become extinct unless they acquire the arts of civilized life, and to this end it is indispensably necessary to place them beyond the reach of any influence save that of their agents, teachers, and assistants. The vast emigration to the newly discovered gold-bearing regions of the interior has brought us into more immediate contact with large and powerful tribes, with whom no treaties other than those of amity have yet been negotiated, and all the energies which the Department can possibly exert in that direction will scarcely be adequate to the pressing demands that will be made upon it during the next few years by the exigencies of the Indian service in those regions. Immediate steps should be taken to prevent collision between them and our own people, to provide suitable locations for the Indians, and to induce them to settle upon them and engage in the cultivation of the soil, and the rearing of domestic animals, and in the mean time to furnish them with such supplies as may be absolutely necessary to prevent starvation. The number of Indians under the direct supervision of the Department is thus rapidly becoming larger than at any former period, and the wisdom of anticipating this increased demand upon its resources by a corresponding increase in the appropriations for the Indian service, whether we are to be guided by the principles of justice and humanity, or economy, must be manifest to all.

Particular attention is also invited to the condition of Indian affairs in California. That State has hitherto been divided into two districts—the northern and the southern—each under the charge of a superintending agent. There is no good reason for continuing this arrangement, and on the score of economy alone it ought to be abolished and our Indian relations throughout the State placed under the control of one superintendent.

The good of the service and the future welfare of the Indians also imperatively demand the establishment of two reservations in the northern part of the State—one near the coast, and the other in the interior—of sufficient extent for the accommodation of all the Indians in what is now designated as the northern district, and at least one suitable reservation for those in the southern portion of the State. The necessity for these different reservations arises from the great dissimilarity that exists in the habits and customs of the several tribes for whom they are intended.

The hostility of the powerful tribes of the Apaches and Navajos, mainly located in New Mexico and Arizona, is such, that for the present their management must be left chiefly to the military branch of the Government; but measures should be promptly taken for the establishment of suitable reservations for the other Indians in those Territories, and for those now in hostility to the United States, whenever they shall have been properly subdued.

The unfortunate result of the effort made last spring to return the refugee Cherokees to their homes has largely added to the number of refugees and greatly increased the expense of their subsistence. This, together with the advance in the prices of clothing and provisions, has so augmented the expense of providing for them as to exhaust the funds set apart for that purpose, and renders a further appropriation necessary. It is doubtful whether the supplies needed could, even now, be forwarded in time to prevent much suffering, and hence the importance of as early action by Congress in the premises as may be practicable.

The able report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs will be found to be replete with interesting facts and judicious suggestions on the subjects to which it relates.

The number of revolutionary soldiers borne upon the pension rolls had dwindled down to eighteen on the 30th of June last, of whom only ten had made application for their stipends on the 4th of March. The number of widows of revolutionary soldiers on the rolls, at the same period, was 1,573. The whole number of Army invalid pensioners on the rolls the 30th of June was 7,248, most of whom were pensioned on account of wounds received or disease contracted in the service during the present war. The widows, orphans, and dependent mothers of 3,573 deceased soldiers of the present war were inscribed upon the rolls during the last fiscal year, making the whole number of this class on the rolls at the close of the year, 4,820. The number of Navy invalids on the rolls at the close of the year was 544, and the number of widows, orphans, and dependent mothers of deceased officers and seamen of the Navy, 577. The whole number of Army pensioners added to the rolls during the last fiscal year was 7,582, and of the Navy, 316. The number of Army pensioners, of all classes, on the rolls on the 30th June last was 13,659, and of the Navy, 1,132. The payment of the former requires the sum of $1,227,641 88, and the latter, $144,074 61 per annum.

The remittances to the agents for paying pensions have been so regulated according to law "as to prevent an undue accumulation of balances in their hands."

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

During the year 602 bounty land warrants have been issued, calling, in the aggregate, for 94,280 acres of land.

It appears from the Commissioner's report that the whole amount of money expended by the Government for pensions to the close of the last fiscal year was $91,693,660 97, and that the quantity of land granted for military and naval services was 65,896,142 acres, which, at $1 25 per acre, would amount to $82,370,177 50.

Congress at the last session provided for an increase of the clerical force of the Pension Office, and I am happy in being able to say that it has enabled the Commissioner to dispose of the greatly increased amount of business thrown upon it with satisfactory promptitude. During the first quarter of the present fiscal year 7,162 claims were admitted, and a much larger number examined and suspended for further evidence.

The Commissioner estimates the whole number of claims that will be admitted during the present fiscal year at about 30,000.

The appointment of surgeons, as authorized by the act of July 14, 1862, to make the biennial examinations of pensioners, and to examine applicants for invalid pensions, has been attended with marked advantage and saving to the Government. For the information of the public and those more immediately interested, the Commissioner has embraced in his report the names of the surgeons thus appointed in the several States, with their post office address.

The act of 3d March, 1859, requiring the biennial examination of invalid pensioners, prescribes that the examinations shall be made by two surgeons or physicians. The Commissioner is of the opinion, in which I concur, that the examinations will be as satisfactorily made by a single surgeon regularly appointed by the office, and with less inconvenience to the parties interested, and a modification of the law in this respect is therefore recommended.

The increase of the Navy pension fund from the sale of prizes amounts, at the present time, to probably one and a half million dollars.

The old laws in relation to the Navy pension fund seem to authorize and require the investment of this money; but as the question is not entirely free from doubt, I recommend the passage of a law authorizing the Department to invest the amount which has been and may hereafter be derived from the sale of prizes in Government bonds, and apply the interest thereon to the payment of Navy pensions, or that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized by law to credit this fund with the interest which would semi-annually accrue thereon, if so invested.

A decision has been given by the Department in a case arising under the act of July 14, 1862; and as it will furnish a rule of action for the Pension Bureau, in constantly recurring cases of a like character, I beg leave to refer to it specially.

The second, third, and fourth sections of that act make provision for the widow, children, dependent mother, or orphan sisters, as the case may be, of any officer or other person named in the first section, who has died since the 4th day of March, 1861, or who shall thereafter die, by reason of any wound received or disease contracted while in the service of the United States, and in the line of duty. An officer of the Navy had contracted, under these circumstances, a disease of which he died. Some months previous to his death he tendered his resignation, as his declining health, impaired by the disease, which ultimately proved fatal, incapacitated him for the efficient discharge of duty. His resignation was accepted. The claim of his widow for a pension was rejected in the Pension Office, solely upon the ground that he was not, at the time of his death, in the naval service of the United States. The case was, by appeal, brought before the Department.

The action of the Pension Bureau conformed to the construction which had been given to preceding acts of Congress granting naval pensions. Some of these acts expressly confined the right of the claimant to cases where the death of the officer occurred during the period of his service. Other acts, such as that of 1813, and the second section of the act of 1814, secure to the beneficiaries, for a specific period, half of the monthly pay to which the deceased was entitled at the time of his death. The late Attorney General Butler decided that the death of an officer or seaman, before the expiration of his service, was not essential, under the latter acts, to the validity of his widow's claim to a pension. He subsequently withdrew that opinion, and, although considering such a claim within the general equity of the system, he came to a conclusion adverse to it under those acts, owing to their peculiar phraseology, and from the fact that Congress had given a construction to them by the continuing acts of May 23, 1828, and June 28, 1832.

The act of 1862 does not, in direct terms, exclude from its benefits the widow or other designated relatives of persons who, after their resignation or discharge, shall die of wounds received or disease contracted in the naval service, and in the line of duty, nor does it determine the amount of pension by the monthly pay of the deceased at the time of his death. The latter provision would seem to require that the connection of the deceased with the service should subsist until his death. By the uniform practice of the Pension Bureau, under the existing act, a military pension was granted to the relatives of the party, without regard to the time of his death, if the claim in other respects was free from objection. Uniformity in the administration of the act is desirable, and a settled interpretation of it should be adhered to, unless it be manifestly wrong. Although, in the former legislation of Congress, military and naval pensions were granted under separate and independent enactments, both classes of pensions are provided for and placed upon the same footing by the act under consideration. No distinction is made between the two branches of the service. I could not sanction a decision making such a distinction, and I was satisfied that the action of the Pension Bureau, in regard to military pensions, was amply justified by the spirit, and was not in violation of the letter, of the statute.

The effects and consequences of the opposite construction are worthy of attention. According to it, no provision is made for the bereaved and often necessitous and helpless family of a deceased party, who has received a mortal wound or contracted a fatal disease in the line of duty, if his death occurred after the expiration of the period of his service. Had the wound or disease inflicted a disability, it is clear that, had he survived it, he would have been entitled to a pension proportionate to such disability. The pension would not commence in any event until after his discharge. Should the disabled and discharged soldier or seaman die after receiving his pension, or before establishing his claim to it, his relatives would be excluded from the bounty of Congress, although it could be shown by indisputable proofs that his death was the direct and inevitable result of a wound received on the field or the deck, from the enemies of his country.

It seemed to me to be more in accordance with the legislative intention to hold that the death of a party, after his resignation or discharge, would not be fatal to the claim of his widow or relatives to a pension.

Should I have erred in this view, Congress can apply the appropriate corrective in regard to future cases.

I would advise, however, that some limit should be fixed by law, within which the death should occur, to entitle the beneficiaries named in the second and the following sections of the act to the benefit of its provisions.

During the year ending 30th September last 5,133 applications and 811 caveats were received at the Patent Office. Twenty-nine applications were filed for the extension of patents previously granted. During the same period 3,887 patents were issued and 40 extensions granted. Quite a diminution is observable in the number of claims on which patents have been allowed, but not issued, because of the non-payment of the final fee within the time prescribed by law, the number being about 370.

The balance in the Treasury to the credit of the patent fund on the 1st day of October, 1862, was $48,157 21. The receipts of the office to September 30, 1863, amounted to $179,378 55, making its entire resources for the year $227,535 76. The expenditures of the office during that period have been $189,803 13, leaving a balance on hand, on the 1st October, 1863, of $37,732 63.

The work of classifying the results of the eighth census for publication has progressed satisfactorily, and the printing of the volume of population statistics is so far advanced as to insure its completion and delivery early in the coming session of Congress. The succeeding volumes will be supplied to the two Houses as fast as the capabilities of the public Printer will admit.

The marshals and assistant marshals in the loyal States have generally been paid in full for their services, and the accounts of those employed to take the territorial census of Nevada, Dakota, and Colorado, for which provision was made by the act of March 3, 1863, have been paid in part, and the remainder are in process of adjustment. The final settlement of the accounts of one thousand two hundred and seven marshals and assistants in States affected by the rebellion has been precluded by the condition of public affairs, and the refusal of some of these officers to take the oath prescribed by law as a condition precedent to payment.

The able reports from the board of visitors and the superintendent of construction of the Government Hospital for the Insane will be read by all with much interest. The advantages of this institution at the present time cannot be overestimated. Those who, while engaged in the land and naval service of the country, in this trying hour, for the preservation of our Government, are overtaken by mental disorders, there find a refuge, and are treated with the highest skill which has yet been attained in the art of treating the insane. The success which has attended their treatment, and the numbers who have recovered, are the most flattering testimonials in behalf of those who have had charge of the institution. Their devotion to their calling is only to be fully appreciated when it is remembered that a larger number of patients have been admitted to this institution during the last year than have ever before been admitted into any similar hospital in this country in the same space of time. Although so large a number have been admitted, and the increase been chiefly derived from the Army and Navy, it is gratifying to be assured that neither the existence of the war, doubt as to the justice of our cause, nor distrust as to its final result, is to be imputed as the cause of the malady with which the patients have been afflicted, but that it is rather the result of overtasked efforts of constitutions previously impaired by sickness contracted in the line of duty.

Among other advantages which this institution affords, is that those who have suffered the loss of a limb in the service may here have it replaced by an artificial one, fabricated by persons of the highest skill, without cost, the patients being maintained at the hospital, free of expense, during the time the artificial limb is being prepared, made familiar with its mechanism and use, and thus enabled to adopt their new help with the greatest advantage and ease to themselves.

During the past year much difficulty and perplexity have been experienced by the Department in the admission of patients to this institution under the present laws. Many applications have been made for admission of persons who have sought refuge in this District, but have not their permanent homes here, so as to be clearly entitled to admission into the hospital, as resident paupers at the time of becoming insane. These persons have, in many instances, been a serious charge upon the War Department, which has been compelled to take care of them in camps and other unsuitable places for such persons, and consequently at great expense and inconvenience.

It is recommended that existing laws on the subject be so modified as to permit the Department, in the exercise of a proper discretion, to admit this class of persons into the asylum until they can be more properly disposed of.

I cannot conclude my notice of this institution without adding my testimony to that of all my predecessors to the marked devotion and distinguished ability and fitness of the gentleman who has occupied the position of superintendent from the foundation of the asylum. He deserves the gratitude of the country for his zealous and persistent efforts to make the institution under his charge a model one in every respect in which it may be viewed.

38TH CONG...1ST SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

The appropriations which are asked for the ensuing fiscal year are earnestly recommended. No application of public money has ever been more wisely, economically, and satisfactorily made, than have the sums dedicated by Congress to this humane and benevolent institution.

The Columbia Institution for the instruction of the deaf and dumb and the blind has been managed with great ability and success. The buildings, however, are manifestly insufficient for the proper accommodation of the pupils admitted and the growing wants of this community.

The report of the president of the institution will be read with interest. It expresses an earnest desire for the acquisition of more adjacent land—to the extent of about thirteen acres—for the instruction of the pupils in horticulture and agriculture; the erection of more permanent and commodious mechanic shops and other necessary buildings, and for the introduction of the Potomac water, and asks for these purposes additional appropriations amounting to about $60,000. If it be the intention of Congress to make this institution a receptacle of all who will probably apply for admission into it, the proposed enlargements are eminently proper, and should be made without delay, in order to secure the requisite lands before they shall have advanced in price or be otherwise appropriated. But if it be only designed to make provision for the unfortunates of this class inhabiting the District of Columbia, and the children of persons in the military and naval service, who are unable to provide for them elsewhere, then it is doubtful whether it will be proper to increase the extent of the grounds, or to construct the buildings, as proposed. In either case, however, the wooden structures now appurtenant to the buildings occupied are entirely unsafe for the purposes to which they are applied, and should be removed, and their places supplied by substantial brick buildings, and about two acres of land added, for the purpose of erecting thereon proper workshops.

I abstained from submitting the estimates proposed for the larger sums, because I was not prepared to say what the will of Congress might be on the subject; but I earnestly recommend that provision be made, if not to the full extent asked, at least to that required for the proper and safe accommodation of the children of the District, who are entitled to admission into the institution. It should also be supplied with water, and I recommend the appropriation of the amount asked for that purpose.

Satisfactory progress has been made on the work of the Capitol extension and new dome, notwithstanding the difficulties encountered in obtaining the marble for the former, and artisans of the requisite skill and experience for the peculiar character of the work to be done on the latter.

Since the last annual report from this Department the eastern portico of the north wing has been constructed, and much work done on that of the south wing. The porticos of the connecting corridors, and the granite platforms and steps between the old or central portions of the building and the new wings, as well as the approaches to both wings on the western front, have also been completed. It is expected that the eastern entrance to the north wing will also be finished the present season.

The group of statuary which was executed here in marble, from models made by the late Thomas Crawford, for the pediment of the eastern portico of the north wing, designed to represent "the progress of civilization," and the statues of "Justice" and "History," which were also designed by Crawford, and executed in Italy, have been put in their respective places, and attract much attention and merited admiration.

The expensive and elaborately wrought bronze door, designed by Randolph Rogers, and cast at the Bavarian foundry, in Munich, and the marble statues of Franklin and Jefferson, executed in Italy, by Hiram Powers, under a contract made by your immediate predecessor, under the authority of an act of Congress, have also been received and placed in appropriate positions in the building.

All these works of art, and a few others not yet completed, were exempted from the restrictions which were imposed upon the embellishment of the Capitol with statuary and paintings by the recent legislation of Congress.

The colossal figure of "Freedom," designed by Crawford and executed by Clark Mills, was, on the 2d instant, successfully raised to its elevated place on the new dome, and forms a grand and appropriate crowning to the Capitol of the nation.

With a view to economy, during the present year I abolished the office of architect of the Patent Office building, and added the duties of the same to those of the architect of the Capitol extension. Preparations have been made for finishing the saloon of the north front, and for furnishing the same with suitable cases for the reception and exhibition of models.

The work will be completed during the approaching season, and with the appropriation made at the last session of Congress for that purpose. The architect strongly urges the propriety and necessity of completing the exterior of the north front, and an appropriation for that purpose has been submitted in the annual estimates.

It became indispensably necessary, for the proper accommodation of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and the officers connected therewith, to make certain changes and improvements in the eastern portion of the City Hall, which I have caused to be made, at the expense of the judiciary fund, upon which it has been usual to draw for such purposes, and the court is now enabled to dispatch the business coming before it with much greater convenience and satisfaction to the public.

The report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings will indicate to Congress the alterations and repairs which have been made to the finished portions of the Capitol, and what additional improvements he deems it advisable to have provided for by further legislation. It also explains the manner in which the moneys appropriated for the public works under his charge have been expended during the past year, and recommends other improvements of the streets and public grounds, which recommendations will, no doubt, receive the consideration of the appropriate committees of Congress.

The duties properly appertaining to the office of Commissioner of the Public Buildings and Grounds have been greatly augmented within the past few years, and sometimes by the imposition upon him of duties not strictly belonging to his office. In justice to him, therefore, as well as to the public service, at the commencement of the present fiscal year I relieved him, to some extent, by the appointment of a general superintendent and special disbursing agent for the Capitol extension, the Patent Office building, and the Washington aqueduct. In making this arrangement, a saving to the Government was effected, while I, at the same time, secured for these important works the services of a professional and practical architect.

The work on the Washington aqueduct has progressed, in pursuance of the act of Congress transferring the same to this Department, with but slight exceptions, and the water of the Potomac river been this day introduced into the reservoirs. The walls and banks of the distributing reservoir were designed, by the engineer who projected the aqueduct, to be protected with broken stone, and a contract was made and the work commenced on that plan; but it appeared to me to be so unsatisfactory and insufficient for the purpose that I caused an inquiry to be made as to the manner of protecting similar embankments in other localities, and found that, with but few if any exceptions, the walls were lined with solid stone masonry, laid in the best of cement. Influenced by the example and experience of others, and by the advice of eminent engineers, I directed a thin dressing of broken stone to be placed upon the interior walls for a foundation, and the whole to be faced with solid stone-work of about the same thickness as the contemplated riprap or broken-stone wall. According to the original plan of the aqueduct, the water from the Potomac is conducted into a receiving reservoir formed by a dam across a stream called Powder Mill or Little Falls branch, about nine miles below the head of the conduit, whence it is conveyed about two miles further down to a distributing reservoir, divided into two equal sections, or basins, by an embankment designed chiefly for filtering purposes. It is thus always intermingled with the water from Powder Mill branch. The latter stream drains a considerable extent of country, and is subject to frequent and heavy freshets, which render its water unfit for immediate use. At times this stream is clear, while the water of the Potomac is rendered impure, by reason of heavy rains nearer its source. It is therefore important that the aqueduct should be so constructed as to afford an adequate supply of water from whichever of these sources may, for the time, be most free from impurities, and to exclude that which may be unfit for use. For this purpose, the engineer in charge proposes to connect the conduit above the receiving reservoir with that below it, so that the water from the Potomac may be brought directly into the distributing reservoir without being adulterated by that of Powder Mill branch. He also proposes to construct a gate-house in the dividing wall of the distributing reservoir, so as to admit of the use of the water from either section, as may become desirable. By means of these improvements, the requisite supply of water may be drawn from whichever of four distinct sources may be the purest and best, namely: the Potomac river, Powder Mill branch, or either section of the distributing reservoir; but without some such arrangement, "an unfailing and abundant supply of good and wholesome water" cannot at all times be obtained. Under these circumstances, I have deemed it necessary to order these changes in the original plan, and have made the estimates of appropriations for the completion of the work to conform thereto. For information in detail in reference to this subject, I invite attention to the full and able report of the chief engineer.

Certain parties having, from time to time, made claim to heavy damages for the diversion of the water from the Potomac river, my immediate predecessor, with a view to settle and end this claim, entered into an agreement of arbitration with the claimants. Pursuant to this agreement, the arbitrators met from time to time, and finally submitted their award, by which they adjudged in favor of the claimants upon each and all of the plans and modes submitted to them, being three in number, for the construction of the dam across the Potomac, and also $12,000 for their own fees as arbitrators, and $761 84 for the expenses of the arbitration. The sums being so large, I did not feel justified in applying the existing appropriation for the completion of the aqueduct to the payment thereof, preferring to submit the whole matter to Congress for its determination. It appears from the report of the experienced engineer in charge of the work, as must be obvious to every observer, that an ample supply of water for the use of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, for many years to come, can be obtained from the Potomac by the erection of a tight dam, extending from the Maryland shore to Conn's Island, to a height which will give a head of six feet of water in the aqueduct, and yield a daily supply of about 65,000,000 gallons, which is thirty-three and one third per cent. more than was used in the city of New York in the year 1861, when its population was over 800,000. In view of this fact, I have instructed the engineer to construct a dam of cut stone, with a base sufficient to bear a superstructure of the required height for the full capacity of the aqueduct, whenever it may be called into requisition.

It is difficult to conceive how a dam of this character can work any injury to the proprietors of the water-right claimed at the Great Falls. At the utmost, it could only raise the water to a level at the head of the island, while at ordinary stages and at low water (the only time when any value can properly be placed upon the right) it would not increase or diminish the flow of water in the main channel on the west side of the island; and it surely cannot be pretended that the parties claiming the water-right can lawfully divert the ordinary flow of the water on the east side of the island. A dam of the east channel that would raise the water to a height sufficient to fill the aqueduct would be a great advantage to the claimants, for the reason that it would enable them to avail themselves of the power by the erection of but one dam, while one that would only back the water to the head of the island must be a matter of total indifference to them; because, in the very nature of things, it can work them no detriment whatever.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

If this view shall be taken of the case by Congress, I recommend that a reasonable sum be appropriated to pay the expenses of the arbitration, and that the estimate of the cost of the dam across the main channel be diminished to the estimated cost of the dam over the east channel, thus leaving the greater expense of the dam to be provided for as the exigencies of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, by the increase of their population, may require.

The report of the engineer will not fail to arrest the attention of Congress in another important particular.

The immense volume of water which the aqueduct will soon furnish will afford an ample supply for fountains at all appropriate places, and for cleansing the streets and sewers of the city, keeping them at all times in a healthful and agreeable condition. But in order to the accomplishment of this most desirable object, the present system of expenditure for the repairing of streets and the construction of sewers must be abandoned, or modified to such an extent as to place it under one control. I can perceive no good reason why the Government should take upon itself the exclusive management and repair of one or more of the streets and avenues of the city, while all are equally necessary to the convenience and comfort of the citizens of the United States visiting or residing in the city of Washington. The great width of its numerous streets and avenues quite discourages any attempt to completely pave them; nor is it desirable that it should be generally done, when we consider the increased amount of heat that would be radiated from their exposed surfaces, and the clouds of dust that would be constantly sweeping over them.

It is believed that this may be avoided to a great extent by allowing in some instances the adjoining proprietors to extend the sidewalks into the streets, so as to reduce the latter to a proper width for pavement or concrete, and to afford space for grass-plots in front of their dwellings, and in other streets by making a park of proper width through the middle for the cultivation of trees and plants and the erection of fountains. By the adoption of such a course, the streets and avenues of the city would be reduced to such width as to admit of their being thoroughly paved at a reasonable cost, and the beauty and comfort of the city immensely increased. But neither this nor any other great improvement can be expected under the present laws. They should be so modified as to require a uniform and perfect system of sewerage throughout the city; and to superintend this, and to improve and repair the streets, commissioners should be provided, one to be appointed by the Government, and one or more by the corporate authorities of the city—the money appropriated by Congress to be expended in such proportion to the sum provided by the city as should be prescribed by law, and the obligation imposed upon the city to raise by taxation, annually, such sum as might be deemed by the commissioners necessary for the objects to be accomplished.

An act of Congress to extend the charter of the Alexandria and Washington Railroad Company, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, authorized the company to erect an additional structure or passage-way along either side of the Potomac bridge for the track of their road, but so as not to hinder the general use of said bridge for ordinary travel. The surveys, estimates, and plans for the construction of this bridge, together with a model of the proposed draw, were submitted to and approved by me as required by the act referred to; and the company immediately thereafter entered upon the work. The bridge is located on a center line seventy-five feet below the center line of the old bridge, and has progressed with such remarkable rapidity as to justify the belief that it will be fully completed during the early part of the approaching session of Congress, when it is expected that the railroad travel will be diverted to it, and the old bridge restored to the use of the public, for whom it was intended.

This bridge is in a dilapidated condition, and there is an urgent necessity for its immediate repair.

The report of the police commissioners will be found to be an elaborate and interesting account of their operations during the past year, and fully attests the usefulness and importance of their organization. It, however, contains many recommendations which, if fully adopted, will impose greatly increased expenditures upon the Government. From the examination which I have been able to give to the subject, I am inclined to think an increase of the force, and of their compensation, is expedient and proper, but not to the extent indicated by the commissioners.

I have not been able to convince myself of the justice of imposing the entire support of this police system upon the Federal Government. It was shown by the census of 1860 that the District of Columbia then contained seventy-five thousand permanent inhabitants, since which time its population has evidently been largely increased. There is no city within the United States, it is believed, in which property of all kinds yields a larger income, in proportion to its value, and no good reason exists why it should not help to defray the expense of its own protection. I am the more justified in making this suggestion by the fact that the annual tax imposed upon property in this District is much less than that imposed on the property in any of the principal cities in the United States.

The suggestions of the commissioners of the police for the more economical and speedy punishment of crime are just and proper, and deserve the careful consideration of Congress.

A house of correction and for the detention of juvenile offenders should be provided, and a system adopted by which vagrants and petty offenders, on conviction upon summary trial before the police magistrates, should receive proper punishment, by being compelled to work upon the streets, to break stone in the quarries for their improvement, or to labor in some other useful way.

The want of a penitentiary has been particularly felt in the administration of justice in this District during the past year. The whole number of convicts now under sentence from this District is 179; of this number 143 have been convicted and sent to the penitentiary at Albany, New York, since the appropriation of the penitentiary of the United States for the District of Columbia by the War Department. The average cost of transporting convicts from this District to the penitentiary at Albany is about fifty dollars, and that of maintaining them there one dollar and twenty-five cents per week, or sixty-five dollars per annum. It is confidently believed that, with a penitentiary possessing the appliances necessary for the judicious application of the labor of the convicts, they could be much more economically maintained in this District, and the moral advantages secured to the community of having institutions of this character located in their midst.

The Government now owns a tract of land containing two hundred and eighty-one acres, upon which the receiving reservoir of the Washington aqueduct is situated, which embraces several suitable sites for a penitentiary, and a house for the detention and reform of juvenile offenders. These lands are now lying vacant. There are excellent quarries immediately contiguous thereto, from which substantial buildings could be erected. They could be located in close proximity to the canal, whence fuel could be obtained at the cheapest rates. Sewerage could be easily constructed, and all the necessary water power for propelling the requisite machinery for the successful and profitable employment of the labor of the convicts could be procured from the surplus water of the reservoir at a very small cost. I think it would be good economy to provide for the erection of penitentiary buildings upon these lands, and that it would be well for Congress at its approaching session to make the necessary provision for the commencement of the work. In a very short time many of the convicts could be provided with secure and comfortable quarters upon the premises, and employed in quarrying stone, and other labor pertaining to the construction of such works.

The act of March 3, 1863, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1864, and for the year ending June 30, 1863, and for other purposes, transferred from the appropriation made and placed under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury by the act of June 23, 1860, for the detection and arrest of counterfeiters of the coin of the United States, the sum of $1,184, or so much thereof as might be necessary to enable the Secretary of the Interior "to pay detective police employed by a former head of the Department, for expenses incurred and services rendered in the cities of Washington and Philadelphia in the detection and arrest of counterfeiters of United States coin." Having examined all the claims presented, and found them to have been liquidated and paid as per agreement made with the claimants prior to the rendition of the service, I recommend the passage of a law to repeal the provision alluded to in the act of March 3, 1863, and to restore the amount thereby transferred to the control of the Secretary of the Treasury for the purposes originally designed.

While the African slave trade is known to be still carried on from some foreign ports to a lamentable extent, it is gratifying to be able to state that so successful have been the efforts of this Government to prevent citizens of the United States from engaging in it, that not a single vessel is known or believed to have been fitted out in our own waters for that purpose during the past year; and the wholesome examples which have resulted from the energy and vigilance which have been and are still being displayed by the officers immediately charged with the enforcement of the laws on this subject, together with the growing sense of justice among our people towards the African race, will, it is hoped, effectually deter persons from any future participation in so unrighteous a traffic. The officers appointed pursuant to the requirements of the treaty of April 7, 1862, with Great Britain, have repaired to their several stations, and the mixed courts of justice, to reside at the city of New York, Sierra Leone, and the Cape of Good Hope, have been duly organized and established.

The accounts of the American Colonization Society for the support of recaptured Africans in Liberia have not yet been finally settled, owing to the imperfect manner in which they have been kept by the resident agent of the United States in that republic, and by the Liberian authorities after the transfer of the re captives to them. The information and facts required to be regularly reported not having been recorded and preserved by them, it is feared they cannot now be obtained with the accuracy of detail contemplated by the strict terms of the contracts, and hence it is respectfully recommended that the Department be authorized by law to adjust and settle the accounts on equitable principles.

No further appropriation is asked for this object, the unexpended balances of former appropriations being sufficient to meet all the legal demands that can possibly be made during the present and the next ensuing fiscal year. The reenactment of the joint resolution of the 3d of March last, "respecting the compensation of judges and so forth, under the treaty with Great Britain, and other persons employed in the suppression of the slave trade," will be necessary, however, to authorize the use of those funds for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865.

I am unable to report any greater disposition, generally, among the colored persons, for whose colonization provision was made by certain recent acts of Congress, to emigrate, than had been exhibited at the time of your last annual message. Since that time, however, about four hundred and fifty have been deported to the Ile à Vache, adjacent and belonging to the republic of Hayti. The condition of this colony has been variously represented, and an agent has been deputed by the Department to visit the island and report the real situation of affairs, and the future prospects of the emigrants there. They were emigrated under a contract entered into for that purpose, with persons who were represented as possessing every qualification and fitness for insuring the success of the experiment; but nothing has yet been paid them under it, nor will there be until the report of the agent shall have been received and found to justify it.

Independent of the seeming unwillingness of this class of persons to leave the United States, the experience the country has derived since the passage of the acts of Congress on the subject of colonization, and the action of the Government towards them in adopting the able-bodied men into its armies, render it a question of great importance whether the effort to colonize them beyond the limits of the United States should be continued, unless the way should be opened for the establishment of a friendly colony in some one of the Central American States, at a favorable commercial point for traversing that country by a new route to the Pacific.

38TH CONG...1ST SESS.

Report of the Postmaster General.

Although much prejudice has been manifested throughout most of the free States in regard to the introduction of colored persons therein, there is a place where many of them can now be advantageously employed at remunerative prices, and where the objection to color does not exist. I refer to the line of the Pacific railroad. Upon this work there are already about three hundred free colored laborers, out of fifteen hundred employed, and I am assured they perform their duty faithfully and well. The Department has been repeatedly urged to use its influence to cause as many colored laborers as can be procured to be employed upon this work, and it is worthy of consideration, therefore, whether the money appropriated to remove those who are now a charge upon the Government, to foreign countries, will not be more judiciously applied in transporting them to those fields of labor within the dominions of the United States where they are wanted, and where they will be welcomed. In this way the expense to which the Government is now subjected will be greatly diminished, and we shall have the satisfaction of placing these people in a position of usefulness, security, and peace, where they will be instrumental in the construction of a work in which the nation has, of all others, save the putting down of this rebellion, the greatest interest.

The need at the seat of Government of a bureau of national statistics has long been felt, and often been called to and engaged the attention of Congress, but so far without any practical result. The facts and information which a properly organized bureau of this character would collect and exhibit are often indispensable, as well to the enlightened legislator as to the several departments of the Government and the people at large. It is confidently believed that it would contribute immensely to the advancement of the commercial, agricultural, financial, scientific, manufacturing, and other interests of our people, and, by the dissemination of correct information as to our national wealth, interests, and resources, lead to a more just appreciation of the value to all of the American Union, and contribute, in no small degree, to the more universal establishment and maintenance of friendly relations between ourselves and the other civilized nations of the earth.

Such a bureau could be established now with but little outlay, and if made to include the duty of enumerating the population of the United States, for which purpose a bureau is now required to be temporarily organized every ten years, at considerable expense and labor, would effect a positive saving to the Treasury, while the work would be better performed, as the office would then be permanent, and the experience gained in the operations of one decade not wholly lost before the next was entered upon, as is now the case. Most enlightened nations have perceived the necessity and utility of organized effort for the attainment of accurate statistical knowledge, and to profit by their experience is the dictate of wisdom. Deeply impressed with the importance of the subject, I venture to refer to it again, and to invoke for it the favorable consideration of Congress.

On the 3d of March, 1863, a joint resolution was enacted authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior, and all other custodians thereof, to cause equal distribution to be forthwith made among the members of the two Houses of the then expiring Congress of all books and documents which had been printed or purchased at the cost of the Government, and not actually belonging to any public library, or the library kept for use in any department of the Government, excepting, however, all such books and documents as were embraced in any existing order for the distribution thereof among the members of either

House of Congress. I found, on examination, that the number of volumes of the documents referred to, their incompleteness as sets or works, and the uncertainty as to their value, aggregately or separately, were such as to render it wholly impracticable to carry the provisions of the joint resolution into effect, and the subject is therefore respectfully submitted for the further consideration and action of Congress.

For years past, the Department has had to encounter difficulties in providing suitable accommodations for the United States courts in the city of New York. Congress alone can apply the remedy, and it should not be longer deferred. For many years apartments in the City Hall were used for this purpose, but the increasing necessities of the city demanded them, and they had to be given up. Since then the Department has been obliged to rent other buildings annually, or for a short term of years, and to alter and fit them up at considerable expense. The premises now used were leased by the Department in the year 1858, for the sum of $16,000 per annum. A large sum has been expended for alterations, occasional repairs, and furniture, amounting in six years, including rent, to upwards of $125,000. The present lease of the property will expire on the 1st of May next. The owner of it has died since the original lease was made, and the executors, though still willing to dispose of it at the price then fixed—$215,000—are averse to extending the lease, so that the Department will soon have to procure other temporary accommodations for the courts sitting at New York city, unless Congress shall provide the means to secure permanent ones.

The Government has purchased or erected buildings at Philadelphia, Boston, and a number of less important cities, for the use of the Federal courts and for other public purposes, and commenced the erection of one also at Baltimore. The propriety of extending this prudent policy to the city of New York seems too manifest to require argument. Economy alone demands it.

The Department is not prepared to say that the purchase of the building now used, for the sum asked, would be the most advantageous arrangement that could be made; but it would, in the end, be the saving of considerable expense to the Treasury. I therefore earnestly recommend that the Department be empowered by Congress to provide suitable and permanent accommodations for the United States courts at New York, and that an adequate appropriation be made for that purpose.

The Union Pacific Railroad Company, chartered by the act of Congress entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, has been organized by the election of directors and other officers, and the subscription of the requisite amount of stock. The character and pecuniary ability of the stockholders afford the most ample guarantee that this great work will be prosecuted to a successful issue. The work upon the branch lately located by you has already been commenced with a determination to press it to a rapid completion, despite the inclemency of the season and other obstacles.

The southern branch of the road, having its eastern terminus at the mouth of the Kansas river, and now known as that of the "Pacific Railway Company, eastern division," is being constructed with unparalleled energy. Since the 1st of September last, about forty miles of this branch have been graded, the ties made ready, the iron and rolling stock purchased and delivered upon the ground or now in transitu. We have assurances, upon which a well-founded belief may be based, that early next month it will be completed, and during next summer extended to Fort Riley, a distance of about one hundred and thirty miles.

The principal obstacle to the rapid progress of the work is the scarcity of labor, which may be overcome by the employment of the freedmen, as before indicated in this report.

The California branch of the Pacific railroad is being constructed with all practicable dispatch, and there is every reason to believe that the work will not be permitted to languish, but that, at an earlier day than could have been reasonably anticipated, the entire line will be completed.

The extent and unsurpassed richness of the gold fields recently discovered in Arizona, together with our previous knowledge of the vast mineral wealth of New Mexico, is well calculated to impress all who reflect upon the subject with the necessity of a branch road from the Union Pacific to Santa Fe, and such other points in the Territory of New Mexico as may be necessary to the development of the mineral wealth and trade of that country; and, although Congress may be unwilling to lend pecuniary aid or credit to such an enterprise, it is believed that a liberal grant of land, both arable and mineral, of comparatively little present value to the Government, to the companies now organized, or to one to be chartered by the Territorial Legislature of New Mexico, will insure its speedy construction. There are vast fields of iron ore, and coal suitable for its manufacture, convenient to the line of the proposed branch road, and though the enterprise may appear stupendous, the income to be derived from it would doubtless soon afford ample compensation to those who might accomplish it.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

J. P. USHER,
Secretary.

The President of the United States.

Report of the Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
October 31, 1863.

FINANCIAL CONDITION.

SIR: I have the honor to present the following report of the condition and operations of this Department for the fiscal year which terminated June 30, 1863. During that period the financial condition of the Department has been one of increasing prosperity; and it is gratifying to be able to state that the actual postal revenue has nearly equaled the entire expenditures—the latter amounting to $11,314,206 84, and the former to $11,163,789 59, leaving a deficiency of but $150,417 25. There is, therefore, good reason to expect that within a brief period the Department will become self-sustaining.

APPOINTMENT OFFICE.

Number of Post Offices.

The whole number of post offices remaining established on the 30th June, 1863, including the suspended offices in the insurrectionary States, was 29,047, showing an increase over the preceding year of 172. Postmasters are appointed at 550 of these offices by the President, and at 28,497 by the Postmaster General. Their classification by States is shown in the Appendix, No. 1.

Changes in 1863.

Eight hundred and thirty post offices have been established during the year, and 658 have been discontinued. The number of names and sites that have been changed, involving a change of postmasters in most instances, is 222, and there have been 2,431 resignations of postmasters, 245 deaths, and 1,115 removals. The whole number of cases acted upon is 5,501, and the number of postmasters changed from all causes during the year is 3,956. The details of these changes will appear in the Appendix, table No. 2.

Special and Local Agents, Route Agents, and Baggage Masters.

The number of special agents in the service at the close of the fiscal year was 16, whose aggregate salaries amounted to $26,500. The number of route agents was 387, at an aggregate compensation of $289,260; the number of baggage masters in charge of through or express mails was 93, at an aggregate pay of $7,440; and the number of local agents was 45, at a compensation of $27,824.

Letter-Carriers.

The law authorizing the free delivery of mail matter by carriers took effect on the 1st day of July last. About that time the system was put in operation at 49 of the larger offices, with a competent corps of carriers to each, numbering in the aggregate 449, at an aggregate annual compensation of $500,680.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Postmaster General.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Ouro own experience and that of Europe demonstrates that correspondence increases with every facility for its conduct, and free delivery in the principal towns and cities has been proved in the mother country to be a facility attended with very remarkable results. Further time is required to prove whether it will operate in the same way here, but, as far as ascertained, the results are highly satisfactory.

In the city of New York there are now, daily, five deliveries from the office, and six collections of letters for the mails from the depositories in the various parts of the city. During the quarter ending September 30, 1863, there were delivered by carriers 2,069,418 letters, and 1,810,717 collected for the mails and city delivery, being an increase of 968,825 letters (about 25 per cent.) over the preceding and last quarter under the old system. Returns from other offices indicate results equally flattering.

A table exhibiting the offices at which the new system is in operation, the number of carriers at each, with their aggregate compensation, appears in the Appendix, No. 3.

FOREIGN MAILS.

The aggregate amount of postage (inland, sea, and foreign) upon the mails exchanged during the year with Great Britain, Prussia, France, Hamburg, Bremen, and Belgium, was $1,224,675 21; an increase of $80,579 39, as compared with the preceding year. Of this amount $757,038 99 was collected in the United States, and $467,636 22 in Europe; the excess of collections in the United States being $289,402 77. The tables accompanying the report of the Auditor, and table No. 4, hereto annexed, show the details of the service between this and the several foreign postal departments.

The total postages upon mails exchanged with the British North American provinces was $225,743 30, being an increase of $47,959 79 over the amount reported for the previous year. Of this amount $124,480 45 was collected in the United States, and $101,262 85 in the British provinces. Excess in favor of the United States, $23,217 60.

The total postages upon the mails conveyed to and from the West Indies amounted to $54,997 24. Of which amount the sum of $40,584 87 was paid to the owners of the steamships performing the sea service to and from Havana and other West India ports.

The amount of United States postages on the mails exchanged with Central and South America, via Aspinwall and Panama, was $15,078 26—all of which was paid to Cornelius Vanderbilt, Esq., for the transportation thereof to and from Panama.

The total cost of the United States transatlantic mail steamship service was $332,184 80; being the aggregate amount of sea postage upon the mails conveyed. The earnings of the respective steamship lines performing the service were as follows, namely:

The Liverpool and New York and Philadelphia Steamship Company, performing fifty-three round trips between New York, Queenstown, and Liverpool....	$180,076 54
The Canadian line of mail steamers, performing fifty-two round trips between Portland and Liverpool, and Quebec and Liverpool.....	72,643 40
The North German Lloyd Steamship Company, performing fourteen and one half round trips between New York and Southampton.....	46,229 91
The New York and Hamburg Steamship Company, performing thirteen round trips between New York and Southampton.....	33,234 95

German Postal Union.

I regret to state that no progress has been made since my last report in the negotiations for a new postal convention with Prussia, embracing the States composing the German-Austrian Postal Union. It was then confidently expected that a new convention resulting in important reductions of postage, the conclusion of which was made to depend upon the concurrent action of Great Britain, would have been agreed upon at an early date. But on account of some obstacle presented by Austria in respect to a proposed reduction of the territorial transit charges upon British closed mails conveyed through that country, no result has been attained.

Great Britain.

Additional articles to the United States and British postal convention have been agreed upon, reducing the transit charges upon all closed mails sent by either country through the territory of the other to a uniform standard of fourpence (eight cents) per ounce for letters, and fivepence (ten cents) per pound for printed papers. The reduced rates, however, are not to take effect until the negotiations pending between the British post office and the German post offices, on the subject of a mutual exchange of closed mails, have been satisfactorily concluded. A copy of these additional articles is annexed, (No. 5.)

Additional articles have also been agreed upon between this Department and the British post office, establishing on the part of the United States a new office of exchange at San Francisco for the correspondence dispatched from the United Kingdom for California, Oregon, Washington Territory, the Sandwich Islands, British Columbia, and Vancouver's Island. A copy is annexed, (No. 6.)

Vancouver's Island and British Columbia.

The correspondence passing through the mails between the United States and the British provinces on the northwest coast of America having greatly increased in bulk within the past few years, it has become necessary to conclude postal conventions with the provinces of Vancouver's Island and British Columbia, establishing and regulating an interchange of mails. I have therefore proposed to the postal authorities of those provinces to adopt a similar arrangement to that in operation with Canada and the other British North American provinces. The proposition has been favorably received, and I hope soon to conclude postal conventions on that basis.

Costa Rica.

The rates of postage levied in Costa Rica upon the correspondence addressed to and received from the United States having been reduced by a decree of the legislative chambers of that republic, of the 1st September, 1862, to one half those previously charged, a like reduction of the United States postage, chargeable upon the correspondence sent to or received from Costa Rica, was ordered on the 18th of May, 1863, by and with the advice and consent of the President, in conformity with the provisions of the second section of the act of March 3, 1851. A reciprocal reduction was thus made in the rates of postage levied in each country, securing to international correspondence all the advantages proposed by the postal convention, as originally negotiated and approved by the Senate; but which, for the reason stated in my previous report, was not ratified by the Government of Costa Rica.

Ecuador.

I have also to state that negotiations are pending for a postal convention with Ecuador similar to that concluded with Guatemala.

Private Ships to convey Mails.

I take occasion to renew the recommendation made in my letter of March 3, 1862, addressed to Messrs. Collamer and Colfax, chairmen, respectively, of the Post Office Committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives, that all private ships or vessels departing from the United States for foreign ports should be required, as the condition of their clearance, to convey the mails upon such terms as are now or may hereafter be allowed by Congress.

International Postal Conference.

In my last annual report I stated some of the reasons which rendered general concert of action necessary between the Post Office Department of the United States and the postal administrations of foreign Governments. The conference, at that time proposed, assembled at Paris on the 11th day of May, 1863, and its deliberations were conducted under the presidency of the able Director General of Posts of France, M. Vandal. A more numerous representation of foreign Governments appeared than I had ventured to anticipate. Delegates were present from the post departments of Austria, Belgium, Costa Rica, Denmark, Spain, the United States, France, Great Britain, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Prussia, the Sandwich Islands, Switzerland, and the Hanseatic cities; and the Government of Ecuador adhered by letter to the action of the conference. The debates not only exhibited distinguished ability, and a thorough acquaintance with postal relations, but a most gratifying spirit of liberality towards the popular interests involved in international intercourse. In addition to the principles settled by the conference, the information with respect to different systems of administration, exchanged among the delegates, gave a new motive to postal improvement. Much valuable information touching foreign administrations, which was transmitted to this Department in the reports of the United States delegate, will aid me in the future improvements in our domestic administration which I hope to effect at an early period.

The following rules, thirty-one in number, were agreed upon by the conference:

SECTION 1. The articles which must or may be forwarded by the post from one country to another are divided into six classes: 1st, ordinary letters; 2d, registered letters, without declaration of value; 3d, registered letters containing declared value; 4th, corrected proof-sheets, business papers, and other written documents not of the nature of letters; 5th, samples of merchandise (including grains and seeds) of limited weight and without mercantile value; 6th, printed matter of all kinds in sheets, (stitched or bound,) sheets of music, engravings, lithographs, photographs, drawings, maps, and plans.

SEC. 2. Wherever it is possible, the prepayment of postage upon ordinary letters should be at the option of the sender; but, in case of such optional prepayment, unpaid letters must bear a moderate additional charge.

SEC. 3. Letters insufficiently prepaid by the postal stamps of the dispatching country must be rated as unpaid, deducting, however, the value of the stamps affixed.

SEC. 4. Registered letters, whether with or without declaration of value, must in all cases be prepaid to destination.

SEC. 5. All articles under bands, in order to take the benefit of a rate of postage less than that applicable to letters, must be prepaid.

SEC. 6. International correspondence of all kinds, duly prepaid to destination, shall not be charged with any additional rate whatever on delivery.

SEC. 7. The rates upon international correspondence shall be established according to the same scale of weight in all countries.

SEC. 8. The metrical decimal system, being that which best satisfies the demands of the postal service, shall be adopted for international postal relations, to the exclusion of every other system.

SEC. 9. The single rate upon international letters shall be applied to each standard weight of fifteen grammes, or fractional part of it.

SEC. 10. The single rate upon corrected proof-sheets, upon written documents not of the nature of letters, and upon samples of merchandise, (including seeds,) shall be applied to each standard weight of forty grammes, or fractional part thereof, to one address.

SEC. 11. The standard weight for the single rate upon articles under band, embraced in the sixth class of the first resolution aforesaid, must be established by special convention between the contracting parties.

SEC. 12. The rate upon letters must be fixed according to the weight stated by the dispatching office, except in case of manifest error.

SEC. 13. Registered letters, without declaration of value, shall be rated with a moderate fixed charge in addition to the rate applicable to ordinary letters of the same weight.

SEC. 14. Registered letters, containing declared value, shall be rated with a charge in proportion to the amount of the declared value, in addition to the postage and to the fixed charge applicable to the other class of registered letters.

SEC. 15. In case of loss of a registered letter without declared value, and in case of loss or spoliation of a registered letter with declared value, each office shall be held responsible for acts upon its own territory, and in the service for which it has received a premium of insurance. Fifty francs should be allowed to the sender of an unvalued registered letter lost, and for a valued registered letter so much of the declared value as shall have been lost or abstracted.

SEC. 16. Wherever intermediate transit charges render it practicable, the rates upon international correspondence should be the same, by whatever routes the mails may be conveyed.

Sec. 17. Where there are different mail routes, correspondence shall be dispatched by the route indicated by the sender upon the address, or by the rate of postage prepaid, if different rates exist. In the absence of such indications the dispatching office will determine the route which it considers most advantageous to the public interest.

Sec. 18. Unpaid letters, delivered by one administration to another for a country to which prepayment is compulsory, shall be returned to the dispatching office as wrongly sent.

Sec. 19. Articles under band and subject to a lower rate of postage, with compulsory prepayment, shall, in case of insufficient prepayment, be dispatched to their destination, charged with a suitable extra rate. If such articles are wholly unpaid, they shall not be dispatched.

Sec. 20. International postal accounts cannot be suppressed by a rule of general application; but they should be simplified as far as possible. For that purpose offices of exchange should not be required to return acknowledgments of receipt of mails, except for the correction of errors of the dispatching office.

Sec. 21. International post offices, accounting with each other for the rates and charges upon correspondence exchanged between them, whether in open or closed mails, shall account, as far as possible, by the piece for the correspondence in the open mails, and by the net weight for the correspondence in closed mails.

Sec. 22. Correspondence reforwarded by reason of a change of residence of the person addressed shall not, on that account, be liable to a supplementary charge in favor of offices interested in the postage previously accrued.

Sec. 23. Registered letters addressed to persons who have departed for a foreign country not interested in the postage prepaid shall be forwarded to the new residence of the persons addressed, charged with additional postage and with a supplementary registration fee, to be paid on delivery.

Sec. 24. International correspondence which shall have become dead shall be returned, without cost, to the dispatching office.

Sec. 25. As high transit charges upon correspondence present an insurmountable obstacle to the establishment of an international system of correspondence upon conditions advantageous to the public, the transit charge for each country shall never be higher than one half of the interior rate of the transit country, and for countries of small territorial extent this transit charge shall be even less.

Sec. 26. The cost of sea conveyance claimed by one country from another shall in no case be higher than the rate charged upon its own correspondence by the country by whose vessels the conveyance shall be effected.

Sec. 27. It is desirable that postal administrations having accounts with each other should serve as intermediaries for the transmission of sums of money from one country to another by means of international money-orders, whenever this can be effected without complications disproportionate to the advantages resulting from it.

Sec. 28. In case of the non-payment at the stipulated time of the balance due upon an adjustment of an international postal account, the amount of the balance shall bear interest from the expiration of the stipulated period at the rate agreed upon by convention.

Sec. 29. In the adjustment of uniform postal rates the greatest possible number of countries should be included in the same zone and subject to the same rate.

Sec. 30. Free conveyance of its official communications with other postal administrations should be granted to each postal administration.

Sec. 31. There should be a class of letters denominated "urgent," for delivery by express messengers, for which a special supplementary charge shall be paid.

I have adopted this basis of international postal intercourse for the treaties hereafter to be made under the direction of this Department, and hope to reorganize our foreign system on that plan. Advice has reached me that the Swiss administration has adopted the same system, and that the Governments of Belgium and of Italy have concurred. There is reason to believe that the other European Governments will also appreciate the importance of the uniformity and simplicity of postal action proposed by the conference, and will adhere to the principles of the Paris resolutions. A reduction of postal rates, combined with a large increase of postal correspondence, will naturally result from the inauguration of the new system. The enlightened sentiments expressed by the majority of the delegates lead me to hope that I shall be able to establish only two single rates of postage for letters on the one hand, and for all other postal correspondence on the other, exchanged between the United States and all parts of Europe.

It is my intention to publish a translation of the record of the conference as an appendix to this report.

I deem it proper, in concluding my remarks on this subject, to make known the fact that the public owes the suggestion to invite this international conference to Hon. John A. Kasson, who represented our Government in it with such zeal and ability as to command the thanks and warm approval of his associates. I do not doubt that important and lasting advantages are to flow from this conference, due in a great degree to his assiduity, practical ability, and earnestness in the cause of progress.

CONTRACT OFFICE. Transportation Statistics.

Table No. 7 A exhibits the service as it stood on the 30th of June last in the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Ohio, Western Virginia, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Missouri, Kentucky, California, Oregon, Kansas, and the Territories of New Mexico, Utah, Nebraska, Washington, Colorado, and Dakota, at which time there were in operation in those States and Territories 6,161 mail routes, the number of contractors being 5,595. The length of these routes was 139,598 miles, and the mode of service divided as follows: railroad, 22,152; steamboat, 44,744; with celerity, certainty, and security, 112,702.

The annual transportation of mails was 56,226,015 miles, costing $5,740,576, divided as follows: railroad, 22,871,558, at $2,538,517, about 11 cents a mile; steamboat, 2,004,771, at $224,542, about 11 1-5 cents a mile; with celerity, certainty, and security, 31,349,686, at $2,977,463, about 9 1/2 cents a mile.

The number of route agents in the service was 387, at a compensation of.....	$389,360 00
The number of local agents was 45, costing.....	27,824 00
The number of mail messengers was 1,466, costing.....	170,872 06
The number of baggage masters in charge of express mails was 93, costing.....	7,440 00
The number of agents employed on steamers conveying mails to southern ports was 8, costing.....	650 00
	496,046 06

This sum added to the cost of service in operation on the 30th of June, 1863.....	5,740,576 00

Mail Lettings of 1863.

The contract term for the southern section, comprising the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, expired on the 30th of June last, and the new term commenced on the 1st of July following. The lettings of contracts for this term embraced only the routes in Western Virginia, that being the only portion of the section in which the mails are transported under authority from this Department.

Compared with the service of the 30th of June, 1862, the length of routes is increased 5,585 miles, with an annual increase of transportation of 2,793,490 miles, at a decrease in cost of $113,258, being about two per cent. This saving is due principally to the result of the lettings of 1862 and the operations of the service under the system of considering such bids alone as are made according to the requirements of the act of March 3, 1845, for letting the contracts for transportation of the mails, and which has already been referred to in the report of 1862.

Other tables showing the operations of the Contract office are appended to this report. (See No. 7, B, C, and D.)

Mails on the Pacific and Atlantic.

The floods on the north Pacific coast winter before last, and the insurrection in the south Atlantic States, interrupted the overland mails for a few months on the west coast, and continue to interrupt them on the east. In both cases I have had recourse to the routes by sea for the conveyance of mails between the ports in our possession. These were formerly the usual routes, and there is no law prohibiting the use of them by the Department.

The Sixth Auditor has, however, refused to pay the contractors for this service, on the ground that contracts for service by sea between the ports of the United States are unauthorized by law, and illegal. He errs, I believe, both in the construction of the law and also as to the extent of his authority to revise and annul contracts made by the Postmaster General. It becomes necessary, therefore, for Congress to act on the subject to enable me to pay for the service already performed, and to continue it.

Overland Mails.

The contract on the overland route from St. Joseph, Missouri, to Placerville, California, authorized by the act of Congress of March 2, 1861, will expire by its own limitation on the 30th June, 1864. To continue the service, I have divided the route into four parts, and issued invitations for proposals to convey the mails on these divisions as separate routes, the whole, however, being united by continuous schedules so as to form one route, as at present, but terminating at Folsom City, the intersection of the Sacramento Valley railroad, instead of Placerville.

The act of Congress directing one continuous route limits the duration of the service under it to June 30, 1864. To continue the service beyond that date I have fallen back upon the various enactments of Congress, covering the whole line as post roads in detached portions. This seems to me to be the preferable mode of letting the service, and most likely to secure the best terms. Legislation will therefore only be needed to secure the conveyance by sea of printed matter intended for the west coast, and for raising the rates of postage on such matter for intermediate places on the overland route. The last day for receiving bids for these routes is, however, fixed for the 3d of March, 1864, allowing sufficient time for any action that Congress may deem best to adopt. The service on this route has been performed during the past year with commendable regularity and efficiency, and no accident, Indian hostility, or other casualty has occurred to prevent or retard the safe and prompt transmission of mails and passengers, the trips being, with rare exceptions, accomplished within the scheduled time.

The contract for the service between Sacramento, California, and Portland, Oregon, and Olympia, Washington Territory, authorized by the act approved June 21, 1860, will expire on the 15th September, 1864; and as the route was but an aggregation of previously existing routes, it has become necessary to return to the original authority of the Department over them, and invite bids for service on separate portions as before. This has been done by advertisement dated on the 15th October.

FINANCE OFFICE.

For the details of the financial operations of this Department during the past fiscal year, reference is made to the accompanying able and comprehensive report of the Auditor. From that document the following summary of the receipts and expenditures is derived:

Expenditures for 1863.

The expenditures of the Department during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1863, amounted to $11,314,266 84
In which is included the sum of $131,182 59 paid for mail transportation of previous years.

Revenue for 1863.

The gross revenue for the year 1863, including receipts from letter-carriers and from foreign postages, amounted to 11,163 769 59

Showing a deficiency of	$150,417 25

Report of the Postmaster General.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Reference to the Auditor's Report.

The Auditor's report, No. — of the Appendix, may be consulted for details of the revenue and expenditures under their several heads.

Deficiency of 1863.

The estimated deficiency of revenue for 1863, as presented in the annual report from this Department on the 2d December, 1861, was..... $3,845,000 00
Deduct the actual deficiency..... 150,417 25

Excess of estimated over actual deficiency..... $3,694,582 75

The discrepancy in this particular is thus accounted for. It was deemed expedient, as stated in the report above noted, to submit partial estimates for the cost of the postal service in States and districts where it was then suspended—in the greater portion of which, however, there has not as yet been any restoration of such service. The expenditures for 1863 were then estimated at $12,528,000, which is $1,364,210 41 in excess of the amount actually expended. On the other hand, the revenues of 1863 were estimated at the usual increase of four per cent. on those of 1861, (during the greater part of which year mail service was interrupted throughout the Union,) making $8,863,000, which is $2,480,789 59 less than the actual receipts—the latter being 33½ per cent. more than those of 1861.

Comparison of Receipts and Expenditures for 1860, 1862, and 1863.

The postal expenditure in 1860, the year immediately preceding the rebellion, was..... $14,874,772 59
The postal expenditure in 1863..... 11,314,206 84

Excess of expenditure in 1860..... $3,560,566 05

The actual revenue from postal receipts in 1863 was..... $11,163,789 59
The same in 1860..... 8,518,067 40

Excess of revenue in 1863..... $2,645,722 19

Showing that while the annual cost of postal service is at present three and a half millions less than when it was uninterrupted throughout the Union, the receipts therefrom are increased to the extent of more than two million six hundred thousand dollars:

The expenditures of 1863 were..... $11,314,206 84
The expenditures of 1862..... 11,125,364 13

Increase in 1863..... $188,842 71

The actual revenues of 1863 were..... $11,163,789 59
The actual revenues of 1862..... 8,209,820 90

Increase in 1863..... $2,953,968 69

From the above comparison of the receipts and expenditures of the last two fiscal years, it appears that the increase of expenditure in 1863 bears but a small proportion to the increase of the revenue, the one being about 6½ per cent. of the other.

The experience of the past year gives every reason to believe that the gross revenues of the Department for the year 1864 will equal, if they do not considerably exceed, the estimates thereof submitted in the last annual report, and that the expenditures will not surpass the amount therein stated. The appropriations already made for the service of the current fiscal year are therefore ample.

Estimates for 1865.

The expenditures of all kinds for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, (see table No. 9.) are estimated at $13,422,000 00
The gross revenue for the year 1865, including foreign postages and miscellaneous receipts, is estimated at an increase of five per cent. on the revenues of 1863, making 11,722,000 00
Estimated deficiency of revenue compared with estimated expenditures..... 1,700,000 00
But from this sum is to be deducted the amount of the permanent appropriations made by the acts of March 3, 1847, and of March 3, 1851, to compensate the Department for carrying free mail matter..... 700,000 00

By which the estimated deficiency is reduced to..... $1,000,000 00 being the whole amount estimated to be required from the Treasury for the year 1865.

The earnings of the Department in the transportation of free mail matter during the past fiscal year have not yet been expended.

In estimating the probable expenditures of 1865, under the several heads of appropriation, those of the last fiscal year have, in general, been taken as a basis of calculation. But an increase of certain items of anticipated expenditure has been made in order to provide, to some extent, for the cost of restoring the postal service of the United States in sections of the country now under insurrectionary control. To this cause alone is the estimated deficiency for 1865 to be attributed. But this deficiency is not one fifth of that of 1860—the latter being upwards of $5,600,000.

Number of Quarterly Returns received.

The whole number of post offices in operation during the year was 20,145, and the number of quarterly returns received therefrom was 78,239.

Drafts and Warrants.

The whole number of drafts and warrants issued during the year, in payment of balances reported by the Auditor to be due creditors of this Department, was 15,944. The warrants were drawn on the Treasurer of the United States, five Assistant Treasurers, and seven designated depositaries, and the drafts on twenty-five post office depositaries, and on postmasters at three hundred and fifty-eight draft offices.

Out of the net revenues of the Department for the year, the sum of $4,563,341 15, being over sixty per cent. thereof, was concentrated in the hands of the above-named depositaries and at draft offices. Of this amount, $3,882,454 93 was disbursed during the year, leaving $681,086 22 subject to draft on the 1st of July, 1863. The remainder of the net revenue was collected by mail contractors, by means of orders on postmasters at collection offices, prepared and sent out by the Auditor, and through payments by postmasters to mail messengers and special mail-carriers.

POSTAGE STAMPS AND STAMPED ENVELOPES.

Stamps and Envelopes issued.

The number of postage stamps, stamped envelopes, and newspaper wrappers, sent to postmasters during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1863, is given in detail in table No. 10, in the Appendix to this report. The value of the stamps issued during that period was $9,653,384; of stamped letter envelopes, $634,821; and of stamped newspaper wrappers, $20,545. The aggregate value of the issue of the year under notice, as compared with that of the preceding year, shows an increase of $2,503,668. (See table No. 11.)

Value of Stamps sold.

The total value of stamps and stamped envelopes sold by postmasters during the year, as ascertained from the records of the Auditor of the Treasury for this Department, was $9,624,529 62, which exceeds, by $2,714,397 73, the sales of the previous fiscal year.

New Denomination of Stamps and Envelopes.

The act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to the Post Office Department," having advanced the rate of postage upon drop letters and transient printed matter to two cents the single rate, new stamps and stamped envelopes of that denomination were prepared, and have been furnished to postmasters since the 1st of July last.

Cancellation of Postage Stamps.

During the past year indelible canceling inks have been used at the principal post offices, and the employment of printing ink for cancellation—the latter being much more difficult to efface than ordinary writing ink—has been continued at the smaller offices.

It is not believed that the Department has ever suffered any considerable loss from the use of washed or restored stamps, yet there has been a constant endeavor, either by the introduction of some effectual method of cancellation, or by a peculiar process in the manufacture of the stamps, to render impossible a second use thereof for the payment of postage. No improvement of this nature has yet been perfected, though much attention has been given to the subject, and many ingenious devices for this purpose invented. Instruments for cancellation, with cutting or abrading edges, have been submitted by various parties, and upon being thoroughly tested were found to be inherently defective; owing to their liability to injure, or to be injured by, the contents of letters or packets. These instruments, furthermore, speedily became dull or disarranged by ordinary use, requiring frequent sharpening or adjusting.

After much thought, and a thorough consideration of the many instruments and devices which have been submitted or suggested to the Department to attain the desired result, the conclusion has been reached that the only certain means of effectual cancellation is in the preparation of the stamps in such manner that, when once affixed to a letter, they cannot be removed therefrom without involving their destruction; or by their being printed in colors sufficiently permanent to resist the action of air and light, but which would readily be effaced by any agent intended to remove the canceling marks. Three varieties of postage stamps, alleged to possess one or the other of these qualities, have been submitted to the Department, and their respective merits are under consideration.

Losses of Postmasters from Robbery by Armed Men.

I beg leave to renew the recommendation made in my last annual report, that special provision be made by Congress authorizing the Postmaster General to adjust and allow, upon the presentation of proper evidence of loss, the claims of such postmasters as may have sustained losses of postage stamps and stamped envelopes by reason of the occupation and robbery of their offices by bodies of armed men. There have been reported to the Department about one hundred cases of this description, and the aggregate amount of claims thereupon will not exceed $6,000. It is a circumstance worthy of consideration, that in most if not in all of these instances these postmasters have suffered greatly by the destruction of their private property. The Post Office Department, under existing regulations, not having the authority to make an allowance for the loss of public property by robbery or theft, the only remedy is in the hands of Congress.

Theft of Stamps from Post Offices.

Additional legislation is also required in respect to post office thefts. The stealing of postage stamps from a post office is not made a felony under any existing statute. Some months since three persons were convicted in Indiana of the robbery of a post office in that State, and the stealing of letters and a considerable amount of postage stamps. The former not having been proved to contain "any article of value or evidence thereof," and there being no penal enactment against the taking of the latter, the parties were necessarily sentenced to punishment for one of the slightest offenses against the postal laws, having been each fined five dollars, and imprisoned three months. I would suggest the establishment, by statute, of a suitable penalty for offenses of this nature. The best mode, perhaps, of attaining this result would be the enactment of a law making it a penal offense to steal from or forcibly enter into any room or building which may, at the time of such stealing or entry, be used or occupied as a post office.

DEAD LETTERS.

Number of Dead Letters received.

The whole number of ordinary dead letters of every description received and examined during the year was 2,550,416, being 268,398 more than in the preceding year.

Money and other Valuable Letters.

The number of these letters which contained money was 18,527, and the value of their contents was $77,861 31, showing an increase over the number of letters of this class received during the previous year of 8,052, or 76 per cent., and an increase in the amount of money inclosed of $31,322 42, or 67 per cent.

Of these letters there were registered and mailed for delivery to their respective owners during the last fiscal year 18,219, of which 15,048, containing $63,627 72, were finally delivered. To bring about the latter result it was necessary to send out many of these letters a second time, and some of them, in consequence of the owners' change of residence, or for other cause, were sent out three or four times in order to secure their restoration.

The number of dead letters covering deeds, bills of exchange, drafts, and other valuable papers, received, registered, and returned for delivery to the writers, was 8,332, and the aggregate nominal value of their contents was $1,544,277 81, being a decrease in the number of this class of letters, as compared with the previous year, of 1,431, and in the value of the inclosures of $645,172 19. Of these letters 7,559 were delivered to the owners.

During the year 16,763 valuable letters or packages of a third class were received and registered. Of these 12,579 were sent out for delivery, 10,918 of which contained daguerreotypes or photographs, 764 articles of jewelry, and 897 miscellaneous articles. Out of the whole number sent from the dead letter office for delivery, 8,273 were restored to the writers or senders.

There has been a continued increase in the receipts of letters of the class under notice, the great majority of which contain daguerreotypes or card photographs, and of these a large proportion are sent by soldiers or their correspondents. The whole number of such dead letters exceeds by 85 per cent. the amount thereof received in the preceding year. It will be observed that while there has been a very considerable increase in the quantity of dead letters containing money, and of those covering daguerreotypes and miscellaneous articles, the number of such as contain deeds, bills of exchange, drafts, &c., has sensibly diminished. The increase of the two former classes is doubtless owing, in a great degree, to the fact that the mails are very generally used by the large number of persons in the military service of the United States, and by their numerous correspondents, for the transmission of money, photographs, and similar articles of value, while, on the other hand, they have less occasion to forward by mail deeds, drafts, or negotiable paper, than other classes of the community. The nature of the military service, and the many accidents to which soldiers are liable, necessitates frequent changes of locality, which retard or prevent the delivery of their letters, and many of these are, in consequence, sent to the dead letter office. Upwards of five thousand money letters, being nearly one fourth of the whole of that class of letters received during the year, were addressed to soldiers.

Reasons for Losses of Valuable Letters.

For the reasons above indicated, complaints of the loss of money letters sent by or directed to soldiers and their families have been numerous. In many instances such losses were directly traced to dishonest letter-carriers in the military service, and therefore beyond the control of this Department. Moreover, many letters are lost through carelessness and indifference on the part of some of the persons who distribute mail matter in our armies. The power to correct or to lessen this evil rests with commanding officers, who would do their subordinates a great service by selecting competent and reliable persons to superintend the reception, transmission, and delivery of mail matter, and holding them responsible for the faithful performance of these duties.

Money Order System.

In this connection I beg leave to renew the recommendation made in my last annual report, that a postal money order system be established to facilitate the transmission of small sums of money through the mails, which I am confident would not only prove a great convenience to civilians and soldiers, but would almost entirely obviate the loss of money letters, the great majority of which inclose small remittances.

Causes of Non-delivery of Valuable Letters.

Upon an examination of the reasons for the non-delivery of valuable letters, in the first instance, to the persons addressed, it is found that, in accordance with the past experience of this Department, the failure of a letter to reach its destination is, in the vast majority of instances, the fault either of the writer or person addressed—such failure being more frequently caused by a change of residence of the latter.

Full details of the operations of the dead letter office, with respect to "money," "minor," and "miscellaneous" letters, will be found in the Appendix, tables Nos. 12, 13, and 14.

In compliance with a request from the War Department, 8,822 dead letters and packets, containing soldiers' descriptive lists and certificates of discharge, have been transmitted to the Adjutant General, after being carefully registered in this Department.

It appears from the foregoing statements that the whole number of valuable dead letters registered and sent out from the dead letter office during the past fiscal year was 42,613, being 17,202 more than during the previous year.

In addition to the above, 55,044 letters containing postage stamps or other articles of less than one dollar in value, and which were not deemed of sufficient importance to require registration, have been returned to the writers or senders. Letters of this description which are not susceptible of restoration are destroyed, with their contents. The number of postage stamps destroyed in conformity with this practice, from July 1, 1862, to 30th June, 1863, was 43,748, and the aggregate value thereof was $1,318.

Letters held for Postage, &c.

The number of letters which could not be forwarded from the offices where mailed, or be delivered therefrom, because of unpaid postage, or because so badly directed, and which were consequently sent to the dead letter office, amounted to 196,414. The number thereof "held for postage" was 167,894, the number "held for carrier's fee" 9,954, (all of which latter were contributed exclusively by the offices at Boston, New York, and Philadelphia;) and the number "misdirected" and imperfectly or illegibly addressed was 18,566, of which nearly two thousand were without any address or direction whatever, and in several instances contained sums of money or other inclosures of value.

The class of letters under consideration was disposed of as follows, namely: 157,352 were dispatched to the writers or persons addressed; 753, which originated in foreign countries with which we have no postal conventions, were filed to await application; and the remainder, consisting of notices, advertisements, prospectuses of gift enterprises, fraudulent lottery circulars, valentines, and similar worthless matter, were destroyed.

Table No. 15, accompanying this report, shows the number of letters held for postage or carrier's fee, or because misdirected, at forty-six of the principal offices, together with the number delivered upon notification to the person addressed, and the number sent to the dead letter office.

Under the provisions of the new postal law, which went into operation on the 1st July, 1863, letters are no longer detained in post offices on account of unpaid postage or carrier's fee.

Letters addressed to Points in the Rebellious States.

By reason of the continued suspension of regular postal communication with sections of the country under insurrectionary control, a considerable number of letters, amounting in the aggregate to 24,314, found their way, by various channels, to the dead letter office. Of these letters the number addressed to rebel localities was 21,200, and out of this number 17,888 were of domestic, and 3,312 of foreign origin. The former were marked "mails suspended," and sent back to the writers; and the latter were returned, with a similar indorsement, to the countries where they originated. Of the class under consideration, 3,114 were written in localities not subject to the authority of the United States Government. Nearly all letters of this description were placed in the custody of this Department by the military authorities, who very properly have entire control of the transmission of correspondence beyond or into their lines; and most of them were originally sent unsealed to the commanding officer at Fortress Monroe by flag of truce. These letters were, after examination, duly mailed to the persons addressed, charged with dead letter postage.

Ordinary Dead Letters.

Under the authority given to the Postmaster General by the act approved January 21, 1863, 1,007,255 ordinary dead letters, not evidently worthless, were placed in new envelopes and returned to the offices where originally mailed, to be delivered to the writers. Of this number, 4,898 were sent to banks and insurance companies; 89,642 to business firms, and the remainder to individuals. Nineteen thousand and two of these letters, which were directed to sick and wounded soldiers in hospitals, and failed to reach the persons addressed, were returned free of postage to the writers, generally relatives of soldiers, and the greater portion of them were delivered. The number of dead letters of the class under notice, written in foreign languages, was 35,861. (For details see table No. 16.)

Of the whole number sent out for restoration to the writers, 287,211, being about twenty-five per cent., were again returned to the Department. In the great majority of instances the reasons assigned by the postmaster for such return were, "not called for," "not known," or "not found." The proportion "refused" was comparatively small, not exceeding twelve per cent. Since the reduction in the rate of dead letter postage from six to three cents, which took effect on the 1st of July last, this proportion has steadily decreased.

After deducting from the whole number of letters sent out such as were returned a second time, and those sent free of postage, including hospital letters, &c., there remained 692,220 letters on which dead letter postage was collected at six cents each, yielding a gross revenue to the Department of $41,533 20, which exceeds by $21,533 20 the aggregate compensation of the clerks employed in sending out these letters. At the present reduced rate of three cents for a single return letter, there would still have been a surplus of $1,533 20, while it is confidently believed that a much larger number of return letters will hereafter be delivered to the writers, not only in consequence of the reduction of dead letter postage under the new postal law, but also of the more prompt restoration of such letters. To secure the latter result the Department has instructed postmasters to forward to the dead letter office, except in special cases, all letters remaining unclaimed one month after being advertised, instead of two months, as formerly.

Foreign Dead Letters.

The number of dead letters returned unopened to foreign countries during the year was 137,145, and the amount of unpaid postage thereon was $8,281 40. The number received in the same condition from foreign countries was 51,619, on which the unpaid postage amounted to $1,479 53. (See tables Nos. 17 and 18.)

It was found that among the unpaid foreign dead letters a considerable number directed to officers and soldiers in the field remained undelivered, not having been claimed nor postage paid thereon by the persons addressed, although a notice is directed to the latter by postmasters in every case. To secure the delivery of as many of these letters as possible, a record of them was carefully kept since the 17th of April last, and a list of those directed to each regiment was sent monthly to the commanding officer, with a request that if the person addressed was still attached to the regiment, an application, accompanied with the amount of postage due, might be made for his letter; if not, that the cause of his absence from the regiment might be stated. By this means, out of 1,527 letters of this class, 323 were delivered, and some 800, before being returned to foreign countries, were indorsed with a statement of the cause of non-delivery, such as "dead," "discharged," "dismissed," "resigned," &c.—information which in many instances could not fail to prove important to the writer, who is usually a relative of the soldier.

Correspondence Unpaid and not Franked.

By the provisions of the thirty-second section of the new postal law, which took effect on the 1st of July, 1863, all correspondence addressed to any Executive Department, or to any officer therein, must be prepaid, except official communications written by some officer of the Department, or an officer under its control or responsible to it, and in such cases it is required that the officer shall sign his name, with his official designation, under the words "official business" on the envelope.

As correspondence of this nature had invariably been transmitted free of postage under former postal laws, a rigid enforcement of the restriction in question was not at first attempted, until sufficient time had elapsed for the public to become familiar with the requirements of the new law.

It was found, however, at the expiration of more than two months, that private individuals corresponding with the Departments generally neglected or evaded the payment of postage on their correspondence, which was duly forwarded to its destination with the unpaid postage charged at double rates. Great numbers of communications not franked by the military or civil officers writing them were similarly disposed of.

The tendency of this state of things was to relieve persons from the necessity of paying postage on communications to the Executive Departments, and thereby to render the provision in question inoperative. Hence it became necessary to direct postmasters to forward all mail matter for the Departments, which was not prepaid or franked, to the dead letter office, where it is examined, and, when practicable, returned to the writer for payment of the postage, or for his official frank, as the case may require. This plan involves considerable additional labor in the office, but it has almost entirely stopped the practice of evading or neglecting the payment of postage. Large numbers of official letters, however, addressed to the several bureaus of the War and Navy Departments, are still sent without any frank by officers at remote stations, who, by reason of their situation, have doubtless failed to receive information of the requirements of the new law.

REVISED CODE OF LAWS.

In concluding this report, I would ask the consideration by Congress of the revised code of the laws relating to the Post Office Department, which was submitted by me at its last session, and which is for the most part but a digest of the existing postal laws, the provisions of which would be but slightly affected by the modifications therein suggested.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. BLAIR,
Postmaster General.

The PRESIDENT.

OATH OF OFFICE.

SPEECH OF HON. J. A. BAYARD, OF DELAWARE,
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 19, 1864.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution of Mr. SUMNER:

Resolved, That the following be added to the rules of the Senate:

The oath or affirmation prescribed by act of Congress of July 2, 1862, to be taken and subscribed before entering upon the duties of office, shall be taken and subscribed by every Senator in open Senate before entering upon his duties. It shall also be taken and subscribed in the same way by the Secretary of the Senate; but the other officers of the Senate may take and subscribe it in the office of the Secretary.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. SAULSBURY, to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert the following:

That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether Senators and Representatives in Congress are included within the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862, and whether the said act is in accordance or in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The resolution now before the Senate was proposed by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] in March last, and afterwards withdrawn. As I am the only member of the Senate present at this session who has not taken the oath, it is but a rational inference that the rule now proposed is intended to operate personally upon me, although I was sworn in at the special session and acted as a Senator both on committees and in the Senate since my reelection in March last for the term of six years, ending on the 3d of March, 1869. In the objections, however, which I have to present to this proposed rule, I shall consider it without reference to any personal effect it may have upon my own action.

The object of the resolution is to enforce an act of Congress entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862. Were I disposed to raise collateral questions, it might well be contended that if the rule were adopted it would have no application to a Senator who had been sworn in, taken his seat, and acted as a member of the body. I shall raise no such question; but I have the right to ask for the judicial decision of the Senate, both as to the constitutionality of the act and its correct construction.

The adoption or rejection of this rule involves two general questions. First, is the act on which it professes to be founded repugnant to the Federal Constitution, or is it within the powers delegated to Congress? Second, is a member of the Senate included by its provisions when construed according to the language and meaning of the Federal Constitution? Before proceeding to the discussion of these questions I must recur to the history of this act in its progress through Congress, and the subsequent action of the Senate after its passage.

The bill originated in the House of Representatives. When it came to the Senate, after its passage in the House, it was referred, on the 5th of June, 1862, to the Committee on the Judiciary. On the following Wednesday, the 11th of June, it was reported back without amendment. It was called up during the morning hour on the 13th of June, and reported to the Senate without amendment, and read a third time without debate. Then, on a suggestion made by my colleague with reference to the office of President and the oath to be administered to him, a debate arose; the yeas and nays were called for and ordered; but the debate was very short and the bill went over.

It was again called up by the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary on the 21st of June, and he then moved to reconsider the third reading of the bill, and proposed an amendment which was intended to exclude from the operation of the bill the President of the United States. The amendment proposed was to insert these words:

"For whom the form of the oath of office is not prescribed by the Constitution."

All other persons holding office were to be sworn. To that amendment the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] moved a further amendment excepting the Vice President and Senators and Representatives in Congress. On that amendment to the amendment a debate arose, which was sustained by the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] against that proposed amendment, and by the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] and my colleague in favor of it. I took no part in that debate nor in any subsequent debate on the bill.

The following Monday, the 23d of June, it came up as a special order, and was discussed very briefly by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. CARLILE,] the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] and the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] in favor of his amendment, and by the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. TRUMBULL] against it. The vote was taken on that day, and the amendment adopted by a vote of 20 to 18. I was not present, and did not vote, and some other members of the Senate were also absent; but the vote wanted but five votes of being a majority of the whole Senate as it then stood.

Other amendments were then made, and the bill passed. There was no division on any other amendment which was adopted, and they were all of little moment. No other ground was taken in support of the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Kentucky than that it was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States to include Senators and Representatives within the terms of the law, because it altered their qualifications.

On the 25th of June the House disagreed to all the amendments of the Senate, and asked a committee of conference, and on the 26th of June the Senate insisted, and a committee of conference was appointed by the Chair, then filled by a President pro tempore. From inadvertence no doubt—contrary to the usual course of parliamentary proceedings—a majority of the committee of the Senate were selected of members who were opposed to the sense of the body, as evidenced in the vote to which I have alluded, being also the only vote on which a division took place, where the amendment was adopted. The result was inevitable. The committee, after meeting the House committee, reported that the House receded from their disagreement to all the other amendments, and that they modified the amendment which had been adopted by the Senate—the only material one—by excepting solely the President of the United States. When that report came up in the Senate, the question was simply on the acceptance of the report of the committee of conference; and on the 30th of June the report of the committee was agreed to by the Senate. Every one knows that under those circumstances no decision is involved of any question connected with the propriety of the law or its constitutionality, but the mere question of an assent to a report of a committee of conference, which must be assented to for the whole, or rejected for the whole. I think, a very unwise parliamentary practice which has obtained in this body from its earliest history. The vote then taken cannot be considered as overruling the direct decision made by a majority of the Senate who voted in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, that the law was unconstitutional if it included members of Congress.

At the next session of the Senate, commencing in December, 1862, the same Senate remaining, four Senators took their seats in this body under elections held subsequent to the passage of that law. They took the oath prescribed by the act of 1790, and no other oath: none other was suggested, none other was demanded by any member of the Senate or by the body itself. They held their seats during the terms for which they were elected, and performed all the functions of Senators under the ordinary constitutional oath. At the special session the new members and those who had been reelected were all sworn in under the ordinary constitutional oath, and after that the rule now proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts was proposed. It was introduced on the 5th of March and laid over; debated during the 6th alone; and during that debate, by some sort of agreement, the rule was withdrawn, and by voluntary action Senators took the new oath, without any order on the part of the Senate or any decision upon the constitutionality of the law or its construction as including members of Congress.

The fair inference from this statement of facts—and that is the object with which it is made—would seem to be that the majority who voted on June 23, 1862, for the amendment excepting members of Congress, did so on the ground that if the act included them it would be repugnant to the Constitution, because no other ground in favor of the amendment of the honorable Senator from Kentucky was assigned than the constitutional objection to the power of Congress to add to the qualifications of a member by prescribing an oath varying in substance from the oath required by the Constitution. That such was the opinion of a majority of the Senate may also be inferred from the fact that the four Senators to whom I have referred were suffered to assume the functions of their office under elections made subsequent to the passage of the law, and to hold their seats during their terms without taking the oath prescribed in the act of 1862, though it was as applicable to them, if valid and constitutional, as it is now to myself or to any other member of this body. The objections to the law, therefore, cannot be considered as trivial, but are of the gravest character, or such could not have been the action of the Senate since its passage.

As by the Constitution the Senate is the proper and only tribunal which can decide any question relating to the election, returns, or qualifications of its members, the obligatory force of the act of July, 1862, comes judicially before the body on this resolution proposing to enforce that act by a new rule. The first clause of the fifth section of article one of the Constitution makes each House the judge of all such questions. It gives no authority to either House to prescribe new qualifications for its members; but it confers the judicial authority to determine whether the member has been elected and whether he is duly qualified according to the provisions of the Constitution—no more, no less. Therefore any question arising under an act of Congress in relation to the election, return, or qualifications of a member, is subject to the judicial revision of the House of which he is or claims to be a member, as fully as any other question relating to the constitutionality of a law and its correct construction would be so subject by the courts when a case presented it. Nor is the argument in favor of the obligation of the law because the Senate in its legislative capacity has sanctioned it of greater weight when the question of its obligation and construction is brought before them judicially than it would be if the Senate were sitting as a court of impeachment, or, in the Supreme Court of the United States, if in a case before it the constitutional obligation and correct construction of an act of Congress was involved. In either case the action is judicial revision, which is essential in every free government.

I proceed now, sir, to the discussion of the two questions which I have previously stated are involved in the decision of the resolution before the Senate.

This act of July 2, 1862, is repugnant to at least three, I think four, provisions of the Federal Constitution. It is invalid because it prescribes a further qualification for a member of Congress before entering upon the performance of his duties. This was the question, and the only question, argued before the passage of the law, or noticed in the debate. It will scarcely be denied at this day that the Government of the United States, the Federal Government, is one of enumerated or specially delegated powers, and that, though paramount in its sphere, it can exercise no powers but those which have been delegated or such as are necessary and proper to carry delegated powers into execution; that it stands in that respect contradistinguished from the State governments, which, though subordinate to the General Government, within the limits of its delegated powers, yet possess those indefinite powers of sovereignty and legislation which vest in any government not so organized as is the Federal Government under a special delegation of authority. This distinction, however, between the two forms of government is not essential to my argument on this branch of the case.

The third clause of the third section of article one of the Constitution prescribes the qualifications of a Senator—age, residence, and citizenship; the age thirty years; residence at the time of election in the State which elects him; and citizenship for nine years preceding the election. The third clause of the sixth article requires that Senators and Representatives shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution. Does this provision admit any oath varying in substance from the oath so required? It has been admitted, and indeed cannot well be denied, that no oath other than that of which the form is prescribed in the Constitution can be imposed upon the President of the United States; and upon the same principle the substance of the oath prescribed for Senators and Representatives, and members of the State Legislatures, and all officers of the States as well as of the United States, must be adhered to, though Congress may unquestionably prescribe the form in which it is to be administered. Variations of form are quite immaterial. The form adopted originally was prescribed by the first act of the first Congress of the United States, and will be found at page 23 of the first volume of the Statutes at Large. I refer to it both for its simplicity and to show the views which that body took of the authority they were exercising, that it was merely the prescription of the form of an oath required by the Constitution. The first section is:

"That the oath or affirmation required by the sixth article of the Constitution of the United States shall be administered in the form following, to wit: I, A B, do solemnly swear or affirm (as the case may be) that I will support the Constitution of the United States."

The power assumed in that act was merely to prescribe the form of the oath required by the Constitution, by legislation, and that power is not questioned. I cannot doubt that as regards members of Congress either House might have prescribed the form by its own resolution; but for the sake of uniformity, as the oath is required by the Constitution, of course it was wiser that a general provision should be made by legislation. Indeed, this law recognizes the fact that either House would have possessed that authority, because it provides that the oath shall be administered within three days to every member, and also to the members and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who had not taken a similar oath by virtue of a resolution of the House.

But there was a question raised at that time as to whether Congress had the power and the duty of prescribing the form of oath for members of a State Legislature and officers of a State government; and it was from the debate on that question that very free extracts were made during the special session, which I consider irrelevant to the present discussion. No one doubts now, no one contends now, that Congress has not the power to prescribe the form of the oath not only for Senators and Representatives, but for all officers of the United States, and for officers of State governments and members of State Legislatures. The objection to this oath is not that it varies the form adopted in 1790, but the objection is that it in substance varies from the oath required by the Constitution; and "required" means "authorized by the Constitution." Nor would I make captious objections under any circumstances to any form of oath which Congress might see fit to prescribe, though I might prefer the simpler form adopted in the first instance. But, Mr. President, this law contains two oaths distinct in their nature, distinct in their substance. I will read the act for the purpose of comment hereafter:

"That hereafter every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States, either in the civil, military, or naval departments of the public service, excepting the President of the United States, shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation:

"I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought nor accepted nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States hostile or inimical thereto."

Then follows the form of the oath required by the Constitution, varying from though not improving the form prescribed in the first instance:

"And I do further swear (or affirm) that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God."

To the latter oath which is contained in this law I have no objections to make. I may and do consider that it is awkwardly and inartificially drawn, with not a little of verbiage and surplusage, but in substance it includes nothing that is not included in an oath to support the Constitution. An oath to support the Constitution and an oath to bear true allegiance to the United States and support the Constitution are substantially the same; because a party sworn to support the Constitution must violate his oath if he does not bear true allegiance to his country. So, too, an oath to perform his duties with fidelity and support the Constitution is equally but a variation in form. It is in substance an oath to support the Constitution, because when the party accepts the office and swears to support the Constitution the obligation imposed upon him, both by the office and the oath, is that he will perform his duties with fidelity. So, too, the insertion of the words that he shall support it "against foreign and domestic enemies" is but a variation of form. If he supports the Constitution of his country it must be against any enemies, be they foreign or domestic. It is also but a variation of form to require that the member shall swear that he takes the oath "without mental reservation or evasion." According to any code of morals with which I am conversant no honest man could make a mental reservation in taking an oath; and, beyond all question, a court of law would treat such a defense on an indictment for perjury as merely frivolous.

In all these respects I hold the second oath—for it is a second oath prescribed in this law—as simply a variation in form from that prescribed in the act of 1790; and though I prefer the simpler form originally prescribed I should never have objected to any form of the constitutional oath which Congress saw fit to prescribe. The oath required by the Constitution is a promissory oath, which but adds the sanction of religion to the obligation of duty imposed by the acceptance of the office or trust; and such an oath, I may add, is both proper and requisite in all Governments.

But the oath prescribed in the first clause of the act of 1862 varies in substance from that required by the Constitution. It is no longer a question of form; it is not a promissory oath relating to the present and the future; but it is an expurgatory test oath retrospective in its character, and covering the events of the affiant's past life. The Constitution authorizes an oath appealing to the conscience alone for the future performance of duty. The oath embodied in the first portion of this act of 1862 is retrospective as to his acts, and makes it a necessary qualification that he shall purge himself as to his past conduct under a penalty.

Surely, Mr. President, if a variation in the form of the oath prescribed for the President of the United States cannot be made, the same principle must equally, by necessary implication, exclude any change in the substance of the oath prescribed for members of Congress or of State Legislatures, unless, indeed, you consider that the shadow has more reality than the body of which it is but the reflection. The evil here lies in the precedent which will be made by sanctioning this law as constitutional. If the power exists in Congress to pass a law of this nature, to require an oath of this character, an expurgatory test oath relating to the offense of treason, then the power is without limits as to any crime or offense whatever, and Congress may require every member elected to purge himself by oath not only from some other particular offense but from all offenses of any kind against the laws of the United States. Indeed, the power is without limit, except the very slender one that a religious test cannot be required. An existing majority would have the authority, if this power be vested in Congress, to exclude by the oath which they prescribed every one who differed from them in opinion as to any particular subject, or any particular act of legislation, or even as to any particular proclamation of the existing Executive. They might make the oath promissory alone by requiring the party to swear that he would support the particular law though he believed it unconstitutional and void; or to swear that he would support the particular proclamation of the President though he believed it an excess of executive power; and thus a mere majority of the Legislature might exclude all who differed in opinion from them in reference to any subject whatever. Or they might go further, on the principle of this law, if it be sound, and require that the member elected should swear not only as to the future, but as to the past that he had always supported either a particular act of Congress from the time of its passage or a particular proclamation of the Executive from the time of its promulgation.

Such a power existing in the legislature of a representative republic would gradually but certainly, by one precedent following another—for bad precedents are always followed—end in the subversion of the form of government.

Sir, let me suggest one oath which might be required or prescribed by Congress if this precedent is now sanctioned. No one doubts that intemperance is a great evil, widespread and destructive to the community at large. Very many honest and conscientious men have entertained the opinion that the only mode in which it can be restrained and diminished is by penal legislation operating both upon the sale and the consumption of intoxicating liquors. The system of penal legislation in reference to this vice has obtained in some of the States of the Union, and has been the subject of political controversy in several others. Let me suppose it should so happen (and it is certainly not beyond the bounds of probability) that a majority of total abstinence men should become members of the two Houses of Congress, what may be the result if you sanction by this precedent the authority of Congress to prescribe an oath of this kind? It is true that it is not probable they would attempt to pass a law requiring an expurgatory oath from members afterwards elected, that they had never in the past tasted either wines or other intoxicating drinks, because the prescription of such an oath would prevent the organization of any subsequent House of Representatives and dissolve the Senate within four years. But it might be urged with great force, if this power exists, that a very effectual restraint would be imposed upon the vice of intemperance if an oath were prescribed pledging each member of Congress, under the penalty of perjury, that he would not taste intoxicating liquor during the term of his trust, or at any time subsequently. It might well be considered by men of extreme opinions, who look only to the character of the evil to be remedied, and disregard the mode in which the remedy is to be attained, that such legislation would be advisable and beneficial. Nor is it improbable that such legislation might result, because beyond all question if the power exists to prescribe the oath against which I am now contending, then the power would exist, if Congress saw fit to exercise it, to require every member before entering upon his duties to take an oath that he will not hereafter during the term for which he is chosen or during the residue of his life use any intoxicating liquor except in the case of sickness and on the prescription of a physician.

It might be urged in support of such legislation that intemperate habits impair in all cases, and in some destroy, the capacity of the representative for the performance of his duties, and that therefore such a mode of restraint would be not only effective but peculiarly appropriate. The mistake lies in this, that in the desire to effect an object that may be good in itself, men lose sight of the illegitimacy of the means by which they seek to effect it. The objection to this law is not the object that it professes to seek, but the excess of power involved in its passage, and the only safe maxim in all cases of usurpation of power or attempted usurpation is obsta principiis. One precedent is followed by another, and it is by these successive inroads on the organic law that ultimately a free government degenerates into mere despotism.

This question which I have been discussing is one of principle, and there are but few authorities which bear upon it. In the Commentaries of Judge Story, in commenting upon a suggestion of Mr. Jefferson that the State governments had power to alter the qualifications of their members of Congress, he sustains the position I have contended for, that the qualifications prescribed in the Constitution cannot be varied or added to by congressional and State legislation. He controverts, and I think conclusively answers the suggestion of Mr. Jefferson, that a State, under its reserved rights, has the power by legislation to impose additional qualifications upon its own members. No commentator or jurist has hitherto ever pretended that Congress could alter or vary the qualifications prescribed in the Constitution. In answer to the suggestion as to the authority of a State Legislature, Judge Story says—I read from section six hundred and twenty-four of his Commentaries—

This is an answer to the suggestion of Mr. Jefferson; but the principle is equally applicable here—

“It would seem but fair reasoning upon the plainest principles of interpretation, that when the Constitution established certain qualifications as necessary for office it meant to exclude all others as prerequisites. From the very nature of such a provision, the affirmation of these qualifications would seem to imply a negative of all others.”

“A power to add new qualifications is certainly equivalent to a power to vary them. It adds to the aggregate what changes the nature of the former requisites.”

Again, in section six hundred and twenty-seven, pursuing the same argument in reply to Mr. Jefferson's idea that authority was vested in the State Legislatures to add additional qualifications for the members from their own States, he says:

“The people of the State, by adopting the Constitution, have declared what their will is as to the qualifications for office. And here the maxim, if ever, must apply, Expressio unius est exclusio alterius.”

It cannot be said that this oath is not a qualification for office, because the very terms of the law make it so; it is so imposed, and the party cannot enter upon the duties of the office before the oath is taken if the law be valid.

I proceed now, sir, to notice the arguments as I gather them of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] who was the sole sustainer of this law in the debate that occurred before its passage. I understood his arguments to resolve themselves into two positions: one was that the oath to support it is required by the Constitution to be administered both to members of State Legislatures and officers of State governments as well as to members of Congress; and as in every State of the Union, from the foundation of the Government, in addition to that oath there has been administered a totally distinct oath to State officers and members of the State Legislatures to support the constitution of their own States and perform the duties of their offices with fidelity, therefore the inference must be drawn that Congress would have the power also to require an oath different in substance, in character, and in nature from that which the Constitution required. The answer to this position seems to me very plain. The oath taken by the member of a State Legislature to support his own State constitution is under a distinct authority and required by a distinct and separate government. It has no relation whatever to his obligation to take this oath under the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution of the United States does not profess to prescribe the qualifications of members of State Legislatures or officers of State governments; but it does profess to prescribe the qualifications of Senators and Representatives in Congress. The distinction seems to me so clear my only surprise is that so acute an intellect as that of the honorable Senator from Illinois should present such an argument in favor of the constitutionality of this law. As the Federal Government, within its delegated powers, is paramount to the State governments, an oath to support the Constitution of the United States was both proper and requisite.

The honorable Senator also relied upon, and quoted at length, the oath administered to the judges of the United States courts on being sworn into office, as an evidence that Congress might alter the substance of the oath which was required by the Constitution. I have endeavored already to anticipate that objection. The oath administered to the Chief Justice and other judges, which requires that, in addition to supporting the Constitution, they shall administer justice equally between man and man without regard to the poverty or riches of the suitors, is surely nothing more in substance than an oath to support the Constitution. The same duty devolves upon them, under an oath to support the Constitution, the moment they accept office and are sworn in. They would not support the Constitution if they perverted the ends of justice and maladministered the law between individuals founded on inequalities of wealth and position.

The honorable Senator also cited a case from 20 Johnson's Reports, the case of Barker vs. The People, in error, which he supposed strengthened his position in favor of the constitutionality of this act. In truth, so far as the decision in the supreme court of New York went, it has no relation to the principle involved here. The case was this: Barker was indicted under a law of New York, which, in one of its sections, provided that where a person sent a challenge or fought a duel he should be liable, on conviction, in addition to other punishments, to be punished by disqualification for office. Barker was so indicted and convicted, and was sentenced by the court. A part of its judgment was that he should be disqualified thereafter to hold any office or trust under the State of New York. He took a writ of error on that judgment. Being an entirety, it must have been reversed if it was wrong in any of its parts. The question was presented to the court over which Chief Justice Spencer then presided, and it was decided that as the constitution of New York gave full power to its Legislature to prescribe the punishment for any offense against its laws, and as disqualification for office operated upon the individual from his own default, and was not a cruel or unusual punishment, and therefore not restrained by the Constitution of the United States, it was perfectly competent for the Legislature to prescribe, in addition to any other punishment for the offense of dueling.

I do not doubt the correctness of that decision; but is not the distinction manifest? Qualification operates upon society at large; disqualification on the individual alone. This law alters and adds to the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution for all members elected. A law which merely disqualifies the individual as the result of his own crime, upon conviction, by way of punishment, does not affect in any mode the qualification for the office prescribed by the Constitution for society at large. I hold, therefore, that the authority has not the slightest bearing upon the question of the validity of this law under the Federal Constitution.

But, sir, this case went before the court of appeals in New York, and in that court the judgment was in favor of affirming Judge Spencer's decision, with one dissentient voice. The only opinion delivered was by the Chancellor of the State, Sandford, a very able lawyer and profound jurist. I propose to read an extract from his opinion in that case in order to show that the distinction I have stated is correct, and also that it is a decided authority against the validity of this act of July, 1862; not a direct decision, but a dictum of great weight. In delivering the opinion of affirmance, on page 707 of 3 Cowen's Reports, the following is the language of the Chancellor:

“Whether the Legislature can exclude from public trusts any person not excluded by the express rules of the Constitution is the question which I have already examined, and, according to my views of that question, there may be an exclusion by law in punishment for crimes; but in no other manner and for no other cause.”

So far, therefore, as the judicial opinion in that case is relevant, it is directly against the validity of this law. It recognizes the authority—and no one doubts it—of either a State Legislature or Congress, where they have jurisdiction of the offense, to prescribe as part of the punishment for that offense disqualification for office on the part of the individual who has been convicted; but that does not vary the qualifications of the office as regards society at large.

There is a paucity of judicial decisions on this subject from the fact that, with the exception of the dueling laws passed in a few of the States, there is no parallel legislation to this to be found either in this country or in England. No such principle of legislative action has been sanctioned except in those laws, and I can find but two cases in which the validity of such legislation came before a court. The decision of the court in one case, which related to an attorney, was that he was not an officer within the meaning of the statute, and therefore they waived any decision on the constitutional question; and in the other they decided that he was not an officer, and held also that if he were so considered the law would be unconstitutional and void. One is a case in Mumford's Reports—Watkin Leigh's case. Mr. Leigh was admitted to be sworn in without taking the anti-dueling oath by the judgment of the court on the ground that an attorney was not an officer, and therefore the law did not apply. In the case of Dorsey, reported in 7 Porter's Alabama Reports, the court decided by a majority not only that he was not an officer, but that if he were an officer, the law was unconstitutional and void; and he was admitted without taking the oath prescribed by the Legislature of Alabama.

In the Legislatures probably of some few of the States similar questions have more frequently been decided. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] has told you that in the State of Kentucky the Legislature has repeatedly decided—and the action there though not by a court is still judicial action—that an act on their statute-book involving the same principle was unconstitutional and void, and each House has admitted members where the objection has been made without taking the oath prescribed by the statute. In the State of New York one section of the law under which Barker was indicted also had a similar provision in reference to oaths, but no question arose under it in his case. It was in reference to that section that Chief Justice Spencer in his opinion in Barker's case said: that as one of the revisors of the law he was opposed to it as unconstitutional; but they overruled him. Under the law in one case the Legislature rejected a member who refused to take the oath, and the consequence was that on the adoption of the new constitution, in 1821, the people of New York effectually provided by express provision against the possibility of similar tyranny on the part of any subsequent Legislature. The better opinion of the legal profession of that State always was that the law was unconstitutional and void; but no judicial decision was ever made on the question. I submit that, both on principle and authority, the first oath prescribed in the act of July, 1862, being retrospective and expurgatory, varies in substance from the oath required and authorized by the Constitution, and imposes a further qualification on the trust and station of a Senator, and is therefore repugnant to the Constitution and invalid.

The second objection to the constitutionality of this act is that it is in conflict with the fifth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States. The fifth article of the amendments to the Constitution provides that—

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall he be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

Mr. President, this article is a restriction upon power, intended to secure individual rights against the aggressions of Government, as, indeed, are all the first ten amendments, adopted immediately after the formation of the Constitution. In one form or another, similar limitations of power have been incorporated into the constitution of every State in this Union. The principle comes to us from Magna Charta, though in England it is but a restraint on the Crown, Parliament, in their theory of government, being the ultimate power and omnipotent; but in this country we hold that the sovereignty is in the people, and both in the General and State governments limitations upon power apply to all branches of government. The limitation in this article is one of the great guarantees of civil liberty in free governments, and should be liberally expounded. If those guarantees are to be frittered away by a narrow construction, then indeed will written constitutions, which in the past have been the pride and glory of American statesmen and the American people, become unmeaning nullities and the feeblest of barriers against the encroachments of despotism and tyranny.

By this act of 1862 every one who is required to take the oath it prescribes is "held to answer" for a capital crime; and if he refuses, whether guilty or not guilty, the law assumes for its own purposes his guilt, and punishes him by disqualification and a refusal of his rights. He is deprived of those rights without due process of law. The legal presumption of innocence is reversed as to every citizen, and this law, without accusation, without trial, without proof, and without conviction, inflicts punishment as a consequence of silence. It seeks to ascertain facts in a peculiar manner unknown to the common law, and prohibited by the Constitution, not by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, but by a forced confession of the offender, and holds his silence as evidence of guilt. No matter how legitimate or desirable the object to be attained—the exclusion of persons guilty of treason from Congress—such means of effecting it are repugnant to the Constitution, and cannot, therefore, be lawfully used.

There is a resemblance in principle between this law and the barbarous rule which obtained in England, but never in this country, that "standing mute" on an indictment for treason was "equivalent to a conviction." Here we put in the plea of not guilty if the accused obstinately refuses to plead, and prove the crime before conviction and punishment.

But even in less enlightened times the common law never required the party charged with crime to prove his innocence by his own oath. All it required was that he should plead to the arraignment, so that, if proved guilty, he might be convicted and punished. In the whole range of English history, in all the varied test oaths which political and religious excitement and fanaticism forced upon the people of that country in past times, you will find that the great principle of Magna Charta was always adhered to. No person was ever held to self-accusation. The oath invariably was promissory in its character, related to the present and future, and generally affected the conscience alone and not the acts of the party; but there is no instance of an expurgatory oath as to past acts or conduct to be found in the long list of oaths which are prescribed in English acts of Parliament. The present sentiments and belief both religious and political were frequently required to be declared on oath, and also the future conduct and creed was secured by the same sanction, but the oaths exacted had no relation to past acts or offenses against the law.

But this act requires every member of Congress elect to purge himself by oath from a past capital offense, and treats his refusal to answer as "equivalent to a conviction," and punishes him by disqualification, though he was duly elected, and in all other respects duly qualified. Such a law is as clearly prohibited by the fifth article of the amendments to the Constitution as a statute would be if it prescribed, where a man was held to answer on indictment, that he should swear to the truth of his plea, or, before plea, should deny under oath the commission of the crime with which he was charged, or that the refusal to take such an oath should be "equivalent to a conviction," and that judgment and punishment should follow without trial or other proof. The cases would be parallel. He is "held to answer" in the one case, and punished by conviction without proof, founded upon his refusal to answer. He is "held to answer" in the Senate of the United States on oath, in the other, and his silence is taken as evidence that he has been guilty of the crime from which he is asked to purge himself, and he is punished by disqualification for the station to which he aspires, and to which he has been duly elected and is constitutionally qualified.

You will find, sir, that this view is corroborated by a report and a decision made in the Senate of the United States as early as the year 1796. Humphrey Marshall, a Senator from Kentucky, was charged in a letter by the Governor of Kentucky with having committed perjury in an answer in chancery in that State, and there was also a memorial from the Representatives of the State to the same effect. The object of both the letter and memorial was his expulsion as a Senator. Mr. Marshall professed that he was very desirous that the charge should be investigated by the Senate; and after the report of the committee, a motion was made to expunge the following words, part of the report, and the motion was negatived, and the report was adopted by a vote of 16 to 8:

"And on the question to expunge the following words: 'They [the committee] think that in a case of this kind no person can be held to answer for an infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury; and that in all prosecutions the case ought to be tried by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime was committed. If, in the present case, the party has been guilty in the manner suggested, no reason has been alleged why he has not long since been tried in the State or district where he committed the offense. Until he is legally convicted, the principles of the Constitution and of the common law concur in presuming that he is innocent.'"

The motion to strike out that clause was negatived, and also a motion to strike out another clause, that as the Constitution did not give the jurisdiction the consent of the accused could not, was also negatived; and the report was adopted by a vote of 16 to 8. This was early in the history of the country; and the principle sustained by the Senate is an authority against this act of 1862; for it cannot be questioned that the power of the Senate in regard to expulsion rests in a more absolute and uncontrolled discretion, with the limitation of numbers alone, than the power of Congress in prescribing an oath; and if the Senate would not hold Marshall to answer in such a case, and investigate the question of perjury committed in his own State without previous conviction by due course of law, on what principle is it that the Senate of the United States can sustain a law which assumes the guilt of the whole community, of society at large, and without charge or accusation holds every member-elect to answer, and requires him to purge himself by oath from the commission of treason in all his past life? That is the substance of this oath. It cannot be doubted, though the act does not pursue the language of the Constitution in its definition of treason, that under an indictment for levying war against the United States, if the acts were proved which the member is obliged here to negative by his oath, that is, that he has voluntarily given no aid, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States; that he has not voluntarily borne arms against the United States, he certainly would be convicted of treason. Each member, by this act, is "held to answer" for a capital crime, and is required to deny under oath the commission of treason, and is punished, if he does not answer, by disqualification for office. The principle in each case is precisely the same.

But, sir, there is still a third objection to this act. The act is repugnant to the second section of the second article of the Constitution. By the second section of the second article of the Constitution the pardoning power is vested exclusively in the President of the United States:

"He shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment."

It is an executive authority, exclusively in the President, and the effect of the pardon is that it absolves the party from all the consequences of his crime, and when pardoned he stands with the same rights as if the crime had never been committed. I am supposing a case where a party has really been guilty of these offenses, and of course could not take this oath, and yet has been pardoned by the President. While I would oppose the Executive in any encroachments upon the power of the Legislature or the assumption of any powers not granted to him, I would equally sustain him in the exercise of all the authority which has been delegated to him by the Constitution. Suppose a southern citizen who has voluntarily borne arms against the United States during this revolt, becoming convinced of his error while the war continues, should return to his allegiance, and be pardoned by the President, and be elected to the Senate by a Legislature whose authority to elect you recognized. He certainly could not take this oath without being guilty of perjury, and therefore, in effect, this law impairs and abrogates the pardoning power of the President to that extent. Is that constitutional? Can you obstruct by legislation of this kind, direct or indirect, the legal effect of a power which is vested in the executive branch and not in the legislative branch of the Government? This law punishes the member-elect, in defiance of the executive pardon, by disqualification for the office or trust to which he has been legally and constitutionally elected.

If Congress can attach disqualification for office as part of the punishment of crime, as they undoubtedly can, as they have done in the case of an attempt to bribe, or the actual bribery of a judge, and in reference to other offenses, and the person charged, whether with or without conviction, being pardoned by the President, would be restored to his rights, and the punishment of disqualification cease and be inoperative, on what principle is it that you can assume a power here which you could not exercise in the case of an undoubted authority on your part to prescribe disqualification as the consequence of crime? Disqualification prescribed by law as the punishment of crime can be removed by an executive pardon; but by this law the effect of a pardon is abrogated as to the crime of treason, which, though a high crime, is still a political crime, and does not necessarily involve moral delinquency on the part of the individual. Suppose, under a law imposing disqualification for office as part of the punishment, a party convicted under it and pardoned, you could not refuse him his seat because of the commission of a crime from the consequences of which he had been absolved by the pardon of the President; yet indirectly, by this mode of legislation, you deprive him of his rights, though he may have repented of his error, and you disregard the legitimate action of the Executive, in direct defiance of the Constitution.

But, sir, a case has in fact occurred, if I am not misinformed. A Mr. Gantt, who was a brigadier general in the service of the confederates, has become convinced of his error, has returned to his allegiance, and has been pardoned by the President. He certainly must have voluntarily borne arms against the United States; because, though conscription has been rife throughout the South, I believe it would not be necessary there or here to exercise the power of conscription in order to obtain the services of a brigadier general. The act must have been voluntary. He must have borne arms voluntarily. I will suppose that he either goes into a State which has not revolted, or that a State which has revolted is restored to the Union, and he is elected by the members of the Legislature, with whom the choice exists, a Legislature which you recognize, as a Senator of the United States. He could not take this oath without perjury, and therefore, as you can make no exceptions if the law is valid, the result is, if the case arises, you, in fact, will have abrogated by your law the effect of the executive pardon.

But, sir, this law also rejects the legitimate effect of the pardon in case of the suppression of the revolt, and an amnesty by the Executive. In such an event it ostracizes a whole people, and punishes them by the deprivation of their dearest rights. Submission is required to the laws, and yet by a law like this you deprive the masses of the people, because they are all engaged in this revolution, of their rights under the Constitution in the selection of their own agents if duly qualified under its provisions. Can a law of this kind have any tendency to terminate this disastrous civil war or to restore this Union in its former integrity?

There is a still further and fourth objection to the validity of this law. By the Constitution of the United States no ex post facto law can be passed; and yet by the imposition of this oath you prescribe the penalty of disqualification for office as the punishment for a crime committed before the passage of the law, though it was subject to no such punishment at the time of its commission.

I forbear to dwell upon this objection from want of time and exhaustion, but it seems impossible to controvert the position that where by law a punishment is attached to a past offense which the law did not prescribe as part of the punishment for that offense at the time of its commission, it is strictly and undeniably ex post facto legislation.

Before proceeding to the construction of this act, as including members of Congress, I must controvert briefly a doctrine which I have frequently heard asserted in this body, that a majority of the body have authority to exclude from a seat a person legally elected, for any cause other than want of qualification under the provisions of the Constitution. It has been asked, "Would you admit a disloyal person, a traitor, into the Senate?" The answer is, there is no authority in a majority to refuse admission to his seat if the person duly chosen is qualified. The Senate may judge and decide whether the election is by competent authority, whether the credentials are sufficient, and whether the party is possessed of the requisite qualifications. When it assumes by a majority the right to refuse a seat on other grounds, it violates a fundamental principle of the Constitution and of representative government. The sovereignty is in the people, and the right of choice is with them. Whether they act directly, as in the election of Representatives, or mediately through the State Legislature, as in the choice of a Senator, it is for them to decide on the past life, the mental capacity, and the moral character of the person chosen. If the Senate assumes this power it violates a fundamental principle of representative government. If a mere majority can exclude a person elected to either House, then a political party may continue its power until resistance and anarchy is the probable result.

But it is said that the body must have power to protect itself against traitors or infamous persons. The answer is, the power of expulsion gives full protection, and that power is vested in the Senate in absolute discretion, with no other limit than that it requires two thirds of the body to exercise it—a limitation of numbers. Natural justice, the sense of right, and the sufficiency of the facts presented to authorize the action—all these things of course would address themselves to the discretion of two thirds of the body. Two thirds of the body may, if they see fit, expel without cause, and the expulsion would be legally valid. No doubt such an act would recoil on the actors. No doubt the frequent recurrence of such acts would entirely destroy the confidence of the people in the body, and ultimately end in the subversion of the Government; but it is not a rational presumption that such a course would ever be adopted by two thirds of the Senate of the United States. The limitation which is imposed in requiring two thirds to exercise the absolute discretion in reference to expulsion is a quite sufficient restriction, because it is a rational presumption that two thirds would seldom, if ever, agree to expel a member without sufficient cause and on sufficient proof.

Such a power vested in the majority would, on the contrary, in political conflicts be subject to the grossest abuses. A majority of two thirds would not be tempted to abuse, because common reflection would convince them that to crush out all opposition in a representative assembly necessarily leads to personal dissensions and personal factions, and thus their own party would perish. If you desire an illustration, look back to our own past history when, during the second term of Mr. Monroe, all organized opposition to the Democratic party having ceased, it fell at once into personal factions and broke up in the election of 1824 with mere personal candidates. The whole danger in representative Governments arises from conflicts of power between political parties. If a mere majority could exercise such a power of exclusion, independent of the qualifications prescribed in the Constitution, at their own will and discretion, they would inevitably be tempted to sustain themselves in power by unjust exclusions, and the ultimate result would be resistance and violence.

The assumption, also, of the power to exclude a person otherwise qualified, by the vote of a majority, is a palpable usurpation under the language of the Constitution, because the power of expulsion is vested in two thirds of the body; but a refusal to allow a man to take his seat is equivalent to an expulsion, except when you decide that he is not qualified. If, because you view him as an immoral man, if because he has committed a crime, be it treason or any other offense, you think him unworthy of being a member of the Senate, and can by the vote of a majority exclude him, then you can exclude him by a majority on any other ground whatever, and you are assuming the power virtually of expulsion which the Constitution expressly vests in two thirds of each House. Sir, a free constitution cannot coexist with this dangerous and parricidal power in the hands of a majority of the ordinary legislature.

I proceed to read an extract from a report made in the Senate of the United States in the case of John Smith by John Quincy Adams, which corroborates these views. Mr. Adams contended—that and that I agree fully with his doctrine—that the right of expulsion was unfettered by any other limitation than the discretion of two thirds of the body. The report itself, like all papers which emanated from that distinguished statesman, is exceedingly able and eloquent:

"The provision in our Constitution which forbids the expulsion of a member by an ordinary majority, and requires for this act of vigorous and painful duty the assent of two thirds, your committee consider as a wise and sufficient guard against the possible abuse of this legislative discretion. In times of hot and violent party spirit the rights of the minority might not always be duly respected if the majority could expel members under no other control than that of their own discretion."

Where is the difference, Mr. President, between an expulsion by a majority of a member after he has been sworn in and taken his seat and the right claimed by a majority to exclude a member before he is sworn in, founded on their own absolute discretion? If the power does not exist in the one case it cannot in the other; and it will inevitably lead, if sanctioned by the Senate, in the violence of party contests, to abuses so frequent and gross that representation of the people will exist only in name, but not in fact, and then follows despotism or anarchy.

I have closed with the objections I have to make to the constitutionality of the act of 1862, and proceed now to the discussion of the second question which I stated. The answer to that question depends upon another, whether a Senator or Representative is a civil officer or holds a civil office within the meaning of the Federal Constitution. This question became a subject of inquiry early in the history of the country, on the impeachment of William Blount by the House of Representatives in the year 1798; and it was decided then by the Senate on a plea to the jurisdiction on the 11th of January, 1799. Blount was expelled from his seat in the Senate on July 8, 1797, for a high misdemeanor, and so clear was the proof of his guilt that there was but one negative vote against expulsion to twenty-five in the affirmative.

The resolution is in the following words:

"William Blount, Esq., one of the Senators of the United States, having been guilty of a high misdemeanor entirely inconsistent with his public trust and duty as a Senator, is hereby expelled from the Senate of the United States."

In 1798 he was impeached by the House of Representatives for high crimes and misdemeanors, and articles of impeachment being preferred, the Senate was organized as a court of impeachment on the 17th of December, 1798. Blount pleaded to the jurisdiction that he is not and was not at the periods mentioned a civil officer of the United States. The plea was argued by the ablest jurists of the country, both on behalf of the House of Representatives and on behalf of Blount, and two resolutions were proposed on the 7th of January, 1799. You will find them in the Annals of Congress:

"On motion to agree to the following resolutions:

"That William Blount was a civil officer of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore liable to be impeached by the House of Representatives.

"That, as the articles of impeachment charge him with high crimes and misdemeanors, supposed to have been committed while he was a Senator of the United States, his plea ought to be overruled.

"After debate, on motion, the court adjourned till twelve o'clock to-morrow."—Annals of Congress, Fifth Congress, 1777-1779, vol. 2, p. 2318.

These resolutions were held under discussion for four days, and on January 10 they were decided in the negative. The express decision therefore is that Mr. Blount was not a civil officer of the United States, and therefore not liable to impeachment. The plea was sustained on a subsequent day, and the articles of impeachment were dismissed.

This decision I cite as an authority of the highest grade for the purpose of determining the question whether a Senator is a civil officer of the United States or holds an office under the United States within the meaning of the Constitution. That is the question.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts calls this a little precedent; he speaks of it as being unworthy of any weight or influence in the Senate now, because it was made in secret session; and he read an extract from Judge Story's Commentaries in order to show that it has been impugned by the authority of some learned commentators. Mr. President, this decision was made when the body was not as numerous as it now is, but that does not detract from its weight. I admit it was a subject of contrariety of opinion; but is it any objection to the decision of a court of justice that the deliberations of its judges are private? The Senate sat under oath as a court when they made this decision. There was no party bias; there was no personal feeling in favor of the man, because ten of the very Senators who voted to sustain his plea had voted for his expulsion one year before, and only six of those who voted against the plea had voted for the expulsion. The other nine were either new members or members who were not in their places when the vote on expulsion was taken. The decision therefore comes to us from the Senate organized as a court, sitting under oath, after a public argument and hearing by the ablest counsel in the country on both sides. The argument is all reported in your Annals. But because the deliberations of the court subsequently were private we are told it is but a little precedent and entitled to no weight. Sir, you may in that way overturn any judicial decision. If ever a decision was made that fairly entitled it to be considered of weight in the construction of the Constitution, it was this decision, made under these circumstances, in which no party feeling whatever was evinced, and in which no personal bias influenced a single Senator.

Oath of Office—Mr. Bayard.

SENATE.

The decision also on the first resolution is an express adjudication that a Senator is not a civil officer of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution, and if not a civil officer of course he does not hold an office of honor or profit under the Government, within the meaning of the Federal Constitution. The quotation is correctly made from Judge Story's Commentaries. In section seven hundred and ninety-one, after stating the decision, he writes as follows: "This decision, upon which the Senate itself was greatly divided, seems not to have been quite satisfactory (as it may be gathered) to the minds of some learned commentators;" and to sustain this remark he cites 4 Tucker's Blackstone, Appendix, pages 57 and 58, and Rawle on the Constitution, chapter twenty-two, pages 213, 214, 218, and 219. It so happens that the authorities relied upon by Judge Story do not support his remarks; and there is in fact no learned commentator who has doubted the correctness of the decision. Look at Mr. Rawle's commentaries and you will find that he does not question the propriety of the decision made by the Senate under the Constitution, but expresses regret that Senators and Representatives were not impeachable, and suggests an amendment to the Constitution for that purpose. There is not a word in his treatise which implies that he thought the decision incorrect as to the construction of the Constitution. In the appendix to Tucker's Blackstone, Judge Tucker expresses no opinion whatever upon the subject. All that he says is that all the grounds on which the plea was dismissed do not appear, as the debate was in secret session; but that two grounds do appear in the resolutions which were negatived by the Senate, and especially the one which I have stated as most material, that a Senator is not a civil officer under the United States, and therefore cannot be impeached, and he neither expresses nor intimates any opinion for or against the correctness of the decision on this question.

The error of Judge Story is one not uncommon with the compilers of legal treatises. Judge Story himself expresses no dissent from the opinion; he states the facts as he supposed them to exist, but must have examined the authorities he cited with less than his usual care. There is no doubt the Senate was divided; there is no doubt that it was a subject on which different conclusions might be arrived at; but if there ever was a case to which the maxim stare decisis is applicable, it is precisely to this decision. That decision involves the very question that a Senator is not a civil officer under the United States; and of course if not a civil officer he cannot hold a civil office under the United States. If such a precedent as that is not to control, acquiesced in as it has been for more than half a century without question, then no precedent can have weight in this body.

Let Senators reflect for a moment on the difference of importance in the two cases. In the case in which the Senate decided on an impeachment they gave a construction to an article of the Constitution which prevented the future impeachment of any member of Congress, either of the House of Representatives or of the Senate. What I contend for now, as the necessary result of the principle decided by the Senate in that case, is merely that where Congress mean to include members of either body within any law, be it penal or otherwise, they must name them as members of Congress or as Senators and Representatives. All that is asked is that in the construction of any act of Congress the words "office" or "officer" shall be held to mean an office or officer within the language and meaning of the Constitution. This rule of construction has been adhered to in past legislation; and even at the same session in which the act under discussion was passed, in an act prescribing penalties in relation to obtaining contracts, the words "members of Congress" and "all officers of the Government" are used in contradistinction.

It will be recollected that at the time of this decision the Senate had among its members some of the ablest jurists of the country; and unless you entirely disregard judicial decisions it stands as the judgment of the court of the highest juristic tion known to our laws. The question how great the majority is in a court certainly cannot destroy the effect of its decisions. You would hold the Senate bound by it beyond all question if articles of impeachment were now preferred against any member of Congress; you would hold yourself bound to dismiss the impeachment founded on the precedent established at that time and adhered to ever since, and as to which I hazard nothing in the assertion that no commentator on the Constitution has expressed his dissent from the propriety of the decision, though I freely admit that minds differently constructed might have arrived on a controverted question at a different conclusion.

I propose now to sustain by reference to the Constitution itself the determination made by the Senate in Blount's case as applicable to the present. The decision in Blount's case, it is said, was merely that a Senator was not impeachable. Not so, sir. The resolution adopted was that a Senator is not a civil officer, and therefore not impeachable. No other reason can be assigned for his not being impeachable. If he was a civil officer he must have been impeachable, because you find that in the clause of the Constitution which authorizes impeachment, section four of article two, it is provided that "the President, Vice President, and all civil officers, shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." Therefore the very question was in issue. There could be no doubt that if a Senator was a civil officer, holding a civil office under the United States, he might be impeached, and might be removed from office. The whole struggle throughout the argument on both sides was to show whether he was or was not a civil officer within the meaning of the Constitution.

Every one knows that the word "office" may be applied to a trustee, to an executor, even to the relation of a friend. The question to be determined in this case is whether the position, trust, and station of a Senator is a civil office, or an office within the meaning of the Federal Constitution. If the Federal Constitution does not characterize it as an office, and has excluded that term from its provisions in relation to members of Congress, then of course a law passed in pursuance of that Constitution which does not name Senators and Representatives as included within it must by necessary inference be held to exclude them.

Let us look at the different provisions of the Constitution to show that it is incompatible with the language used to suppose that its framers intended to treat the station of a Senator as an office or as coming within the word "office." Take first the clause as to the executive powers vested in the President; the first section of article two:

"He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows."

"He shall hold his office"—the language is plain and explicit—"during the term of four years." Turn to the second section, first article, of the Constitution, and you find:

"SECTION 2. The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

So for the Senate:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years."

Why not use the same language as is applied to the President—"who shall hold their office for the term of six years"—if it was intended to treat it as an office under the Constitution?

"Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one third may be chosen every second year."

If the position of a Senator was regarded as an office, why not say "the term of office of Senators of the first class shall expire at the expiration of the second year," &c.? The language used in reference to the President is that he shall hold his office for the term of four years.

But again the provision is:

"And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary appointments"—

Why not "temporary appointments to office"? It is sedulously shunned.

"until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

A vacancy in what? The word "vacancy" refers to the former word "seat;" to fill the vacancy in the seat. So you find throughout that where ever a Senator or Representative is alluded to, the term "office" or "officer" is sedulously excluded as applicable to him.

But, sir, there are other clauses more important than these, to which I shall now refer. In the second clause of the first article of section six it is provided that "No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House of Congress during his continuance in office."

Can it be doubted that the words must have been "other office" if the Constitution meant to treat the station of a Senator as an office? Identity is incompatibility, and if the trust and station of a Senator is held to be an office it involves an absurdity in the language of the Constitution when providing that a person holding office shall not be a member of Congress.

Again, it is provided in article two, section one, that

"Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector."

Why should this language have been used in the Constitution unless it was necessary to exclude Senators and Representatives from being electors by an express designation of them by name in addition to the words "person holding an office of trust or profit"? Does it not negative, is it not utterly inconsistent with the idea that a Senator or Representative holds an office under the United States within the meaning of the Constitution? The men who framed the Constitution understood the meaning of language, and had they intended to treat the position and trust of a Senator as an office the intention would have been clearly expressed.

There are other clauses of the Constitution to which, if I were not so exhausted, I could refer in support of this construction, to show that throughout the whole instrument its framers sedulously avoid giving the appellation of "office" to the station and trust of a Senator; and not only that, but the language employed by fair inference excludes any idea that the terms "officer of the United States," or "holding office under the United States," were intended to include a Senator or Representative.

If that be so, I may be asked, what is the position of a Senator? My answer is, a station, a trust, not an office within the meaning of the Constitution. It is perfectly immaterial what it might be considered otherwise. If the Constitution does not mean that they shall be considered officers, then the language "officers of the United States" will not include them, and the words "persons holding office under the United States" will not include them. This construction also is in accordance with the theory and form of our Government. It is a representative government. The people are present, not in masses or in numbers, for that is impracticable, but it is the people who make the laws through their representatives or proxies, and members of Congress are the proxies of the people. That is their position. It is a high trust and station; but it is not, within the meaning of the Federal Constitution, an office under the United States.

Further, they are elected by a paramount power, the power that formed the Constitution—Senators by the Legislature, as representing the political community or State, and members of the House of Representatives by the people in districts in each State, and not by the people of the Confiscated Property—Mr. Sweat.

*HO. OF REPS.

United States. This view strengthens the inference that they are not included in any such expression as "officers of the United States" or "persons holding office under the United States."

This same idea is corroborated in part by Judge Story's own language in the portion of section seven hundred and ninety-one subsequent to that cited by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. He does not question the decision made in Blount's case, but, speaking of the precedent, he says:

"The reasoning by which it was sustained in the Senate does not appear, their deliberations having been private."

He could hardly have adverted to the resolution that was negatived, or this passage would not have been written:

"But it was probably held that 'civil officers of the United States' meant such as derived their appointment from and under the national Government, and not those persons who, though members of the Government, derived their appointment from the States or the people of the States. In this view the enumeration of the President and Vice President as impeachable officers was indispensable; for they derive, or may derive, their office from a source paramount to the national Government. And the clause of the Constitution now under consideration does not even affect to consider them officers of the United States. It says, 'the President, Vice President, and all civil officers (not all other civil officers) shall be removed,' &c. The language of the clause, therefore, would rather lead to the conclusion that they were enumerated as contradistinguished from, rather than as included in the description of, civil officers of the United States. Other clauses of the Constitution would seem to favor the same result; particularly the clause respecting the appointment of officers of the United States by the Executive, who is to 'commission all the officers of the United States'; and the sixth section of the first article, which declares that 'no person holding any office under the United States, shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office'; and the first section of the second article, which declares that 'no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.'"

If, on a question of impeachment, which goes to the construction of the Constitution, you cannot impeach a Senator or Representative because he is not a civil officer, though all civil officers are made impeachable by the Constitution, on what principle is it that in a law which prescribes an oath for all persons holding offices of trust or profit under the United States you can include members of Congress when they are not named?

Mr. President, there is one other authority to which I will refer, though I admit that it is only an authority inferentially. Early in the history of the country, on the 7th of May, 1792, an order was made by the Senate—

"That the Secretary of the Treasury do lay before the Senate, at the next session of Congress, a statement of the salaries, fees, and emoluments for one year ending the 1st day of October next, stated quarterly, of every person holding any civil office or employment under the United States, except the judges, together with the actual disbursements and expenses in the discharge of their respective offices and employments for the same period."

To that resolution, in February following, Alexander Hamilton made his return, and in that return of the persons holding civil offices under the United States, except the judges, he included the President, the Vice President, all the different officers of the Government from tide-waiters upwards; he included the Commissioner of Loans; he included persons holding every species of employment; he included officers of the Senate and officers of the House of Representatives with their emoluments; but he did not include members of Congress. What, then, is the inference? Alexander Hamilton was certainly, as a jurist, as one familiar with the language of the Constitution, and with the mode in which it ought to be interpreted, a man whose opinions would be entitled to great weight; and in obeying an order of the Senate which required him to return the emoluments of all civil officers whatever, though he gave the officers of the Senate, the Secretary, all the clerks, the Doorkeeper, and also all the officers of the House of Representatives in the same way, he made no return of members of Congress, for the simple reason that they did not, in the language of the resolution, hold a civil office under the United States.

There is still another authority. The articles of impeachment which were propounded against Blount by the House of Representatives consisted of five articles. They were drawn by one of the ablest lawyers of the country, Mr. Sitgreaves, who was chairman of the committee of impeachment. Each article, after alleging the act which was charged as a misdemeanor, concluded in this form—that it was contrary to the trust and station of a Senator. The House of Representatives did not venture in their articles of impeachment, formally drawn by so able a lawyer, to designate the position of a Senator as an office. Is that no authority? Is it not entitled to some weight? The articles were very skillfully drawn, with technical accuracy and precision in the statement of the alleged misdemeanor, and every article concluded with the allegation that the act was contrary to the duties of his trust and station as a Senator of the United States. Sir, that is the position of a Senator.

But, sir, it has been said that the oath is required, by the act of July 2, 1862, to be filed in both Houses of Congress, and therefore it is evident, though members of Congress are not included by name as Senators and Representatives, that it must have been intended to include them in the law. The words, however, are amply satisfied by the fact that you have officers, both in the Senate and House of Representatives, who must, under the provisions of that act, if constitutional, take the oath prescribed. The provision for recording it is entirely satisfied by its application to those officers. There is, however, from the language of this part of the act, reason to infer that the provision applied to the officers of each House, but not to its members. The language is, "which said oath so taken and filed shall be preserved among the files of the court, House of Congress, or Department to which the office may appertain." I do not think it can be held that the office of members of Congress appertains to the House of which they are members. It is at least singular phraseology. It may be appropriate to speak of your Secretary, your clerks, your Sergeant-at-Arms, as appertaining to the Senate; but scarcely appropriate to use the same language in reference to its members. At all events, the order or direction to file the oath is entirely satisfied by the fact that there are officers of each body who, if the law is valid, are required to take it. The exercise of either judicial or legislative powers does not necessarily constitute the person exercising them an officer. You have the illustration in the case of an English peer. The powers he exercises, both legislative and judicial, are quite equal and more than equal judicially to our own, yet it was never held that a peer of England was an officer of the Crown; nor would he be included in any law by the terms "officer," or "person holding an office of honor or profit."

Mr. President, I have now concluded my argument against the validity of the act of July 2, 1862, and the rule proposed under it. The oath prescribed in that act has been frequently designated as "the oath of loyalty;" and doubtless there are those who may consider my declining to take that oath as evidence of disloyalty. The words "loyal" and "loyalty" have become familiar terms during the progress of this disastrous civil war. I will not pause to inquire whether loyalty in its usual acceptation is not more appropriate to the relations and personal devotion of a subject to his prince than of a citizen to his Government in a republic. Accepting the term as applicable, I define loyalty in a Government such as ours—a representative Republic—to mean a steadfast adherence to the Constitution or organic law under which and by virtue of the adoption of which by the people of the several States the Government was established; a cheerful and ready obedience to all laws passed in pursuance of that Constitution; and a devoted and ardent support of those guarantees of civil liberty which it was a primary object with its framers to maintain and perpetuate, and thus "secure to themselves and their posterity the blessings of liberty." I have sworn to support that Constitution; and as I believe that the rule proposed and the law which it is intended to enforce are repugnant to its provisions, I call upon the tribunal which has exclusive jurisdiction of all questions affecting the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members, to decide judicially whether the act is constitutional, and give to it its proper legal construction. If it be disloyal to support the Constitution of my country, then I cheerfully accept the imputation of disloyalty; but if made on any other ground, I shall meet it with calm contempt.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

SPEECH OF HON. L. D. M. SWEAT, OF MAINE, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 20, 1864.

The House having under consideration a joint resolution to amend a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes:"—

Mr. SWEAT said:

MR. SPEAKER: Radicalism in these fevered days of war, upon matters of legislation, is progressing with such unprecedented and fearful strides that one can hardly be excused for allowing himself to be astonished whenever any measure, however monstrous or extreme, is proposed for consideration before a deliberative assembly like this; but, sir, I must confess that when the measure now before the House was introduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] I was astonished, and I was still more surprised to see the attempts to stifle, or, at all events, to abridge the discussion upon it, when he announced that he should put it upon its passage under a call for the previous question. I think it is not too much for me to say that his courtesy in finally consenting that this measure should remain open for discussion for two days might have been slightly stimulated by the intimation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] on his side of the House, who told him that if he expected his resolution to pass without amendment he would find himself woefully mistaken. I hold that upon this question, and upon all other questions affecting the rights of the citizen under the Constitution, we ought to have deliberative, free, calm, and full discussion, so that when we come to record our votes we may do it intelligently, or, at all events, that we may do it after sufficient time has been granted to us for the honest exercise of our judgments. This is all we ask of gentlemen upon the other side of the House, but this we do demand as our right, and as the right of the constituencies which we represent upon this floor.

But when I reflect upon the scenes before us—the resistless whirl of events, so full of suffering and anguish; when the public mind is so shaken with doubts and fears, with frenzied thought and hurried action, it seems as if all mere human utterance or expression of opinion were vain and idle—so utterly weak and impotent as to make it but a mockery for any man to raise his voice of warning or counsel in favor of wise, prudent, and just action. This feeling pervades a much larger portion of our people than would at first appear, and an honest desire not to do or say anything which might be tortured into opposition to an earnest prosecution and speedy and just termination of the war, the most terrible of all earth's tragedies, closes the mouth of many of our most loyal citizens. Fear of misconstruction, and therefore fear of harm to the great cause, has made silence the rule and not the exception, not only with many among the masses of the people, but also with gentlemen on this floor. They consider silence a virtue.

But, sir, when the Republic is writhing under the blows given her by the rebels in arms and by traitors who are skulking over the land, North as well as South, and when, in addition to this, the doctrinaires and theorists of the day, born of revolution, and whose natural elements are carnage, hatred, and revenge, are thrusting forward their poisonous ideas, which if carried out would be sure to leave our country in anarchy and confusion, even after the success of our arms, which success is as sure as God's judgment; when these things, I say, are before us, silence and inaction are, in my judgment, no longer virtues. They are crimes for which I, at least, feel answerable before God and man. The time has come, and is pressing on us with all its awful weight, when honest thought, honest action and discussion, and honest and prudent legislation especially, are demanded at the hands of every man connected with the administration of this Government. "Riven by the thunderbolt and scattered by the storm" as it is, the wreck of our Republic is still worthy of every effort to save, for in it still lives the germ of the people's rights and the true spirit of liberty, from which in the future may be reared the fabric of the nation's salvation. With reference, therefore, to what may be saved by prudent legislation, it becomes not only the right but the duty of every man to act with earnestness upon the great matter of respecting the Constitution and the laws of the land, of crushing speedily and forever the armed rebellion and saving the Union.

Before touching directly upon the question under consideration, I may be excused for a passing word upon the opening remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS.] I propose to treat them of course with fairness, but at the same time with entire freedom of expression as to the views I entertain of them.

That I may not be misunderstood, and that the gentleman shall not be misunderstood, either now or in the future, here or elsewhere, I call the attention of the House to his exact language which he has spread abroad, and for which, I presume, he is ready at all times to be answerable. He says:

"With whatever pleasure the gentlemen upon this side of the House may have heard the very novel declaration of the gentleman from Ohio that he contemplated supporting in all proper measures the Administration in the prosecution of the war and the suppression of the rebellion, it is, perhaps, fortunate that the result of the political elections in the central slave States has placed the Administration beyond the necessity of relying upon his support. Were it not so, I incline to think that the kind of support the Administration would receive from the great majority of gentlemen on the other side of the House was indicated early in the session in that resolution proposed by a gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD], which pronounced this an inhuman war."

Now, did he mean to characterize the political tone or temper of this side of the House from the vote which was given against laying that resolution on the table? What was the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD? It embraced the idea that it was politic, expedient, and wise for this Government to send commissioners to treat with the rebel authorities at Richmond, and this was the only object of the resolution. But the point of offense in it with the gentleman [Mr. DAVIS] seems to be that it contained the words "inhuman war," and on this he predicates what would be our action in all matters pertaining to the war or the support of the Administration, and this, too, when he has had several opportunities to know the sentiment of this side of the House by their votes directly on the merits of other resolutions touching the prosecution of the war.

The gentleman has had experience enough in legislative bodies to know that voting against laying a resolution on the table is not necessarily agreeing with the sentiments contained in it. If that resolution had been permitted to come before the House there would have been a direct vote on its merits, and then the gentleman would have known our views.

But the gentleman [Mr. DAVIS] goes on further to say, as follows:

"For myself, sir, relying on the fact that the people have sent enough of us here for the purpose of supporting the Administration, I would suggest that perhaps gentlemen on the other side of the House had just as well execute the mission with which the constituents that elected them sent them here, charged to oppose, to embarrass, to libel, and to break down the Administration, and leave the support of it to the gentlemen whom the people have sent here to maintain it. With all due respect to the patriotic purposes, the earnest ability of the gentlemen on the other side, when they tender support I shall look at it with something of suspicion, and, for myself, shall say, 'Non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis.'"

I take it that he understands the meaning of the language which he thus uttered fearlessly before this House. He is accustomed to speaking, and therefore understood the full force and effect of it. He charges not only that we embarrass the Administration, but that our constituents sent us here for that purpose—to oppose, to embarrass, to libel, and to break down the Administration. Ah! is this the spirit with which gentlemen extend to us the right hand of fellowship when we come here and say to them in all honesty that we are for supporting the Administration in every act that is consistent with the character of a Christian and civilized country in putting down this infamous rebellion? I wish the gentleman to consider his words. Is that the meaning, was that the purpose, that the 250,000 conservative Democratic voters in Pennsylvania had in sending representatives to this House? Was that the spirit or purpose for which 285,000 voters in New York, 255,000 in Pennsylvania, 185,000 in Ohio, and 51,000 voters in the State which I in part represent here, sent their representatives to this House? By what authority, let me ask the gentleman from Maryland, does he say that he does not need our aid? Is he the special agent or attorney of the President, and is he authorized to come here and tell us that the President does not need our aid?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would suggest to the gentleman from Maine that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] is not in his seat.

Mr. SWEAT. It is not my fault. I wish that he were in his seat, for I would wish him to have an opportunity of answering me.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I suggest to the gentleman from Maine that he withhold his remarks until the gentleman from Maryland shall be in his seat.

Mr. SWEAT. It is the duty of gentlemen who make such charges on this floor as the gentleman from Maryland made to be in his seat at all times while the House is in session, and especially on the days immediately succeeding his attack; for he must know that if we have any manhood, any truth, any self-respect on this side of the House, we should improve the first opportunity to repel and thrust back such charges in his teeth, and call upon him to answer.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope our friends on this side of the House will not object, but let the gentleman from Maine continue his attack on an absent member.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I made the remark to show to the country that the gentleman from Maryland was not in his seat when the gentleman from Maine made the attack upon him.

Mr. COX. I call the gentleman from Illinois to order.

Mr. SWEAT. The gauntlet has been thrown down by a gentleman on that side of the House for the first time. The charge is that we are attempting to embarrass the Administration, and that we came here for that purpose. I say here, before my God and before all men who can hear or read what I say, that the purpose of my heart, the purpose of my constituents, so far as I know anything about it, is not to embarrass but honestly to aid the Administration in putting down this unholy and wicked rebellion. Have we shown any such disposition on this floor? Did we make any factious organization when we came here? We did not organize on the nomination of a Speaker. Does that look like an attempt to embarrass the Administration? You will recollect a resolution offered here at a very early day of this session, for which we unanimously voted, save one gentleman from Maryland. That resolution pledged us to aid the Government by furnishing men and money to an unlimited extent for the purpose of putting down this rebellion, and declared that it was the duty of the people to do it. Did the gentleman, when he made that charge upon us, remember what we had done? If he did, it is well that we should know, at this early stage, the feeling which actuates that gentleman, but which I hope does not actuate many gentlemen on that side of the House. I feel more sensitive in regard to the charges against my constituents, and more obliged to speak for them, than I do for myself. Examine, if you please, the rolls of your Army, and see if you do not find that a large majority of the men who are fighting the battles of the country represent and are of just such material as those against whom the gentleman's charges are made. If the gentleman from Maryland could place his ear to the bloody graves of the dead of Chickamauga, Chickahominy, Vicksburg, Port Hudson, of the Peninsula, Antietam, Gettysburg, and all the other battle-grounds of the Republic, he would hear a voice coming from them saying that they were just such men as those who have sent these conservative and Democratic members to the Congress of the nation, and who are now maligned by the gentleman from Maryland as having been sent here especially for the purpose of libeling and embarrassing the Administration. Does the gentleman, or any other member from Maryland, recollect the 19th of April, 1861? What city and what people have the honor of having made that day forever memorable? Baltimore and her people. On the streets of what city of this Union was the first blood shed in this war—the blood of men who had started with stout hearts and strong arms to defend the people, enforce the laws, and guard the Constitution? It was on the streets of Baltimore, Maryland, one district of which is represented on this floor by the gentleman, [Mr. DAVIS.] I will say to that gentleman and to his friends that he comes from the wrong latitude to make any such charges against us as he has made here. And, if I am correctly informed, if there had been a free, unbiased, uncontrolled vote in the fourth district of Maryland, we might have had another member on this side of the House to embarrass the Government in the way he charges us, instead of the distinguished gentleman from Maryland.

I say, therefore, in conclusion, that the whole style, matter, and manner of his introductory remarks failed by a great deal to impress me with the belief that he brings with him to the councils of the nation that degree of forbearance, brotherly love, Christian feeling, or statesmanship, which are demanded in these perilous and distracted times.

Now, sir, with this preliminary reply to the introductory remarks of the gentleman from Maryland—which I certainly should have omitted had I not considered his charge upon us and upon our constituents, who are unable to reply save through us, as wanton, unprovoked, and inexcusable—I propose to examine the question now before the House.

In order that we may understand precisely the question before the House, I will read a portion of the joint resolution of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and also the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] as an amendment. The joint resolution is as follows:

*Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the last clause of a "joint resolution explanatory of 'An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes,'" approved July 17, 1862, be, and the same hereby is, so amended as to read: "Nor shall any punishment or proceeding under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the estate of the offender, except during his life." This amendment being intended to limit the operation and effect of the said resolution and act, and the same are hereby limited, only so far as to make them conformable to section three, of article three, of the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That no other public warning or proclamation under the act of July 17, 1862, chapter ninety five, section six, is, or shall be, required than the proclamation of the President made and published by him on the 25th day of July, 1862, which proclamation so made shall be received and held sufficient in all cases now pending, or which may hereafter arise under said act.*

And the following is the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania:

Resolved, &c., That the joint resolution passed on July 17, 1862, entitled "joint resolution explanatory of 'An act to suppress insurrection,'" &c., be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

To ascertain the effect of the passage of this resolution we must bear in mind what the confiscation act of July 17, 1862, is, and also what the joint resolution of the same date is, which this resolution now before us proposes to repeal. Not to take time to read all of the confiscation act of 1862, I will only say that under and by virtue thereof the President is authorized to cause the seizure of the estate of rebel officers, of the president and other officers of the so-called confederate States, of the governor of any of the said States, and of other persons holding offices of honor or trust; and under that act the courts have power to make such orders, establish such forms of decree and sale, and direct such deeds and conveyances to be executed and delivered where real estate shall be the subject of sale, as shall vest in the purchasers good and valid titles thereto. And the joint resolution of the same date, approved at the same time, and which is in fact a part of the confiscation act, and which the President insisted should be passed before he would approve the act, is as follows:

"Resolved, &c., That the provisions of the third clause of the fifth section of 'An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes,' shall be so construed as not to apply to any act or acts done prior to the passage thereof; nor to include any member of a State Legislature, or judge of any State court, who has not in accepting or entering upon his office taken an oath to support the constitution of the so-called "confederate States of America"; nor shall any punishment or proceedings under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life."

The proposition now before the House is substantially the repeal of the resolution which I have just read. If it stands on the statute-book it matters not which of the two constructions of the Constitution is correct which says: "No attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attained"—whether the forfeiture is limited to the life of the offender or whether it operates after his death, for you will perceive that the language of the joint resolution which the President insisted should be passed before he would approve the bill, is so definite, so clear and precise, as to settle the question forever. "Nor shall any punishment or proceedings under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life." The word beyond fixes the limitation with complete certainty. This is undoubtedly the meaning of the words in the Constitution. The President so understood it, and so did both Houses of Congress.

Two theories are put forth as to the effect of the repeal of this joint resolution. One sustained in common by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORR] and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] the other especially advocated by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] The first theory is, that after the repeal of the joint resolution there will be no constitutional objection to so enforcing the confiscation act as to take and dispose of the real estate in fee—working absolute forfeiture thereof and forever, for it is contended that the true construction of the Constitution is not to limit the forfeiture to the life of the offender, while on the other hand I understood the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] in his additional theory which he alone advocates, to say that admitting the Constitution limits forfeiture to the life of the attained, there is another "due process of law," such as that designated in the confiscation act, by which the estate of the rebels may be taken in fee, and therefore he asks for a change of the law by repealing the joint resolution which now positively forbids forfeiture beyond the life of the offender for any of the causes set forth in said act.

I propose for a few minutes to examine these two theories, equally unsound, unheard-of, fallacious, insidious, and revolutionary, and also to answer the question of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. STEVENS] put to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COX] during the running debate last week, and which perhaps was not fully and directly answered at the time. He said:

"The Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason; but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture. Now, has not Congress power to punish other than by attainder, and if that other punishment is the forfeiture of estate, does it violate the first clause of the Constitution?"

In answer to this I reply that it is undoubtedly the prerogative of Congress to define all crimes and offenses against law, and to attach such penalties, not repugnant to the Constitution, as become an enlightened, moral, and Christian people; but when the Constitution affixes limits to any particular mode or form of punishment Congress has no power to step over that boundary and enlarge or extend that particular method of punishment, although they may prescribe other and different penalties not forbidden by the Constitution. For example, the Constitution says:

"The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason; but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attained."

Now, under this authority, Congress has declared the punishment of treason to be death; and though not limited to affixing the death penalty, nor prevented from declaring any other punishment except forfeiture of estate absolutely, it may be of some importance in showing the view of every Congress up to that of 1862, that upon examination of the Statutes at Large you will find no other penalty affixed to that crime from the first enactment of 1790 to the present hour, except it be under the confiscation law of July, 1862.

I say, therefore, that Congress may punish treason by death, or by fine and death, or in any other way not limited or forbidden by the Constitution, but they cannot affix as a penalty the forfeiture of real estate of the offender beyond his life, for the plain reason that the Constitution limits that mode of punishment. Why, it is asked, this limitation? The importance of it was learned from the bitter lessons of the war for American independence.

In the words of a member of the last Congress, (Mr. Thomas).—

"The strife and hate growing out of the confiscations of the Revolution are yet scarcely appeased; and it was with these confiscations fresh in the memories of the framers of the Constitution that the limitation of the power of forfeiture was adopted."

The only possible mode of trying, convicting, and punishing a person guilty of treason is prescribed by the Constitution.

Mr. STEVENS. I would like to understand this matter, and the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him. What I intended to say was that unless Congress passed a law and declared a punishment by attainder, they might inflict a punishment of death for treason, or any other punishment than death with confiscation. I want to know whether the confiscation act, in his judgment, is a bill of attainder, and produces attainder according to the law of this country? In the first section there is no confiscation of real estate, and the other sections which declare forfeiture of real estate have no reference whatever to treason, but to the property of alien enemies.

Mr. SWEAT. I should have answered the gentleman's question before I finished my remarks, and I propose to answer it in that way now. I understand his proposition exactly. He says we cannot punish treason under the Constitution, as such, except by the life of the person attained; and he asks whether there is not some other process, and whether we may not take property in fee for other offenses.

Mr. STEVENS. I think I did not make myself clear. I ask him to say whether there is anything in that bill which does produce attainder.

Mr. SWEAT. That is the point I am approaching, and I will answer the gentleman in as explicit terms as I may be able. The only possible mode of punishing a person convicted of treason is prescribed by the Constitution. The trial of all crimes shall be by a jury, according to one article of the Constitution. It is then provided by another article that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or other infamous crime except by a grand jury. The two great limits embraced in this provision are: first, an indictment by a grand jury; and second, trial before a judicial tribunal and a jury of the country selected according to the law of the land:

"The trial of all crimes, except impeachment, shall be by jury."—Art. 3, sec. 2.

"Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court."—Art. 3, sec. 3.

Again:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury," &c.—Art. 5 Amendments.

The two great elements embraced in these provisions of the Constitution are: first, a presentment or indictment of a grand jury; second, a trial before a judicial tribunal and a jury of the country selected according to law. If, then, the person charged with treason be tried in this way and found guilty, the only remaining thing to be done, or that can be done, is to impose the penalties attached to the commission of the crime; and as I have already said, any punishment previously declared by Congress may be inflicted, not inconsistent with the limitation in the Constitution as to the forfeiture of real estate.

I have said any other punishment may be inflicted not prohibited by the Constitution. I say, therefore, to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, whether Congress has not the power to punish otherwise than by attainder, and whether, if that other punishment is a forfeiture of estate, does it violate the Constitution, that in my judgment Congress cannot constitutionally pass a law to inflict upon a traitor as a punishment of his crime a forfeiture of his estate beyond his life.

No such power has ever been claimed by any jurist in the country down to the present time. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Maryland do not come to a right conclusion in reference to the effect of article first, section nine.

Their reasoning is applicable to article one, section nine, and not to article three, section three.

In commenting on the clause "No attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attained," the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] says:

"Now I take it that the meaning of that clause is that the forfeiture worked shall, must be effected during life. The honorable gentleman from Ohio, and those who think with him, would construe it to be that the forfeiture when worked shall only endure for the life of the party. Palpably the latter is the incorrect and the former the legal meaning. The purpose assumed is the protection of the offspring from punishment for the guilt of the ancestor. But a fine is equally taken from the offspring, as land; yet no one denies the right to fine a person attained. There was, however, an effect of attainder that did punish the offspring, and the offspring alone. Every student of Blackstone knows this, that the judgment convicting a person of treason operated a corruption of blood. The corruption of blood stopped the transmission of heritable blood to any heir of the person attained; so that the legal effect of conviction for treason under the law of England was, first, to forfeit all the property, real and personal, of the person attained, and, secondly, to corrupt his blood, destroy its heritable quality, so that he could neither take land by descent himself, nor transmit heritable blood to the persons who would, but for his attainder, have been his heirs. He could, in the language of the law, have no heirs. The attainder corrupted his blood, and there was no heritable blood transmitted to them."

This is substantially a correct historical sketch and exposition of bills of attainder under the English law, the evil effects of which it was intended by the framers of our Constitution to avoid; but the gentleman has fallen into the common error of supposing that the clause of the Constitution now under consideration is the one to which his argument applies. As a careful lawyer he ought to have examined further and to have read that other provision in the Constitution to which I will now call his attention, by which he will perceive that the odious features of bills of attainder were met and disposed of by another and different clause than the one to which he has applied his argument. His extensive practice at the bar ought to have taught him long ago that the symmetry of that most perfect of all human instruments, the Constitution, can be discovered only by an examination of its different parts.

The clause upon which he comments and to which he has made his remarks applicable is in article three, section three, of the Constitution; but if he will examine article one, section nine, he will find these words, "No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."

It was by this restrictive clause in article one, and not in article three, that the framers of the Constitution at once and forever abolished the barbarous bill of attainder of the English law. The quotation which I have made from the gentleman's speech is applicable as a commentary on article one and not on article three, of the Constitution, for, as I have before said, bills of attainder were abolished by the Constitution in its first article, and before the third article came up for consideration. The citation from Story (volume three, page 210) which has already been made on this floor is a commentary on the restrictive clause in the Constitution, article one, section nine, which says, "No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed," and not upon article three, section three, which says, "No attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attained."

In his Commentaries, touching this restrictive clause, "bill of attainder and ex post facto law," he says:

"Such acts have been often resorted to in foreign Governments as a common engine of state; and even in England they have been pushed to the most extravagant extent in bad times, reaching as well to the absent and the dead as to the living. Sir Edward Coke has mentioned it to be among the transcendent powers of Parliament that an act may be passed to attain a man after he is dead. And the reigning monarch, who was slain at Bosworth, is said to have been attained by an act of Parliament a few months after his death, notwithstanding the absurdity of deeming him at once in possession of the throne and traitor. The punishment has often been inflicted without calling upon the party accused to answer, or without even the formality of proof, and sometimes because the law in its ordinary course of proceedings would acquit the offender. The injustice and iniquity of such acts in general constitute an irresistible argument against the existence of the power. In a free Government it would be intolerable, and in the hands of a reigning faction it might be, and probably would be, abused to the ruin and death of the most virtuous citizens. Bills of this sort have been most usually passed in England in times of rebellion, or of gross subversion to the Crown, or of violent political excitement—periods in which all nations are most liable (as well the free as the enslaved) to forget their duties and to trample upon the rights and liberties of others."

That such were the reasons that induced the framers of the Constitution to insert the clause forbidding Congress to pass any bill of attainder or ex post facto law, I might cite Kent, Rawle, Curtis, and others who have written on the subject. But it cannot be necessary. When they said "No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed," they had finished that subject, and may well be supposed to have known what they had done, and, though they might not have been so accomplished in the science of philology as the learned gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH,] it would not be a violent presumption to suppose that when they came to say in a subsequent clause, "No attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the attainted," they knew what they intended to say, and said what they intended to in plain English language, and that they neither meant nor did in fact modify or change in any way what they had said or done in the previous clause: they meant to say except, and not unless, and the word, with them, had its common, intelligible meaning, and no question has been made as to its clear intent from that time to this, save by the wise philologists that are cropping out in this Hall and in other departments of the Government.

The learned gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] says that the "science of philology is progressive, and that the same word in different ages and times may be used to mean dissimilar things." "Change," he says, "is the irrevocable law of nature, stamped upon everything and appertaining to every department of knowledge." The gentleman then says that we are told by lexicographers that the word except is equivalent to the word unless, and then he shows his familiarity with the Scriptures by several quotations, which another distinguished individual connected with one of the Departments of the Government has also quoted in his recent review of this subject, to show us that the word "except" means the word "unless." He says:

"Numerous instances of this are found in the Holy Bible, where the word 'except' is used in sentences in which at the present day we should invariably use the word 'unless;' thus:

"Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it."

"Except the Lord of hosts had left unto us a very small remnant, we should have been as Sodom."

"Can two walk together, except they be agreed?"

"Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

"Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

"In all these instances, and they could be multiplied almost ad infinitum from writings of that age, both sacred and profane, the word 'except' is used in the sense in which we of the present day would use the equivalent word 'unless.'"

"Now, then, let us, in further illustration of my position, substitute the word 'unless' for the word 'except' in the clause under consideration. It will then read:

"But no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, unless during the life of the person attainted."

Now his construction is a forced one. The word except qualifies and relates to the words immediately following, and not words which must be interpolated in order to carry out his theory. In order to make his views intelligible and to carry out his idea, I submit that he should go still further, that he should have the word "except" or "unless" modify or qualify not what immediately follows, but something he proposes to interpolate; so that it shall read:

No attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture unless the offender be attainted in his lifetime, in which case forfeiture of his estate shall be absolute.

But this, I think, may well be said to be a forced construction, and clearly not intended by the framers of the Constitution.

Do the gentlemen give us any authority for their construction? There is no pretense of any. Is it pretended by them that their construction has ever been sanctioned by any judicial tribunal? They claim no such authority, unless it be that of Judge Underwood, of the United States district court for eastern Virginia, who has recently acted in accordance with this peculiar construction and actually "decreed," as one of our daily papers announces, the sale of certain real estate owned by one Hugh Latham, adjudged guilty of treason, and directed its transfer in fee simple to the purchaser when the same should be sold under order of court. He is the first and only judicial officer, since the formation of our Constitution, to construe the word except as meaning unless. He says:

"If we use the word 'except' in the above sense in the constitutional provision, or make it read 'unless during the life of the person attainted,' we shall at once come to the true intent and meaning of the provision, to wit: that the forfeiture was to be perfected during, and not after, the lifetime of the party attainted."

And under this shallow but wicked perversion of the meaning of the Constitution has decreed the forfeiture and transfer in fee of the real estate of the offender. This he has done, too, while the joint resolution, which is a part of the confiscation act, expressly says that for any of the offenses specified in said act there shall be no forfeiture of real estate beyond the natural life of the offender. Whatever construction may be put on the clause of the Constitution, and whatever powers a judge might have under the confiscation act, if the joint resolution defining the limitation of punishment were not on the statute-book, it is certain that with this resolution in full force and unrepealed, Judge Underwood has as clearly violated his oath of office in this arbitrary decree as he would by decreeing and putting into execution the punishment of death for the common offense of assault and battery. And yet he will not be impeached or removed from office. He is of the elect, in the fold, and will remain where he is to try experiments on the established rights of citizens.

I think the gentleman [Mr. ORTH] might have been able to give us at least one authority, but he did not do us the favor of citing that work which I am satisfied he must have examined very thoroughly. There is an authority—the authority of a gentleman whose ability, whose legal learning and acumen, whose extensive knowledge and research are admitted by all, and, above all, whose patient and devoted loyalty to the country can but command the admiration of those who know him, and who has taken the same view of the subject which the gentleman from Indiana has taken; and there is such a happy harmony and beautiful similarity of opinion, and in some instances of expression, that I wonder he had not felt inclined to do justice to that distinguished individual who has very elaborately considered this question, and published his views and placed them on our desks. I refer to the distinguished Solicitor of the War Department, Mr. William Whiting, of Boston.

Mr. Speaker, I was saying that there never had been but one construction of this article three, section three, of the Constitution; and that was that attainder of treason should not work corruption of blood or forfeiture beyond the life of the attainted. And at the risk of being considered behind the times, and of calling to my aid the opinion of one who in times past commanded respect and attention, but who must now yield to the brighter luminaries of jurisprudence of the political, civil, and higher law, I will venture once more to cite Joseph Story upon the very point now under consideration. In commenting on the express power given to Congress to punish treason, he touches the precise point under discussion, when he uses the words "forfeiture beyond the life of the offender:"

"Two motives probably concurred in introducing it as an express power. One was, not to leave it open to implication whether it was to be exclusively punishable with death, according to the known rule of the common law, and with the barbarous accompaniments pointed out by it, but to confide the punishment to the discretion of Congress. The other was to impose some limitation upon the NATURE and EXTENT of the punishment, so that it should not work corruption of blood, or forfeiture beyond the life of the offender."

"It surely is enough for society to take the life of the offender, as a just punishment of his crime, without taking from his offspring and relatives that property which may be the only means of saving them from poverty and ruin. It is bad policy, too; for it cuts off all the attachments which these unfortunate victims might otherwise feel for their own Government, and prepares them to engage in any other service by which their supposed injuries may be redressed or their hereditary hatred gratified. Upon these and similar grounds it may be presumed that the clause was first introduced into the original draft of the Constitution; and after some amendments, it was adopted without any apparent resistance. By the laws since passed by Congress it is declared that no conviction or judgment, for any capital or other offences, shall work corruption of blood, or any forfeiture of estate. The history of other countries abundantly proves that one of the strong incentives to prosecute offenses as treason has been the chance of sharing in the plunder of the victims. Rapacity has been thus stimulated to exert itself in the service of the most corrupt tyranny; and tyranny has been thus furnished with new opportunities of indulging its malignity and revenge; of gratifying its envy of the rich and good; and of increasing its means to reward favorites and secure retainers for the worst deeds."—Vol. 3, p. 169.

Again, I will refer to another authority, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] seemed to question the other day. Mr. Lieber says:

"The true protection of individual property demands likewise the exclusion of confiscation. For although confiscation, as a punishment, is to be rejected on account of the undefined character of the punishment, depending not upon itself but upon the fact whether the punished person has any property and how much, it is likewise inadmissible on the ground that individual property implies individual transmission, which confiscation totally destroys. It would perhaps not be wholly unjust to deprive an individual of his property as a punishment for certain crimes, if we would allow it to pass to his heirs. We do it in fact when we imprison a man for life, and submit him to the regular prison discipline, disallowing him any benefit of the property he may possess; but it is unjust to deprive his children or other heirs of the individual property, not to speak of the appalling effect which confiscation of property has often produced upon Governments."

From which it is apparent his construction of the clause under consideration would be the same as that of Judge Story.

I have also another quotation from the Federalist, to which I ask the attention of the House:

"As treason may be committed against the United States, the authority of the United States ought to be enabled to punish it; but as new-fangled and artificial treasons have been the great engines by which violent factions, the natural offspring of free Governments, have usually wreaked their alternate malignity on each other, the Convention have with great judgment opposed a barrier to this peculiar danger, by inserting a constitutional definition of the crime, fixing the proof necessary for conviction of it, and restraining the Congress, even in punishing it, from extending the consequences of guilt beyond the person of its author."—The Federalist, p. 173.

It is therefore clear to my mind, Mr. Speaker, that the meaning of this third section of the Constitution is to confine forfeiture of estates to the lives of the offenders.

I wish now to say a single word with reference to the view sustained by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] and which, as I understand, is sustained by him alone:

"It is wholly immaterial whether, in the event of the party's being convicted of treason, Congress can or cannot make a consequence of the judgment the forfeiture of lands in fee simple, or is confined to a forfeiture limited in duration by the life of the convict."

"The question here is whether there is any process of law, however this provision be construed, by which we cannot effect a forfeiture of the whole fee in lands. That question gentlemen have nowhere met."

"The question is whether by other process of law not connected with indictment of the person, not following upon attainder, the United States Government can say that those who have been in arms against it shall forfeit their property, and that the tribunals of the country shall enforce it in rem; and this is settled by the traditional laws of the Republic."

He says:

"The law of the last Congress prescribed a different process from conviction in a court of law of the person guilty of the crime. It provides that upon proceedings in the district court in the nature of proceedings in admiralty the lands of certain classes of persons, and all their personal property, shall be forfeited for the use of the Government."

"And the Constitution provides that the property of citizens shall not be taken without due process of law. Now, the question which gentlemen on the other side of the House have to argue is, not the law of attainder; but whether the process in the district courts of the United States to confiscate the property of persons proved to be of the specified classes is due process of law for depriving a man of his property under the Constitution. If they cannot maintain that that is not due process of law within the meaning of the Constitution, they cannot throw the least doubt on the constitutionality of this mode of procedure."

It is very easy to understand the point of the gentleman. It is a very ingenious argument, but may be, I think, easily answered by any one who would bring to bear on the consideration of the question half of the legal attainments and ability that have been hitherto willingly accorded to him. I think he is evidently mistaken.

He says, admitting that our construction of the Constitution is right, that you cannot confiscate the real estate of the person attainted with treason except during the lifetime of the person so attainted, is there no other process of law by which you can proceed against real estate, as you proceed against personal property, in rem, and confiscate it absolutely?

I answer that there is no such process of law; and if I had the time, I could make appear most distinctly the difference there is between the two classes of property. The distinction is briefly this: I say you cannot proceed against any property in rem unless that property is in some way connected with the subject-matter of the offense. It must be in some way the instrument of the offense; or, to carry the definition a little further, you cannot proceed in rem unless you find that property in delictu—in the wrong—or in some way in default.

The gentleman says:

"If this were a new question, possibly there might be room for argument. But from the first Administration down to this day there has never been a day in which, on the statute-books of the United States, exactly this process to forfeit property for crime without first convicting the owner on indictment has not been prescribed. The law of 1799, among the first of the revenue laws, forfeited property brought in under fraudulent invoices, without proceeding against the individual personally; and all the revenue laws from that day to this enforce these provisions for forfeitures and proceedings in rem."

All this is admitted; but these are cases where the process is enforced against the property without the slightest reference to the guilt of the person. If fraudulent invoices are found, that is all that is necessary to found a proceeding against the property; and the very titles of the actions or suits in court show that it is not necessary to this proceeding to connect the guilt of any person with it. The cases are designated, The United States against the ship A B or C D, as the case may be, or against twenty hogsheads sugar, twenty tierces of molasses, one thousand boxes tobacco, or whatever the article may be which is the instrument of offense, or which may be found in delictu or in default.

Again, he says:

"The navigation laws of the United States, from the earliest days of the Republic, inflict forfeiture in the district court on proceedings against the vessel for violation of those laws without prosecuting the owner, though liable to indictment. Who ever heard that a vessel could not be forfeited unless the master or owner were indicted, or until they had been indicted? Our laws in reference to trade with the Indians make it penal to carry ardent spirits among them, and they punish the persons guilty and forfeit the property by process in rem in the district court. Is that unconstitutional?"

No one has or will contend that you may not proceed against the vessel in the case cited without first indicting the master or owner. By the Constitution, article three, section two, "the judicial power shall extend to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;" and under this sanction, and the laws of Congress passed in pursuance thereof, a large class of cases are designated in which the process is to be against the property. But all these cases come within the distinction which I have made. The vessel in the case cited is the instrument of the offense, and so it is with the "ardent spirits" sold to the Indians in violation of law. I will cite a case which I think comes much nearer to the gentleman's position than any which he has put. Here is land upon which taxes remain unpaid; now, unless paid, the land may be sold, under the conditions prescribed by law. Now I am asked if this land is in delictu—is it the instrument of offense? It cannot be correctly said it is, but it certainly is in default. I think the gentleman can find no case of a process in rem where the property proceeded against is not either the instrument of offense, in delictu, or in default. Does it apply to the real estate of the rebels? Is their real estate the instrument of offense? Is it in the wrong, or in default? Is not the crime of the rebels entirely personal and unconnected with their land?

Mr. STEVENS. Without taking up the gentleman's time, I wish to ask him a single question: suppose this property is that of an alien enemy, does the gentleman hold that his real estate cannot be confiscated absolutely?

Mr. SWEAT. Perhaps they can be confiscated absolutely. The law applying to such cases is well settled, not by Congress, but by the laws of nations, and therefore can have no reference to the subject before us. I am not now discussing the laws of nations. It may be true that under the laws of nations the property of alien enemies may be confiscated absolutely, whether personal or real; but this I am not discussing. I am aware that the theory has been advanced that those now in arms against this Government are so to be regarded. That is a question which I have not time to discuss now, and which does not legitimately come up in this discussion.

Mr. Speaker, I will not take up much more of the time of the House, although I have been interrupted in several instances, but will close by saying one or two words of a general character. I will ask gentlemen on the other side of the House who have spoken upon this subject, what is the importance of all this? what is at the bottom of all this? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] told us the other day that there are three parties in this country: one in favor of prosecuting the war and of furnishing men and money to an unlimited extent; another party opposed to continuing the war further upon any terms; and a third party in favor of the war, but opposed to all the necessary means for carrying it on. Well, sir, in order to ascertain in which of these parties gentlemen on this side of the House may properly range themselves, a little inquiry into the purposes of gentlemen on the other side may be necessary. If it is their purpose to open up all the lands of the South de novo for the benefit of speculators, as has already been done, if the senseless opinions of Judge Underwood are to be followed, let gentlemen say that such is their intention. In which case I think I might reduce the parties to two, one of which is in favor of carrying on the war to subdue the armed rebellion and preserve the Union, and to furnish the Government with all the means necessary to do it, to which I claim to belong; while the other is in favor of making it an abolition war, and would not stop it even though all the rebels should lay down their arms and swear to obey the laws of the land, unless upon the previous destruction of slavery and the taking away all State rights, and the rehabilitation of the whole southern country. If the gentlemen are willing to stand on this platform, let us know it. Such seem to be the two grand divisions of parties to which we are fast tending. It is the doctrine of Fred. Douglass put forth directly in his resolution. It is not my doctrine. I have one simple theory. I have had but one from the beginning of the war up to the present time. My theory is, prosecute earnestly, prosecute vigorously this war until the armed rebellion is subdued. Repeal all unconstitutional laws and pass none that are unconstitutional. And when this armed rebellion is put down let the States come back, for they will come back. Welcome them back, and let all the questions in dispute which are now undertaken to be settled in advance be settled by the judicial tribunals of the land. This seems to me to be the only wise and true course. I do not believe in the powers of the President, nor in the powers of Congress, nor in any powers outside of the Constitution, of blotting out States and obliterating State lines.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. SWEAT. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House for a moment more in which to conclude what I have to say.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. SWEAT. Mr. Speaker, I say that I do not believe in the power of any of the departments of the Administration, or of the whole Administration together, to blot out State lines, or to make them oscillate upon the face of the earth as the shadows of a wandering maniac. I am for a policy of vigorous prosecution of the war until the rebellion is crushed. I am for filling up the armies of the Union, and willing to legislate for that purpose. When you have asked me to vote supplies, I have shown you by my example that I am ready to do that. When you proposed a repeal of the law for paying additional bounties, we voted with you. We voted for it because it was your suggestion, for we supposed you knew whether it was needed or not. The President and the Secretary of War asked for a reconsideration of that matter, so that the bounties might be continued, and we of this side of the House voted for it. We wish to put no embarrassment in the way of the Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to go into a political speech or to lay down any political platform. I say to gentlemen upon the other side that I am willing, and I believe all of my friends here are willing, to aid them in all legislation that is necessary to put down this armed rebellion. I hope that we shall not have any more charges from that side of the House that we are here for the purpose of troubling and impeding the Administration. Let us do as Macaulay has said they did at an eventful period in English history, when Roundheads and Cavaliers, Episcopalians and Presbyterians joined in firm union to sustain the laws of the land. I will go with any gentleman for that purpose. But on the matter before the House I feel it to be my duty to vote in the way I have indicated. If we have generals in the field, encourage them, pay them well, but let us see that they are on duty, and that they are not upon furlough and without commands, as we have it reported by the Secretary of War that many of them are, at an expense to the Government of $27,000 per month. Let us undertake to discover and punish public corruption and fraud; for I hold that public corruption is private corruption, and that public sin is private sin, and that we are responsible just to the extent that we know it and do nothing to prevent and remedy it. I will join the gentlemen upon the other side of the House, and I think that the gentlemen upon this side will join them, in the action suggested in these desultory remarks for accomplishing that great object, of ending the war and preserving the Union. If we stand by that proud old flag which is hanging so gracefully above you, Mr. Speaker, as full of inspiration to-day as it has ever been, "the glorious emblem of resistless and beneficent power," it will assuredly lead us to glory and to victory.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

SPEECH OF HON. J. R. DOOLITTLE,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

February 9, 1864.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration the bill (S. No. 41) to promote enlistments in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, the pending question being on Mr. HENDERSON'S amendment to the third section of the bill—

Mr. DOOLITTLE said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: War and not peace is our real situation. Whatever may have produced this state of things, war is upon us with all its necessities, with all its realities, with all its stern duties, and we must fight it through. At this hour, whatever will give strength to our armies in the field and bring revenue to support them, demands the first consideration of Congress, and of every Department of this Government. If left to me I would speak but one word, fill up the ranks, press on the columns. To spare the unnecessary shedding of blood; to save the resources of the country; to solve all financial questions, and put our credit upon a basis so strong as to command the money of the world, I would speak no other word but "fill up the ranks, press on the columns." To secure liberty and Union; to secure peace with all other nations by inspiring them with respect; and to put a final end to that conspiracy, founded on slavery, which makes war against us, I would still say, as the most radical and at the same time the most certain of all measures, "fill up the ranks, press on the columns." But, sir, my voice is but one.

Other considerations are continually pressed, and will be pressed upon us; other subjects will be involved in times like these, and we are called upon to meet them and to discuss them. I regret that all the legislation of the present session on the subject of enrolling troops had not passed Congress before the adjournment for the holidays. They ought to have been matured and passed before that long adjournment. I fear we have nearly lost forty days, forty days of most precious, valuable time to the Government in filling up our armies. Again, sir, in my opinion, it is much wiser in all bills which concern the enrollment of troops not to embarrass them by other provisions not necessary to raise the troops and to fill the ranks of our armies. I rejoice that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, has determined to confine the question of the enrollment and pay of troops to that single issue, and not involve with it the consideration of the abolition of slavery within the States by act of Congress.

Some remarks have been made, however, upon this bill and upon the subject of the Crittenden compromise, as it is called; this morning, which lead me, with the indulgence of the Senate, to make some general observations not very pertinent to the bill under consideration, but bearing upon the present state of the slavery question.

Mr. President, if we look at this question as now presented under the present aspect of affairs, we see at once that three years of war have changed the slavery issue altogether. What are the facts? In 1860 the sole issue concerning slavery was, shall it enter the Territories? It had nothing to do with slavery in the States. The question of slavery in the States was entirely disclaimed. Neither the purpose nor the power to interfere with slavery in the States under the Constitution was claimed in 1860, and never has been claimed by any party in this country, not even by the abolition party from its first organization. Neither the Democratic party, the Whig party, the Republican party, nor the Abolition party ever claimed, under the Constitution of the United States, the power to legislate on the subject of slavery within the jurisdiction of the States. The sole issue, therefore, so far as slavery was concerned in 1860 was, shall slavery enter the Territories? The people in the election of Mr. Lincoln decided that slavery should not enter the Territories, and that was all they decided.

After that election, in December, 1860, we met here in the Halls of Congress. The champions of slavery, extension and slavery propagandism raised the same issue in a new form. They said to the representatives of the incoming Administration, "If you will change the Constitution so as to guaranty slavery in all the territory south of 36° 30' which we now have or may hereafter acquire, we will submit to the election of Mr. Lincoln; we will remain in the Union; but if you will not consent to such an amendment we will make war upon the Government and break up the Union." Those representatives refused so to amend the Constitution. The champions of slavery appealed to arms and to the God of battles. By that appeal to that dread tribunal they have changed the issue. It is no longer whether slavery shall go into the Territories. That is already decided against them. Slavery is abolished in all the Territories of the United States, and from this time henceforth and forever the foot of a slave can never tread one inch of the soil of the American Territories.

But, I repeat, sir, in making this appeal to the God of battles and to high Heaven they have raised other issues. Sowing to the wind they have reaped the whirlwind. In declaring war against the Union they have raised the question whether this Government shall live or die. In declaring that they would not submit to the decisions of a majority of the people at the ballot-box, in accordance with the express provisions of the Constitution, they have raised the question whether republican constitutional liberty itself, based upon the divine right of the majority to rule, shall not perish forever. They did more, sir. When they made this appeal to the God of battles and impiously asked the blessing of Heaven upon their cause they openly and boldly proclaimed to the whole civilized world that they made war against the United States in the name of slavery and under the flag of slavery. Slavery was to be the corner-stone of their southern confederacy. In the name of slavery they drew the sword; in the name of slavery they plunged it toward the heart of this Republic. But, sir, under the providence of that God to whose decision they appealed, that sword has been plunged back into its own vitals and its life-blood is gushing all around us.

They not only avowed slavery to be the corner-stone of their edifice, but they boldly proclaimed slavery to be a divine institution, founded upon the Bible itself. They unblushingly declared war with the whole civilization of the present age. All are familiar with the declarations of Mr. Stephens and the leading men of this rebellion, which I will not repeat. But there is one avowal made not long ago in the Richmond Enquirer speaking for the rebel cause published at the seat of its power, in presence of Jefferson Davis and his congress of conspirators, so remarkable in its character that I will read from it a sentence or two:

"The establishment of this confederacy, based as it is upon slavery, and upon the principles of natural subordination, is verily a distinct reaction against the whole course of the ages' civilization." "For 'liberty, equality, fraternity,' we have imperatively substituted 'slavery, subordination, Government.'" "There are slave races, born to serve, master races born to govern."

"By these principles we live, and in their defense we have shown ourselves ready to die. Reverently, we feel that our confederacy is a God-sent missionary to the nations with great truths to preach. We must speak them boldly, and whose hath ears to hear, let him hear."

Yes, sir, let him hear this confederacy now waging war against this Government boldly avow slavery as the corner-stone. Yes, let him hear them declare, in the face of the whole world and before high Heaven, war not only against the American Republic, but war against the civilization of the age; and, above all, let him hear them impiously pretend that the so-called confederacy is a God-sent missionary to preach slavery as the new gospel of a higher civilization to the nations of the earth. This is the appeal, and this is the form under which they make their appeal to the arbitrament of the God of battles and in the face of Heaven. I again repeat, Mr. President, that by this appeal which they themselves have taken, they the traitors, and not the loyal people of the United States, have wholly changed the slavery issue, and have forced upon this country other issues, issues which were not involved at all in the canvass of 1860, namely, whether this Government shall live or die; whether a rebel confederacy seeking nationality with slavery as its corner-stone shall succeed or be blotted out; and whether Christian civilization itself shall continue to make progress or roll backward two thousand years. These are the new issues which, in their appeal in a form which I regard as little less than impious, they have made. I devoutly trust, I most religiously believe, that the great Disposer of events, in whose hands the destinies of nations are held, will give to the loyal people of these United States the wisdom, patriotism, unity, and courage to maintain the Union of these States, to crush the impious pretensions of slavery, and defend the civilization of the age in which we live.

Slavery, Mr. President, is dying, dying all around us. It is dying as a suicide dies. It is dying in the house and at the hands of its own professed friends. The sword which it would have driven into the vitals of this Republic is parried and thrust back into its own. And, sir, let it die; let it die. Without any sympathy of mine, slavery with all its abominations may die and go into everlasting perdition. But it is to the all-important fact that slavery is dying that I would call the attention of the Senate for a moment. Look around you. Look at West Virginia: slavery is not only dying, but it is dead and buried beyond resurrection, upon the soil of West Virginia. How is it in the State of Missouri? Slavery is dying there; ay, practically dead. The simple question among that people now is, when shall its funeral be fixed? When shall its final burial take place?

How is it in the State of Maryland? Mr. Thomas, at one time Governor of that State, speaking upon that subject at Rockville, said not long since:

"Slavery is effectually dead in this State. No lot of one hundred slaves in the State will sell on the block for $1,000. No slave in the State can be made to render to his owner more of his labor than he elects to render, or to remain under his jurisdiction a month after he elects to flee from it. Such are the results of the war for the benefit of slavery made upon the legal and constitutional rights of white labor throughout the Union."

The other day we all listened with earnest attention as well as great joy to the eloquent speech of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] when from an outgushing heart he spoke the living truth in "thoughts that breathe and words that burn." He declared to us, slavery is dead in the State of Maryland. His colleague says the same thing; slavery is a dead thing in the State of Maryland, a thing of the past, a thing that was, which is no more to exist in the future of that State. Sir, at such a progress the very angels in heaven rejoice, and all who love liberty on earth sing hosannas to the God of heaven.

How is it in the State of Tennessee? The Nashville Union, speaking for the people of that State, not long ago said:

"What Governor Thomas says of slavery in Maryland is equally true of slavery in Tennessee. No slave here can be compelled to work for his owner against his will, nor can a slave be made to remain with his owner unless he chooses to do so. Whenever a slave is dissatisfied with his home he walks off, as freely as a black man would in a northern State or in Europe."

"In Tennessee the slave code is dead; and the master has no longer absolute control over the body and limbs of his former bondsman. We doubt whether any slaveholder in Tennessee has faith enough in the restoration of the system of compulsory labor to give $100 in good money for the best negro among us."

And what did Governor Andrew Johnson, speaking upon this subject to the people of the State of Tennessee on the 8th day of January last, say? I cannot mention the name of Andrew Johnson of Tennessee without paying the highest tribute to him and to the course he has pursued in the midst of this struggle, of which language is capable. Sir, statesmen have done well, generals have won victories in the field, but to Andrew Johnson of Tennessee, for the course pursued by him in this Senate and in the State of Tennessee, this nation, the American people, owe a debt of gratitude which they can never repay. Sir, I trust in God the time is not far distant when we may hear his voice once more within the Halls of this Senate Chamber. On the 8th day of January last, in a speech at Nashville on this subject, he said:

"Before the rebellion we could discuss all institutions, all subjects, all measures except slavery. On that subject no one dared speak or write or print, except on the side of the slave aristocracy. Now, thank God, the time has come when the press is unimuzzled, when the press can discuss this and all other subjects. The time has come when this institution is dead, when the chains are broken and the captive set free. The institution is dead, and slaves are not worth a quarter of a dollar a dozen. Being dead, let us in a becoming manner prepare for the funeral obsequies. Now is the time to dispose of this great question."

Again, in the course of the same speech, he said:

"The edict has gone forth, and all that remains to be done is to change the relation of master and slave. The day is not far distant when this nation will be the great center of civilization, of the arts and sciences, and of true religion. Time was when the tide of emigration ran westward; the time will soon be when it will run southward. Let us go on with our mighty work. To talk about breaking up a Government like this for slavery! It is madness. Let it go on with its great mission."

Again, and still later, on the 21st of January, at a large meeting of Union citizens in the State of Tennessee, held in the hall of the House of Representatives of that State in Nashville, Mr. Johnson said:

"Is there a man here that has observed this thing who does not know that the institution of slavery in Tennessee is dead?"

Among the resolutions adopted at this meeting, resolutions taking measures to hold a convention in that State to frame a constitution based upon this fact, that slavery is dead in Tennessee, I find the following:

"Resolved, That as slavery was the cause of all our troubles, and as it is an unmitigated evil in itself, and since it may be considered dead by the acts of its own friends, that it may never be resurrected to enable a small minority to bring the ruin upon our children that it has upon us, we here pledge ourselves to use all our influence to elect such men, and only such men, as delegates to such convention as shall be in favor of immediate and universal emancipation now and forever. And we invite our fellow-citizens everywhere to unite with us on this platform, and thus use the opportune moment to free ourselves and our posterity from the bondage in which we have been so long enslaved by the influence of an arrogant, domineering aristocracy."

Here we find Mr. Johnson, acting Governor of Tennessee, long a Senator and Representative from Tennessee, who knows better than any other the actual condition of things in that State, in this speech declaring in most positive terms that every person who observes for himself knows that slavery is dead in the State of Tennessee; and the people, who are now organizing for the purpose of accepting this as an accomplished fact, and of placing it in the constitution of the State of Tennessee, in their resolutions declare the same fact, that slavery is dead, and that it has died at the hands of its own pretended friends.

In Arkansas, under the lead of General Grant and others, a constitution is already formed, making Arkansas forever a free State.

38TH CONG. ... 1ST SESS.

Enlistments in the Army—Mr. Doolittle.

SENATE.

Why should not the real friends of freedom, in spite even of the terrible war in which we are still engaged, hold one general jubilee, one grand day of national thanksgiving at the great progress which it has already made?

Again, Mr. President, how does slavery stand in the State of Louisiana? I undertake to say that all parties in that State this day accept the same fact, that slavery is an institution of the past, that slavery is dead in the State of Louisiana. The relation of master and slave there has been utterly broken up, in fact. It no longer exists. The people of Louisiana are now organizing, accepting this as a fact, to form the basis of a new constitution to make Louisiana forever a free State of the American Union. I have seen a very recent letter from the commanding general of that department. Speaking upon this subject in most clear and unequivocal terms, General Banks says:

"It gives me great pleasure to report the progress making in the State election. All parties participate in the selection of candidates, and a very handsome vote will be given. Not a word is heard from any one of a restoration of slavery."

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator pardon me one moment for asking him a question? Is the election to be a free one, or is it to be governed by military restraint, as it was governed in Delaware and in Maryland?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The election is free to all who will take the oath of loyalty and to support the Constitution of the United States, as prescribed in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Is that the only oath necessary? Can they vote by taking that oath?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Substantially that. Traitors and those who have taken part as traitors are not invited to take part in the election unless they will take the oath.

But to continue: "And no objection," says General Banks, "is made to the free-State basis on which the election is based." "The mass of the people are entirely satisfied," with the speedy organization of the State. "The election will give more general satisfaction than any that has taken place in twenty years." He speaks of the mass of the people of Louisiana. Of those rebels who have left the State of Louisiana and who are now in the armies of the confederacy, he does not speak; they are not there; but of the mass of the people who remain in Louisiana he says that now at this day they will be entirely satisfied with the election, and that no person speaks of the restoration of slavery, but all are satisfied with the organization of Louisiana upon the free-State basis; all accept the fact which is patent to all the world, that slavery as an institution in that State has ceased to exist.

I know, Mr. President, questions are sometimes raised and discussed as to what has caused the death of slavery. There are some who maintain in all sincerity the proclamation of the President has destroyed slavery within those States. There are some who say the abolitionists of the country have destroyed slavery within the States. Some say the legislation of Congress has destroyed slavery in the States, and some say the destruction of slavery is the necessary consequence of the war; the unavoidable result of the occupation of their territory by the armies of the Union. My own opinion is, that while all these may have done something, much, perhaps, in producing this result, more than all of them put together, the insane madness of the pretended friends of slavery by declaring war upon this Government in the name of slavery; by waging that war under the flag of slavery; by drawing the sword of slavery themselves to plunge it into the heart of this Republic, they have themselves done more than all other things combined to put an end to that institution forever on the American continent.

God, the Almighty, has suffered the madness of these men to bring on an issue which alone could solve the great problem of American slavery.

The first shot fired at Fort Sumter was the death-knell of slavery. The issue of 1860, as I have said, was whether slavery should enter the Territories. By that act they, the champions of slavery, changed the issue. It was not the party which elected Mr. Lincoln President of the United States. The champions of slavery brought on this war which involves the destruction of slavery within the States, not the Republican party. For the issue of 1860, whether slavery shall enter the Territories, they have forced upon the country this other and greater issue, whether liberty and Union shall live or slavery die upon the soil of every State of the United States. In reply to this often-repeated charge that the Republican party have changed the issue and proved false to their pledges, I am prepared to go further and show that, so far as the institution of slavery is concerned within the States, that party never sought to change their ground nor to interfere with it at all until the necessities of the war forced it upon them. Indeed, sir, if they had not made war upon the Government slavery never stood stronger nor better defended by State guarantees, nor, so far as this Government is concerned, by Federal guarantees within the States, than it did on the 4th day of March, 1861; and if those men had consented to remain within the Union, if they had not made war upon this Government, there was no power on the part of this Government nor of any party within the free States in the slightest degree to affect or destroy the institution of slavery.

You know, Mr. President, that the fugitive slave law, harsh, and I will say, barbarous as some of its provisions were, was still a law upon our statute-books, and was enforced in every State of the Union; it was enforced in Massachusetts; it was enforced in New York; it was enforced in Ohio; it was enforced in Wisconsin; and at the very time when Mr. Lincoln was elected President of the United States a citizen of Wisconsin was in jail, imprisoned for the violation of the fugitive slave law, from which, and upon the last day of Mr. Buchanan's Administration, he was pardoned as an act of grace. These are the facts. More, the census report before me shows that notwithstanding all the controversies we had upon the subject of the fugitive slave law and its enforcement, from 1850 down to 1860, there were less per cent. escapes of fugitive slaves than at any former period of the Government. I will read a short extract from this report:

"The number of slaves who escaped from their masters in 1860 is not only much less in proportion than in 1850, but greatly reduced numerically. The greatest increase of escapes appears to have occurred in Mississippi, Missouri, and Virginia, while the decrease is most marked in Delaware, Georgia, Louisiana, Maryland, and Tennessee.

"That the complaint of insecurity to slave property by the escape of this class of persons into the free States, and their recovery impeded, whereby its value has been lessened, is the result of misapprehension, is evident not only from the small number who have been lost to their owners, but from the fact that up to the present time the number of escapes has been gradually diminishing to such an extent that the whole annual loss to the southern States from this cause bears less proportion to the amount of capital involved than the daily variations which in ordinary times occur in the fluctuations of State or Government securities in the city of New York alone.

"From the tables annexed it appears that while there escaped from their masters 1,011 slaves in 1850, or in each 3,165 held in bondage, (being about one thirtieth of one per cent.) during the census year ending June 1, 1860, out of 3,949,557 slaves, there escaped only 893, being 1 to about 5,000, or at the rate of one fiftieth of one per cent."

I have read this extract for the purpose of showing the statement I made to be correct, that notwithstanding all this pretended opposition to the enforcement of the fugitive slave law within the free States, from 1850 to 1860 the actual escapes of slaves grew less and less, so that all this pretense of the rebels that the escape of their slaves was any excuse for them to plunge this country into civil war is without foundation. You know very well, sir, that if the champions of slavery and slave propagandism had peaceably submitted to the election of Mr. Lincoln, not the hair of the head of slavery within any State could have been touched. By every pledge which he had given, by every pledge of every political party in this country down to his election, it was always held that the Congress of the United States and the Federal Government had no power over slavery within the States in a time of peace; and if the champions of slavery and slave propagandism had not plunged the country in war, had not made this impious appeal to arms and to the God of hosts they could have lived in peace within all the States and have held the institution of slavery under their own laws, according to their own will, for their own disposition, beyond the power of this Government or of any party in this Government to interfere with it in any degree. But they did no such thing. "Whom the gods destroy they first make mad." It was their own madness, their own insanity, their own blind-fanatical and impious dogma that slavery is a divine institution, which, trampling on civilization and outraging Heaven, by leading them to make war on this Government, put the knife to the throat of slavery. It is in the midst of its dying struggles. Let them prepare for its last obsequies, and when as mourners and pall-bearers they attend its funeral, let them remember its own friends put it to death, and gain from that source all the consolation it brings.

I remember very well a debate I once had in this body with Senator Mason, of Virginia, on this point. He was always declaiming about the loss of fugitive slaves from the State of Virginia. I asked Mr. Mason, "How many do you lose annually from the State of Virginia?" He replied, "We have had a committee upon that subject who have gone into an estimate, and they find we lose as much as $100,000 worth of slave property every year." "Very well, sir, how many slaves have you?" "About five hundred thousand." "What are they estimated to be worth?" You remember they were estimated very high in those days—at about eight hundred dollars apiece. Five hundred thousand slaves at $800 apiece, would amount to the enormous figure of $400,000,000. What is the loss of $100,000 on $400,000,000? It is but one fortieth of one per cent., a quarter of a mill on a dollar, and I said to Mr. Mason then on this floor, "If instead of continually denouncing the people of New England for not enforcing the fugitive slave law, and underground railroads, you would go down to the city of Hartford and engage some of those shrewd insurance men who have made that city distinguished in that business to insure the people of Virginia against escapes by fugitive slaves, they could insure the whole slave property of Virginia at one half of one per cent., and make immense fortunes at that;" for the real loss was only one fourth of one mill on the dollar. I remember very well the other question which I put to him: "Sir, if you undertake to break up this Union, if you propose to bring down that line beyond which fugitive slaves are not returned from the northern border of Ohio and New York to the north line of Virginia, how much will insure your slave property then? will ten per cent. do it, or twenty per cent. do it, or fifty per cent. do it?" Mr. President, they have tried the experiment, and slavery lies in ruins all around us. Slave property is utterly valueless. Slaves are free as their masters.

The time has come which Mr. Randolph, a distinguished statesman of Virginia, said would come, when, if the slaves do not run away from their masters, the masters will run away from their slaves.

The time has come which was foretold by Mr. Faulkner in the convention of Virginia in its better days, in 1832, when it was proposed to abolish slavery. He then, in substance, said, "If we shall attempt to break up this Union on account of slavery, a time of anguish and suffering will come in Virginia compared with which the pestilence that walketh in darkness and the destruction that wasteth at noon-day will be a blessing." They have realized it all, and they have brought it down on their own heads. It is not the Republican party that has brought it upon them. They have brought it upon themselves. By that overruling providence of God which makes the madness of men to do his work, of Him who rides the whirlwind and directs the storm, who rules the passions of men as He rules the winds of heaven and the waves of the sea, in His own good time and for His own good purpose He has allowed the madness and the insanity of these men, in their ardent and fanatical devotion to extend slavery and build up slavery, to attempt to destroy this Government, in order that He might overrule them to utterly destroy slavery itself and wipe it from this continent forever.

Mr. President, I accept as a fact accomplished, a part of the history of this country, that slavery is dead, and I rejoice at it with inexpressible joy. All wise statesmen act upon facts accomplished, accept them, and go forward in accordance with them; but when I act, I prefer to act boldly, frankly, openly. Therefore I am not in favor of doing it by indirection, by putting this or that or the other ambiguous provision upon an enrollment bill or upon a revenue bill. I prefer by far to appeal to the sovereign authority in this country, the people of the United States. I shall not anticipate or enter upon a discussion of measures that may be presented before Congress further than to say that I rejoice that the proposition has come from the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] and from a recent slave State, one of the States most deeply interested; it has already been presented to this body and it has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and is before that committee for its consideration and action, a proposition which appeals at once to a tribunal above Congress, above the decrees of the Supreme Court, above the proclamations of the President, in which resides the sovereign source of power, the people of the United States, to have them declare as a part of the Constitution of the United States, the fundamental law of the land, the final and irrevocable decree that from and after a certain day slavery and involuntary servitude shall neither exist in any State nor in any Territory of the United States, except in punishment of crime.

I shall not enter into a discussion of that question at the present time, for I will not anticipate the action, whatever it may be, of our committee upon that subject. I shall wait until their report comes into the Senate, simply saying for myself that if this Government is to act at all in a legislative capacity, I prefer to act in the mode provided by the Constitution itself. Let two thirds of both Houses of Congress submit the proposition to the Legislatures of three fourths of the States, and when ratified by them there will be no appeal from their decision. It will then rest upon a solid ground which no laws of Congress, no decrees of the Supreme Court, no change of parties or of Presidents can shake, enduring and eternal as the Government itself.

I therefore, Mr. President, conclude by saying that I concur in the wisdom of that course which I believe the chairman of our Military Committee proposes to adopt, and that is to present his bill on the subject of the pay of colored troops in our armies separate and distinct by itself, unembarrassed with all other considerations.

DISPOSITION OF FREED NEGROES.

SPEECH OF HON. H. W. DAVIS, OF MARYLAND,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 25, 1864.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the bill which is now under consideration involves a subject forced on us by the events of the war, and which must be determined one way or the other—the disposition of the freed negroes in the rebel States. The range of debate has naturally been very wide upon a bill of this character; and topics not, perhaps, at first sight very directly related to it have been dragged into the discussion.

The votes of the gentlemen from the loyal slave States cast a new light on the mind of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] respecting the fate of the negro race on this continent. But while he justly appreciated the great and decisive weight of that vote upon the speakership of this House, he took occasion to discredit the moral power of that vote by impeaching the election of the Representatives who cast it. He thinks they speak words not authorized by the people. He said:

"I know that the people of Maryland and of Delaware, if they had been allowed to vote, intended no such decree."

That is, of emancipation—

"And I know that it is said those two States are better represented by the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] than by their Representatives here."

If this were merely meant as a compliment to my distinguished friend from Ohio I would be among the first to admit that any district of Maryland, as well as any in New York, would be better represented by him than by any gentleman representing either State—even the gentleman from New York. But when it comes in the shape of an imputation upon the validity and moral force of the election, it questions the legitimacy of the Administration majority in this House, and must not pass unanswered. When the gentleman from New York says "it is said those two States are better represented by the honorable gentleman from Ohio than by those who represent them here," no person who cares to have any respect for his knowledge of the public affairs of the day has so said. And when the honorable gentleman says that "he knows that the people of Maryland and Delaware, had they been allowed to vote, intended no such decree," I desire to say that the honorable gentleman from New York does not know any such thing, and knows no fact that makes the error excusable.

"Had they been allowed to vote?" Who hindered them from voting? Where were they stopped from voting? "The people of Maryland!" If the gentleman means to say that because the people of Maryland determined that the traitors of Maryland, who disavowed their allegiance to the Government, should not tarnish the ballot-box by their votes, we differ about the terms, but not about the facts. We did mean they should not vote, and we so meant because by the laws of Maryland such men are not entitled to vote. They who disavow, deny, and disown their allegiance to the United States, and declare and avow they are not citizens of the United States, have no right to vote; and so the judges of elections held, almost from one end of Maryland to the other. If that is not good election law, this House can say so; the General Assembly of Maryland can say so; and if both be silent the law is confessed.

If the gentleman referred to the complaints which are made of the interference of the military in the election, I desire to say that that complaint comes from nobody but the heated partisans who howl because they are beaten. Even they confined the complaint to one single congressional district out of five, and to four out of eight counties in that congressional district; and therefore, conceding everything that is complained of, and everything that is inferred from the complaint, we have an undisputed election in four fifths of the State, which the gentlemen who make the complaint do not dispute. No one questions the election of the honorable member from the fifth congressional district, [Mr. HARRIS,] where the divided Union vote was overborne by the united secession vote, and where the aggregate vote of the district fell only a little below the normal vote of the district before the rebellion attracted many of its young men to the rebel ranks.

My honorable friend in my eye from the second congressional district [Mr. WEBSTER] could find no competitor to meet him before the people.

The distinguished gentleman, the senior of the delegation [Mr. THOMAS] from the fourth congressional district, is here for the second time an unopposed candidate. And I am here because my political opponents did not care to take the responsibilities of a canvass, although aided and urged to oppose me by a distinguished adviser of the President up to within a week of the election. So that of all the State of Maryland, whose election is here impeached, in three fifths of it there was no contest whatever; in one fifth there was a contest in which our opponents had so free an election that they have their Representative on this floor; and in the other fifth the contest is only impeached in four of the eight counties; and if the whole vote which was not cast in that district be added to the aggregate vote of our opponents, the emancipationists will still have a majority of thirteen or fourteen thousand in the State. And yet, in the face of such facts, a gentleman, who is entitled to be regarded as an intelligent observer of public affairs, rises here and says that he knows that if the people of Maryland had been permitted to vote they would not have allowed the emancipation candidate for comptroller to carry the State by twenty thousand majority!

In Delaware the case is still more absurd; for after an animated canvass the opponent of the Representative from that State withdrew on the eve of the election; and yet the vote for the gentleman from Delaware was the largest ever cast in that State for any candidate, and a majority of the whole vote of the State.

Mr. Speaker, the Legislature of Maryland is overwhelmingly Union, but not overwhelmingly for emancipation. There is a majority in the Senate opposed to it, and there is a majority in the House who were not in favor of it when they came to Annapolis; because, though elected by emancipation constituencies they were nominated before their constituents, had developed their views upon the subject. But this election which the gentleman from New York wishes to impeach carried with it such moral power that its enemies in the Senate and its lukewarm and doubtful friends in the House of Delegates are dragged backward over their prejudices and compelled to pass just such a bill as we dictated to them, and it stands now the law of the State of Maryland by the votes of a majority of both Houses of the Legislature. They confessed to that moral power which the honorable gentleman ignorantly denies.

"Slavery is dead," says the honorable gentleman. "Slavery is dead," is echoed by some on this side of the House. "Slavery is dead," is echoed from the two sanguine people of the country. He may be a very sick man, Mr. Speaker, but I assure gentlemen of this House and the country that he is not dead; and if he is not done to death he will be your master again. That is my opinion, and I think my friend from Kentucky in my eye [Mr. MALLORY] agrees with me.

Slavery is not dead in Maryland. We have to carry a majority of the convention on the old slavery apportionment, where one fourth of the population ties the body; and whether the hostile influence that presides near the President's ear will allow Maryland to become a free State, or will fail her in her hour of need, remains yet to be seen. Up to this day Maryland is under no obligations to the President of the United States for the great strides that the cause of emancipation has made there. A convention of the loyal men, the emancipationists of Maryland, on the 22d of this month, while declaring themselves in favor of immediate and unconditional emancipation, and while expressing their confidence in the President and their appreciation of his services, added this significant admonition, worthy of the State and of the people that uttered it:

I trust that that admonition will have its weight, and that these sinister influences will cease to be the controlling element near the presidential ear in this grave crisis of emancipation in Maryland; and I desire that the country shall understand that, being under small obligations to the President for what has been done in Maryland up to this time, the people of Maryland thought it wise while expressing their confidence in the President to put that significant resolution before him for his serious consideration, so as to show that their devotion is not personal, but to principle; that their interest is in the cause and not in a man, and that while they will support the man as long as the man supports the cause, if the cause fail by any failure elsewhere, there may be a revision of their judgment respecting the person.

But "slavery is dead in the rebel States." No, sir. No, sir. Far from it. If our honorable friends on the other side elect their President in the coming fall, slavery is as alive as it was the day that the first gun blazed against Sumter. If we lose the majority in the next Congress, slavery is as powerful as it ever was. We are, it is true, in the condition in which we cannot stand still. We must go backward or we must go forward. My face, sir, is to the future. I wish so to look at it, and so to say, to the men of my day and generation, what I think about the great measures which now touch the salvation of the country, that, whether I be on the winning or on the losing side, whether the nation triumph or fail, whenever anybody shall by accident hereafter rake about among the ashes of the past and find my name, he will find at least that I did not fear to say to friend and foe what the times demand; and it may be that it will be well if it were heeded.

Slavery is not dead by the proclamation. What lawyer attributes to it the least legal effect in breaking the bonds of the slave? Executed by the bayonets, legally valid to the extent of the duration of the war, under the law of 1862 which authorizes the President to use the people of African descent as he may see fit for the suppression of the rebellion, it is undoubtedly valid to the extent of turning them loose from their masters during the rebellion. So long as the military power is engaged in suppressing resistance, they are free from their masters. Reestablish the old governments, allow the dominant aristocracy to repossess the State power in its original plenitude, how long will they be free? What courts will give them their rights? What provision is there to protect them? Where is the writ of habeas corpus? How are the courts of the United States to be open to them? Who shall close the courts of the States against the master? Does the master resort to the court against the slave? No; he seizes him by the neck. The law of last Congress freeing a few slaves provides that that act may be pleaded in defense. But when is the slave sued by his master? When is the time to plead in any such process? Gentlemen legislate without a knowledge of the country or of the people they are legislating for. Their laws are on the statute-book, and the opinions of the dominant faction conspire to perpetuate the master's rights and the slave's wrongs. Nothing but the resolute declaration of the United States that it shall be a condition precedent that slavery shall be prohibited in their constitutions, and that the United States shall give judicial guarantees to the negroes, freedom in fact, and that the United States shall be kept under the control of men of such political views and purposes that the law will be executed as a constitutional law and imposed on reluctant people—nothing else can accomplish the death of slavery.

Supposing that to be done, Mr. Speaker, what then? This bill relates to the other grave social problem of the destiny of the negro race when their bond is broken. Now many of them are thrown on our hands. We have to take care of them. To that extent the bill is right, and I shall vote for it for that purpose. How well it will answer, how far it must be modified after the national cause shall triumph, remains to be seen. Let the things of the future be cared for by the future. But it is necessary now to determine our policy respecting the negroes when freed; to form some definite ideas as to what shall be the future of the negro race; in other words, what disposition we will make of them when we have broken the masters' yoke, when Maryland shall have broken it hereafter, when Missouri shall have finally broken it, when West Virginia shall have finally broken it, and when slavery in all the rebel States shall have been destroyed and broken up in fact.

There are on that subject two, and only two, theories. One party says, "Colonize and pay for them." Another party says, "Leave them where they are." In favor of colonization, and compensation to all loyal persons in the rebel States, we have the declaration of the President of the United States, which naturally carries with it great weight. He has formally proposed it for the consideration of the people as his preferred policy. It is for that reason that it is the more important to look at it directly in the face, and to deal with it subject to the conditions which it involves, if it be adopted as the policy of the nation. It has been discussed and commented on by a distinguished gentleman, a member of his Cabinet, supposed, on that and other subjects, more accurately to represent his opinion than any other person. These comments throw a flood of light on the views which prevail in high quarters on the practical execution of the scheme of colonization and the industrial and social reasons which prompt or justify it. These comments have been published broadcast over the country as comments upon the emancipation policy of the President of the United States. Those comments have never been disavowed. They are entitled to our grave and respectful consideration, both from the high position and character of the gentleman from whom they emanate, and his peculiar relations to the President, and the concurrence of view between him and the President asserted and not disavowed. Those comments are put frequently in the form of an attack upon the radical abolitionists; but, while that is the form, the substance is a vindication of the colonization policy of the President, a demonstration of its necessity to the success of the emancipation policy proclaimed by the President.

What are the grounds? First of all it is said that the radical abolitionists wish to change the Constitution of the United States and all of our laws, and to elevate to an equality this race; and in the next place that unequal races cannot live together on terms of equality and peace, and, therefore, that it is necessary to prevent the massacre of the negro that he should be expatriated. Mr. Speaker, what is the foundation of this view? The negro must be colonized if he be free, or a war of races will exterminate him! What justifies this alternative? Will gentlemen tell me where in the history of the world they find the fact upon which they base that astounding generalization? Civilized people have overborne savages, men of one religion have borne down men of a different religion, ambition has overturned one nation by another; but where in the history of the world is there any case of a nation going to work to exterminate a large portion of its people of another race living in the midst of it, of the same religion, civilized in the same manner, conforming to its laws, subject to its will, willing to work for its wages, not ambitious, and not disturbing the public peace, because they are of a different race? Where is the instance in the history of the world of the subjugation and massacre of a different race under these circumstances? In earlier times great masses of people poured from Central Asia over Europe. They were of a different race from the inhabitants of the Roman empire, in any ethnological sense in which the word can be used. I do not know that they enslaved the whole mass of the people of the Roman empire. My impression is that the conquered civilized the conqueror, and that it did not end in the social war such as is contemplated here; but the descendants of both form now the people of Europe.

The distinguished commentator on the colonization views of the President refers to the Moors of Spain. In an ethnological sense they were far from kin in point of race to the Spaniards. But race was not the ground of war; it was religion; and every decree which undertook to expel them gave them the alternative of baptism or exile. The Spaniards wanted them to stay, and Ferdinand and Isabella would have been glad if they had remained to decorate the southern portion of their empire, the perpetual glory of their missionary zeal.

Then we are referred to San Domingo. That is exactly what gentlemen on the other side of the House are preparing for us in the future. There was no revolt of slaves against their masters, there was no war of one race against another, unwilling to live in peace and industry; but the French Assembly, having freed the slaves of San Domingo, undertook to reduce them to slavery again. They revolted against the authority which attempted to reduce them to slavery, and under Toussaint L'Ouverture—whose military genius Thiers thinks it worth while to commend—and his associates defeated both France and England in their attempt to reduce and hold the island.

These are the examples of wars of race! But why do they pass over the peaceful example of emancipation of Jamaica and the French colonies, where the circumstances would be more analogous? Why do they not invoke the great examples of Mexico and South America?

The Indian of those countries is as far removed from the Spaniard as our Indians from us, and as we are from the negro. The Spaniard gained and wielded the empire over them, but neither is exterminated; the two races are not blended, neither is reduced to slavery, and in Mexico both unite against the common foe. Race has nothing to do with the question. The Indian and Spaniard live together because both are civilized and both are Christian and both are interested in the same laws and government and industry.

I wait patiently till the gentlemen adduce their historic facts upon which to rest their theory of the necessary contest of races to reply to them. I have dealt only with those they have furnished.

It is true the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] referred to the harsh, hard-hearted treatment of Massachusetts toward the Indians. He might have found an example nearer at home. The only example upon the American continent of a war on the peace and quiet of the negro is the riots in New York city last summer, when Seymour's friends, the Paddies, undertook to show their Democratic mercy to the wretched negro.

The war of Massachusetts on the Indians was that of a civilized and Christian people against a people of different religion, and which refused every form of American civilization. The same differences of religious and social organization prevented the toleration of a Mormon people in any of our States hitherto. But the attack of the Irish on the negroes in New York is the only example of the collision of races to sustain the theory.

I agree that it is possible that such a class of population as that might be tempted to oppress the negro, but no class of American population would condescend to do it.

Then what are you going to do with them? Go to kindred races and congenial climes? Where? To Texas? That is abandoned. To Central America for the purpose of making a connection between the great oceans? That was respectfully declined. To South America? I have not heard that the President has been successful there in finding a kindred race willing to receive them. Back to Africa? Won't you ask as a matter of kindness to transplant the Irish back to Ireland? Who inhabit Mexico? Who inhabit Central America? Who inhabit South America? I take it the Indian of the Peninsula is further removed from the African than we are who come more directly from the common stock of central Asia. Then to transplant them there would be putting a greater diversity of races together to come into collision. Or will they love each other, though alien in race, because of their color? Is skin deep the depth of their philosophy?

In the imagination of these gentlemen they assign Cuba as the central empire of the negro; and strange as it appears, while one party of colonizationists are talking of transplanting the negro to the coast of Africa, the commentator on the President's policy grows enthusiastic over the vision of the negroes settled in the American tropics inviting their brethren from Africa to this western world—a new Canaan for that outcast and rescued race! What becomes of the Spaniard and his rights? What becomes of the rights of the white population? What becomes of the aristocratic Spaniard who has been crushing generation after generation in Cuba to enhance his wealth? How is he to receive the African in spite of the diversity of race? Is the Spaniard nearer in blood because Spain is nearer geographically to Africa? The theory of the incompatibility of different races has no foundation in history. The moment you come to state it in words, and ask what it means, all the theory, all the philosophy, and all the facts break down, and there is the end of it.

But we are ourselves interested a little in this question of exportation of the negro. Who is going to pay the cost? Who will pay for the transportation? Who will supply the depleted labor of the country? Who is going to pay the increased price of bread to the poor mechanic? Who is going to pay the increased price of cotton? Who is going to fill up the enormous vacuum of labor swept away by this insane and unchristian philanthropy? What is the negro going to do in the mean time? You cannot take them away to-morrow or in a generation. The schemers propose to build canals and fortifications, connect the Mississippi with the lakes—for a generation! Under whose supervision, at whose expense, by what new forms of socialism will you sweep a whole region of country of three or four million people, and concentrate them upon the banks of the Mississippi to eat bread and dig ditches, while the cotton fields are unplanted, and men and women starving? When you undertake to colonize the negro you will meet the master, who says,

"Do not leave me to starvation." The master will offer the negro more to stay than the Government will offer him to go. Two generations cannot fill up his place; and if we can stand his presence two generations perhaps Christian philosophy will enable our descendants to reconcile themselves to the permanence of what has been found tolerable so long.

Why should they consent to go to barbarous countries? Why should they love the people of Ashantee? Would the King of Dahomy in Africa protect them from the cannibals of Africa? They prefer to stay where they are. You cannot offer them as good homes; you cannot offer them as good wages; you cannot give them as good treatment; you cannot give them as good churches, nor as good houses and food and clothing for their children. Why should they consent to go?

Now deal with the problem under the conditions which exist. The folly of our ancestors and the wisdom of the Almighty, in its inscrutable purposes, having allowed them to come here and planted them here, they have a right to remain here, and they will remain here to the latest recorded syllable of time. And whether they become our equals or our superiors, whether they blend or remain a distinct race, your posterity will know, for their eyes will behold them as ours do now. These are things which we cannot control. Laws do not make, laws cannot unmake them. If God has made them our equals, then they will work out the problem which He has sent them to work out; and if God has stamped upon them an ineradicable inferiority, you cannot make one hair white or black or add a cubit to their stature. Let us leave such questions for gentlemen of the school of Wendell Phillips to talk of, but I earnestly pray gentlemen in high positions, in view of the excited and feverish state of the public mind, above all in dealing with this delicate topic of the welfare of millions of whites and blacks, not to add to the inherent difficulties of the problem, prejudices drawn from things not facts which we may never be called upon to deal with, and which can only exasperate the very feeling which we ought to allay, and instigate the very collision we all deprecate.

Sir, I am a Marylander, not a "northern fanatic." My father was a slaveholder. I was myself for years a slaveholder. I have lived nearly all my life in Maryland. I know the temper of her people. I have lived for years in Virginia. I know the temper of her people; I know the relations of the white and black population in those States, and I am going to state some facts to the House nearer home than those cited by the dreamers.

In Maryland we have more free negroes than any other State in the Union. Virginia stands next. She has some fifty thousand among five hundred thousand slaves, and we have eighty-three thousand among eighty-seven thousand slaves. One eighth of our population is free negro. In 1859, just before the rebellion, there was what was called in Maryland a "slaveholders' convention"—a phenomenon under the sun—fit precursor of the slave confederacy! Nobody could be admitted who did not own slaves; and their purpose was, as their resolutions indicated when introduced, to put an end to free negroism in Maryland for the advantage of the white population. There was one man in that assembly who was not crazy, and that man was an old Whig whom I honored and whom my friend from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] knew and honored. His name was James Alfred Pearce, always a statesman, always a gentleman, however wandering into errors in his last days. He was placed upon the committee to which this subject was referred, and being a gentleman and a large slaveholder, and knowing something about political economy and the effect of tampering with the laws of industry, he embodied his sane views in a report to that convention, a part of which I will read for the benefit of the House:

"The existence of so large a number of free blacks in the midst of a slaveholding State is believed to be of itself an evil, and this evil is readily perceived to be greater when it is considered that a portion of them are idle, vicious, and unproductive. This, however, is not the case with the majority of them, and their removal would, as the committee believe, be far greater than all the evils the people of Maryland ever suffered from them. In the city of Baltimore it is estimated that there are more than twenty-five thousand of them, employed chiefly as domestic servants or laborers in various departments of industry. In many of the rural districts of the State, where labor is by no means abundant, they furnish a large supply of agricultural labor, and it is unquestionable that quite a large portion of our soil could not be tilled without their aid."

How much of South Carolina or Mississippi could be tilled without their aid?

"In some districts they supply almost all the labor demanded by the farmers. Their removal from the State would deduct nearly fifty per cent. from the household and agricultural labor furnished by people of this color, and indispensable to the people of the State; would produce great discomfort and inconvenience to the great body of householders; would break up the business and destroy the property of large numbers of land-owners and land-renters—a class whose interests are entitled to as much consideration as those of any other portion of our citizens; would be harsh and oppressive to those people themselves; would violate public sentiment, which is generally not only just, but kindly, and would probably lead to other evils which the committee forbear to mention. We are satisfied that such a measure could not receive the legislative sanction, and would not be tolerated by the great body of the people of Maryland, even with that sanction."

That is from James Alfred Pearce, a slaveholder. Even the secession Legislature of Maryland then about to meet, had it passed that law, James A. Pearce tells them the people of Maryland would not tolerate them in doing it. I beg you, gentlemen, observe the strength of the language:

"The committee, therefore, cannot recommend their expulsion from the State. Still more unwilling should they be to favor any measure which looked to their being deprived of the right to freedom which they have acquired by the indulgence of our laws and the tenderness of their masters, whether wise or unwise, or which they have inherited as a birthright."

The policy of the report prevailed in this convention of slaveholders, and the iniquitous purpose was not by them pressed on the Legislature.

Then, sir, in Maryland a free negro has some rights. Some of the people in that convention were in the Legislature, and a Mr. Jacobs was one of them. He introduced a law to hire the free negroes out to the highest bidders; and if they should be disobedient after being hired out, then they were to be sold as slaves for life. The bill could not be passed. It was objected to by county after county. It was only allowed to become a law with reference to four or five counties—St. Mary's, Charles, Somerset, Worcester, Baltimore county, and perhaps one or two others; and it was not allowed to be operative till approved by the people of the counties respectively. The friends of the infamous scheme went before the people at the presidential election in those counties; for the Legislature would not allow the law even to apply to those counties unless a majority of the people willed it. In Howard, one of the slaveholding counties, they got just 55 votes for it, and against it 1,397. In Baltimore county they got 681 votes for, and 5,364 against, it. In Kent county they got 74 votes for, and 1,502 votes against, it. It passed in no county except in one, and there by an accident. That is the judgment of the people of Maryland on the relations of the laboring free colored people living among them, essential to their industry, a part of their social system, filling well their place in life, without which their interests cannot be protected, and which we neither will expel ourselves, nor encourage to go, nor allow other people to expel.

If gentlemen want to know still further how Maryland regards the free negro population, I desire to say that the emancipation movement of Maryland is indebted very much to the commencement of negro enlistments in Maryland, for the same economic reason. Colonel Birney was sent there with general orders to enlist negroes. He was not instructed to take slaves. He commenced the enlistment of free negroes. Gentlemen found at once that that was a discrimination between the loyal people who do not own slaves and the disloyal people who do own slaves; and my friend Judge Bond wrote to the Secretary of War remonstrating against the inequality of taking from the Union men their labor and leaving with the secessionist his labor. He pointed out the law of 1862, authorizing the enlisting of one as well as of the other. The Secretary of War agreed with him. Birney acted under the implied if not the express authority of the Secretary of War, and commenced to levy from the slave population, in order that the Union men might have the free colored population to hire. It was that more than anything else that brought directly before the people of Maryland at the last election the burdens they were suffering from the existence of slavery; and that aided more than did the bayonets to which the gentleman from New York refers, more than all proclamations, more than any other argument urged, in bringing on our side the people of the slaveholding counties of Maryland, who had voted at the beck of the slaveholders for generations. They said, "If we are to have a draft, and if our rich neighbor's plantation is to be cultivated while we are dragged off to fill the quota of the State, we think that an injustice. We are for slave enlistments and for the party and the men who advocate it, and if it breaks up slavery we get the benefit, and we are in favor of emancipation and in favor of relieving the white people from the disproportionate burdens of the draft." It was that, sir, and no proclamation; it was that view, carried home by my honorable friend who represents the first congressional district, [Mr. CRESWELL,] urged upon every stump, in every fence-corner, that dragged out men in homespun to cast their first independent vote, and my honorable friend from the first district is the representative of that independent vote. When gentlemen say that that result is attributable to military orders, I say that those military orders had nothing to do with it. The President's order required nobody to take an oath of allegiance, exacted no test oath. The judges of election required it: the military were ordered to support them.

Such was the telling power of the enlistment of slaves that my colleague got in the county of Worcester, one of the great slaveholding counties, several hundred more votes than his predecessor, Mr. Crisfield, a most able gentleman, got when he was candidate of the united Union party.

If we are to be treated, Mr. Speaker, to speculations on equality, and prejudices of race, and matters of that kind, to bewilder and mislead the public judgment upon this grave and important topic, allow me to beseech gentlemen to recollect that we people in America are not the only ones who have prejudices, and that negroes are not the only proscribed race in the world; that other nations have been as unjust and as inclined to oppress, and that we, in some regions of the world, would fare no better than negroes do here. How long has it been since "dog of a Christian" was the most polite word to us in the Moslem's mouth? How long has it been since a Brahmin would condescend to sit at table with the most aristocratic Englishman? How long has it been since the nobles of Europe refused to mingle their blood with the blood of the villain, or the peasant of continental Europe? Have we forgot the first example—that the Hebrew was an abomination to the Egyptian-African?

These are arguments to prejudice, and not to the merits. They are intended to mislead, not to enlighten. I beg gentlemen on the other side, whatever their views or purposes may be, let us combine, whatever the result, that the least damage may be done to the public service. Let us decide the question, not upon questions of prejudice, not on questions of hostility to race, but on the great politico-economic argument, on its political dynamics, if I may use the expression. Those forces which must determine it will determine it peacefully if we are wise, or in blood if we are unwise. Those, and those alone, in my judgment, are the alternatives.

THE JACOBS OF MISSOURI AND MARYLAND.

SPEECH OF HON. F. P. BLAIR,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 27, 1864.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The affairs of my own and some other border States have been drawn into the debates of this House. I believe that when I addressed the House some time since, and alluded to a certain transaction which had taken place at the other end of this Capitol, I gave the true explanation of the motives for bringing Missouri affairs so often before the public and before Congress. Certain transactions which have occurred there are sought to be made issues in the next presidential election. My excuse for again alluding to these matters is the prominence which has thus been given to them.

38TH CONG...1ST SESS.

The Jacobins of Missouri and Maryland—Mr. Blair.

HO. OF REPS.

My own conduct has been frequently brought under review in considering these affairs. I am content to be silent as to the manner in which I have borne myself during this rebellion, believing that I have discharged my duty to the Government to the best of my ability, and being most willing to leave my record to stand the comparison with that of those who have thought proper to criticize or condemn my course.

Things have occurred in Missouri and the other border States not so easily understood by those who come from happier regions, unvisited by the calamities of war. In Missouri, at the outbreak of the rebellion and for a long time afterwards, the State was a prey to the worst disorders. The country was ravaged and destroyed, and a feeling of bitterness has been engendered which is almost without a parallel. Upon this spirit of exasperation, retaliation, and revenge, the so-called radicals of my State have undertaken to build up a party. Is this a fit foundation for any party to rest upon? Can peace, prosperity, and tranquillity be expected from those who act from such motives? Can any secure or enduring principles of Government be based on such sentiments? It may be and it is impossible for men to free themselves from the passion of revenge and the desire for retaliation on those who may have inflicted injuries on them or their friends and neighbors. It may be utterly impossible to expect that men can free themselves entirely from such influences. But, on the other hand, is it natural, proper, or wise that the President and the great statesmen who are directing the affairs of the Government, and whose duty it is to educe peace and good will out of these scenes of anarchy and disorder, should be actuated by the feelings of bitterness which have grown up among the parties to this strife? Such passions are in some degree excusable in those who have suffered injury; but with what face does a man set himself up as a statesman or party leader who will fan such passions; who will contribute to the public exasperation; who will rekindle these smoldering fires; and who seeks even to drag into them and destroy the Chief Magistrate of the country when he declines to be the instrument of such malignant passions? Yet this is the position of the Jacobin leaders in Missouri and their confederate Jacobins in Maryland. They appeal to the Union men of other States to support them in their efforts to keep up the strife in States in which the rebellion has been put down, instead of fighting to put down the rebellion where it still exists. They appeal to the Union men of other States against the President's policy of amnesty, by which the armies of the rebels are being demoralized and depleted, because they desire to glut their vengeance and their lust of spoils. They seek to make a direct issue with the President to defeat his reelection, in order that they may enjoy the license of another French Revolution under some chief as malignant as themselves.

The State of Missouri cast but seventeen thousand votes for Mr. Lincoln; yet she has contributed sixty thousand men to the volunteer Army of the United States. The State has also a reserve force of sixty or seventy thousand militia, ready at a moment's notice to spring to their arms in defense of the State and the nation; and how well and how often they have performed this duty the House already knows from the speech made by my venerable colleague, [Mr. KING.] These men have flocked to the standard of the country and given their best efforts to its defense because the President called upon men of all parties without regard to political differences to rally to the defense of the Union. Suppose he had erected the standard now unfurled by the Jacobins of Missouri and Maryland, proscribing all who do not hold their present ultra dogmas; how many men would have enrolled themselves in Missouri under such a standard? I doubt whether we could have contributed half the number that supported the election of Mr. Lincoln. Happily for the country the counsels of such people did not prevail at the outbreak of the war. All men who were willing to defend the country against its enemies, without regard to their opinions on the subject of slavery or any other subject, were invited to take arms. They were not asked to lay down their political opinions and accept those of the President or of his party. Now, these radical Jacobins denounce all who do not agree with them, whether they have taken arms in defense of their country or not, as traitors and as unfaithful to the cause of freedom. The Missouri State militia, whose valor and services were so well described by my venerable colleague, [Mr. KING,] and but for whom these gentlemen would have had no districts to represent and no homes to which they could return, have nevertheless been made the subject of the slanders and reviling of my revolution-broaching colleagues.

I do not consider it necessary to add anything to the description of my four radical colleagues which was given the other day by my venerable colleague, [Mr. KING.] The picture will be recognized wherever they are known. I may say, however, that the artist [Governor KING] was a supporter of our great Senator Benton in his attempt to repress the furious pro-slavery sentiment which has at last burst forth in rebellion, when they were one and all, without an exception, the persecutors of Colonel Benton and his friends. My four Jacobin colleagues were at that time pro-slavery to the backbone. Now, as is often the case with renegades, they have gone far beyond those of us who have consistently supported the Government and consistently opposed slavery, and they denounce us as unfaithful to the cause of human freedom.

A MEMBER. One renegade is worse than ten Turks.

MR. BLAIR, of Missouri. I accept the suggestion. It is not only applicable to the Missouri radicals but also to those of Maryland. It behooves them to purge their own pro-slavery records by some appreciable service in the cause of freedom and emancipation before they should be permitted to denounce those who have passed through the fires of persecution (and they the persecutors) on account of their devotion to that cause.

I hope I shall not be regarded as uncharitable, but I cannot avoid looking at the course of these men as dictated more by a desire to cancel and obliterate the memory of their old crimes against the cause, rather than to advance its success in the future. Their ultra doctrines are so much better calculated to bring us defeat instead of victory, that it looks in the light of their past history as if this was their object, and the great body of the true Union men in other States have been sagacious enough to perceive this fact and patriotic enough to act upon it. Hence in the great State of New York at the last election the supporters of the Administration and of the war enlarged the name of Republicans, and held the election under the name of the "Union" party and nominated on their ticket men who had been life-long Democrats. My colleague [Mr. BROW] who has just dropped his pro-slavery pen-feathers, and who absented himself from the country on a foreign mission in the hours of its sorest trial, in a speech which he made to attack me during my absence in the field, denounced and assailed the platform of the Union men of New York as a weak-kneed Union affair, because I had referred to it as a proof of their moderation and good sense in refusing to allow differences of opinion which have become trivial to imperil the restoration of the Union. In the State of Ohio, also, the friends of the Administration have nominated and elected Democrats for Governor of the State for two successive terms, without regard to their former or present opinions on the subject of slavery.

It is left for these Jacobins and revolutionists to erect a loftier standard of loyalty and patriotism; to represent themselves as persecuted martyrs of a cause of which they are only the eleventh hour supporters; a cause which they would have strangled in its birth if they had had the power to strangle it, and to which they have only brought their support when the battle was won and their aid was not needed. They are like camp followers, unknown and unheard of while the battle raged, but are swift to plunder the dead, and merciless to the wounded. Like old Jack Falstaff, they mutilate the dead Percy, slain by another hand, bearing his body off on their backs as a proof of their desperate valor.

My colleague [Mr. BROW] in his speech the other day undertook to draw the line of distinction between himself and myself, between his principles and those which I advocate. He asserted that the radical party of Missouri was in favor of immediate and unconditional emancipation, and that I and the friends with whom I act were in favor of gradual emancipation. I have always been willing to accept gradual emancipation, or any other step in the right direction. I favored immediate emancipation in my own State, relying upon the compensation to the loyal owners of slaves tendered by Congress, and whenever the people of Missouri or any other State desire it, and adopt this plan, I am more than willing to accept immediate emancipation. I cannot regard any one as an honest man who wishes to place the whole burden on the slaveholders, and who is unwilling to bear his share of the expense in accomplishing a general benefaction.

We have had recently an opportunity to test the sincerity of the Jacobins of Missouri on this question, and I intend now to expose the hypocrisy of their professions in favor of immediate emancipation to the very men they have deceived and misled by their clamors and misrepresentations. When the last Legislature which sat in Missouri first assembled the constitution of our State permitted emancipation by the Legislature either by the consent of the owners of slaves or upon fair compensation to be made to them. The Congress of the United States had prior to that time, and upon the recommendation of Mr. Lincoln, passed a resolution pledging the General Government to pay for the slaves in any of the border States which should adopt measures for the abolishment of slavery. The radicals, combined with the other Union men in favor of emancipation, composed a large and overwhelming majority in the Missouri Legislature. My friends offered various bills in favor of emancipation upon compensation. The radicals voted against and defeated every measure of this kind that was proposed. Congress at its last session passed a measure in this House appropriating $10,000,000 to pay for the slaves of Missouri; the bill went to the Senate and the sum was increased to $20,000,000; it came back to this House and was reduced to $15,000,000. I undertake to say that the Senate which had voted $20,000,000, would not have hesitated to give the $15,000,000 agreed to by this House, if the measure offered by my friends in the Missouri Legislature had not been defeated by the Missouri radicals. A leading member of that faction in the Missouri Legislature, Mr. Charles P. Johnson, openly proclaimed his gratification, in a social gathering of the brotherhood, at the failure of the appropriation by Congress to pay for the slaves of Missouri. The sentiment was received with applause by his brother radicals.

The statement I have made would appear almost incredible to those unacquainted with the Jacobins of my State; but the record stands to prove the truth of my statement, and to show that these men have been and are still dishonestly clamoring for what they do not want and will not have; that in fact they wanted slavery to remain as a bone of contention, or else were unwilling that loyal owners should receive payment for their slaves, even when the money was offered by the Federal Government. But my colleague says he is for immediate emancipation without doing injustice to loyal slaveholders. I deny it, and appeal to the records of the Legislature of Missouri to make good my denial. The measure was again and again tendered to them by the Union emancipationists of Missouri, and was as often refused. It was under these circumstances that the convention, a body elected prior to the rebellion, and which was intended by the secession leaders to carry the State out of the Union, but refused to do it, was called together, and upon the recommendation of our late Governor, and in obedience to the wishes of the people, passed an ordinance liberating the slaves of Missouri at the end of seven years, holding them to service for the intermediate period, and subsequently placing the younger slaves in the condition of apprentices until they attained mature years, in lieu of compensation to their owners. That ordinance was denounced by the radicals in my State, who had proven themselves so false to the cause of emancipation, as a measure for the continuation and perpetuation of slavery. I accepted it as a step in the right direction, believing at the time and knowing now that the people of the State were fast becoming reconciled to this measure, and that every slave in the State would be emancipated before the time fixed in that ordinance.

But the revolutionary faction had what they desired. They had a bone of contention, and having refused to vote for immediate emancipation when their votes would have secured it, they clamored against the gradual emancipation given them by the convention, and are clamoring still for another convention to give them immediate emancipation which they refused to take when it was in their power, with the money to pay the loyal slaveholders offered them by the Government of the United States. This is a brief and truthful sketch of the chicanery practiced by malcontent leaders who would turn hypocritical cant for freedom to account to aid their ambition.

Another point of difference alluded to by my colleague, [Mr. Blow], and which is urged more elaborately in the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis], who makes common cause with him, is found in the fact that the Union emancipationists of Missouri adhere to the policy of the President in favor of the colonization of the free negroes. These gentlemen are opposed to this policy. Here is the programme which the representatives of the Jacobins of Maryland and Missouri would substitute for the policy proposed by the two Presidents, Jefferson and Lincoln, for the establishment of the negroes in a country of their own, in which they could be governed by their own laws, and be free from the crushing weight of prejudice which always would depress them in the midst of another race superior in numbers and wielding the powers of Government. The Representative from Missouri says:

"We have no such theories, have indulged no such unkindness to the unfortunate blacks. We are content to let them remain where God in His providence placed them, and with a more elevated sense of justice to ameliorate their condition at once, and elevate them as speedily as possible on the soil that has been enriched by the sweat of their brows through years of unrequited toil and crushed and bleeding hearts."

The member from Maryland is even more pointed. He exclaims:

"The folly of our ancestors and the wisdom of the Almighty, in its inscrutable purposes, having allowed them to come here and planted them here, they have a right to remain here, and they will remain here to the latest recorded syllable of time. And whether they become our equals or our superiors, whether they blend or remain a distinct race, your posterity will know, for their eyes will behold them as ours do now. These are things which we cannot control. Laws do not make, laws cannot unmake them. If God has made them our equals, then they will work out the problem which He has sent them to work out; and if God has stamped upon them an ineradicable inferiority, you cannot make one fair white or black or add a cubit to their stature."

I regret very much that neither of these gentlemen have found it convenient to be present in the House to-day. I should like very much to ask them to be a little more explicit. I wish to know exactly what all this flourish about "the elevation" of the negro means. Does it mean that they are to be endowed with the rights of suffrage and of citizenship and of official position? Are they to have a full share in the Government established by our ancestors, and a fair start in this race for superiority? It cannot be that these gentlemen intend to thwart the "providence of God" by placing legal impediments or obstacles in the way of the negro to impede his progress in this contest for superiority with our own race in its inherited dominion; but unfortunately for me and for the people to whom this country belongs, neither of these gentlemen are here to respond to the inquiries which I desire to make; and I must look for light on this interesting point in the utterances heretofore made by one of those gentlemen. I find in a speech delivered by the distinguished gentleman from Maryland at the Cooper Institute, in New York, on the 9th day of October last, the following clear and pointed declarations, which throw a flood of light on the question under consideration:

"If we should confer freedom and leave the negro a helpless and disarmed, disfranchised individual, you have left him the prey of those that wield political power over him. It will never be that there shall be consolidated liberty at the South until the President shall not merely have proclaimed freedom, but taught the negro the use of arms and organized him for freedom."

"There can be no liberty in the world without adequate guarantee. The only guarantee to be given to the negroes is, that at the end of the war large masses of them shall be in arms, whom it will be more difficult to reduce to slavery than to let them remain free. [That's so.] Great will be our infamy if we should attempt to expel the negro from our soil."

Wendell Phillips has seized upon this happy thought, and, in a recent speech delivered in the same house in the same city during the present month, thus gives it utterance:

"Such deeds are God's means of making you willing that the negro should occupy this place in the nation's history, with the powers of the white man, lifted to the elective franchise, which protects him and insures us. Break up the land into farms; put two hundred thousand negroes, with a rifle in each right hand and an officer of their own choosing at their head, put three hundred thousand white and black farmers by their side, and the South will ripen itself into a democracy. That is natural law out there. Then I would have civil law here mature the same thing."

This, then, is the Winter Davis-Wendell Phillips programme, and shows that they do not propose to give the white man the start of the negro in the great contest for superiority. Mr. Phillips says the negro is to be "lifted to the elective franchise." The gentleman from Maryland is not content with leaving the negro a "disfranchised individual." Both of them agree that they shall be armed amid the unarmed white population of the South; and then, in the language of the gentleman from Maryland, "whether they become our equals or our superiors, whether they blend or become a distinct race, your posterity will know."

This settles very satisfactorily the meaning of that part of the gentleman's programme in which he goes so earnestly for the elevation of the negro. But I do not perceive how it is to be reconciled with another theory broached by him in his late speech. He tells us in this elaborate and well-considered effort that the idea of the hostility of races is one that is unknown to history, and he calls upon those who have advanced that theory to point to a single instance where such a thing as hostility of race has ever manifested itself. Then why arm the negro? Why at the end of the war must we have "masses of them in arms, whom it will be more difficult to reduce to slavery than to let them remain free?" Is it not perfectly apparent that the gentleman feels and recognizes the hostility of these races when he demands that they shall be armed to defend their freedom from another race which will seek to reduce them to slavery? Indeed, why has this race been so long in servitude in our land except that they are negroes and of another race than ours? Is not this the defense and justification that has always been urged for their enslavement? Would our fathers ever have brought them here or their children retained them in bondage but that the fact of their being of another race gave them a pretext? I will not go outside of the speech the gentleman made on this floor the other day to show that he is himself animated by the very sentiment, hostility of race, which he so stoutly and so earnestly denies the existence of. In the very expression of his disbelief in the theory of the hostility of races, he cannot restrain himself from the exhibition of his hatred for Irishmen. He says:

"But the attack of the Irish on the negroes in New York is the only example of the collision of races to sustain the theory."

"I agree that it is possible that such a class of population as that might be tempted to oppress the negro, but no class of American population would condescend to do it."

Have not an "American population" held them in bondage for over two hundred years? Was not this oppression? Does not the gentleman demand that they shall be armed to prevent an "American population" from reducing them again to slavery? The old leaven of Know Nothingism works so strongly in the gentleman that he cannot make an argument without upsetting it by an exhibition of his spleen against a foreign and what he considers an inferior race—the Irish. "Won't you ask," he says, "as a matter of kindness to transplant the Irish back to Ireland?" I certainly should if all Americans bore the hostility to them he manifests.

The political origin of the gentleman from Maryland is identical with that of my colleague, [Mr. Blow], for they are twin brothers of the dark-lantern fraternity; the chief ingredients of which organization was hostility to kindred races of white men of foreign birth. Taken in connection with the protest of his New York speech against leaving the negro a "disfranchised individual," he would lead me to the conclusion that he would prefer to see Irishmen and other foreigners disfranchised rather than the negro. He would take care of the latter by arming and embodying and instructing them to defend their franchise. But the doctrine and practice he brought forth into political life from a Know-Nothing lodge arrayed rancorous partisans of native birth to drive naturalized citizens from the polls. His followers were guilty of deeds of unexampled ferocity to deter Irishmen and Dutchmen from the exercise of their legal franchise, and with arms and bloody instruments to withhold from them the privileges he now demands for the negro. Notwithstanding his heart has so recently relented toward the negro, yet his last speech proves that his hatred and detestation of the Irish still survive, and he is the last man in this House or out of it who should venture to stand up and deny that which is attested by all history, and to the truth of which he becomes an unconscious witness in one of the closing paragraphs of his speech, saying:

"Allow me to beseech gentlemen to recollect that we people in America are not the only ones who have prejudices, and that negroes are not the only proscribed race in the world; that other nations have been as unjust and as inclined to oppress, and that we, in some regions of the world, would fare no better than negroes do here. How long has it been since 'dog of a Christian' was the most polite word to us in the Moslem's mouth? How long has it been since a Brahmin would condescend to sit at table with the most aristocratic Englishman?"

The only observation I shall make upon this is that it seems to me that the gentleman's mind is so truthful and his knowledge of history so accurate that he cannot make an erroneous argument without exploding it and bringing himself to a sound conclusion.

I submit it to the candor and good sense of the country which proposition is the most benevolent and humane toward this oppressed and much-abused African race—that of Jefferson and Lincoln or that of the Jacobin leaders of Maryland and Missouri. Is it not better for the negroes to have provided a country for them in which they can govern themselves by their own laws, in which they will have no superiors, but will be protected by the power of our Government, rather than remain here as an inferior and subject race—a race of outcasts so far as social and political rights are concerned—or even, under the New York programme broached by the gentleman from Maryland and Mr. Phillips, to attempt to put them on an equality with the white people, which both of these gentlemen say would require to be maintained by force of arms to prevent the reduction of the negroes to slavery? Can any American citizen find it in his heart to inaugurate such a contest as that foreshadowed by these gentlemen? He cannot delude himself into the belief that the riot in New York is an isolated instance. That which occurred there has taken place in almost every large city in the country, in Cincinnati, in Philadelphia, and in the city of Baltimore, where the white calkers drove away the negro calkers from the ship-yards. He well knows that it will require "large masses of these negroes to be in arms at the end of the war," not to prevent them from being reduced to slavery, for the Government which gave them liberty will secure it to them, but to clothe them with that franchise which he demands for them.

I prefer Mr. Lincoln's humane, wise, and benevolent policy to secure the peace and happiness of both races; and until that can be accomplished, and while both races are being prepared for this great change, I shall repose in perfect confidence in the promise of the President given in his last message, in which he proposes to remit the control of the freedmen to the restored States, promising to support "any provisions which may be adopted by such State government in relation to the freed people of such State which shall recognize and declare their permanent freedom, provide for their education, and which may yet be consistent as a temporary arrangement with their present condition as a laboring, landless, and homeless class."

I desire at this point to make some observations upon the action of the recent convention held in Baltimore, and from the proceedings of which the gentleman from Maryland gave us an extract. After nominating Mr. Lincoln for reelection to the Presidency, and instructing its delegates to vote for him "first, last, and all the time," the convention passed this singular resolution, which the gentleman read to this House. This resolution was all the comfort the gentleman could extract from the proceedings of that body, and it remains to be seen whether that will prove a substantial comfort or not:

"Resolved, That this convention is in favor of the entire and immediate abolition of slavery in this State and in the States in rebellion, and is opposed to any reorganization of State governments in those States which do not recognize the immediate and final abolishment of slavery as a condition precedent. That this convention express their sympathy with the radical emancipationists in Missouri, and in Arkansas, Tennessee, and Louisiana, and regret that influences in the Cabinet have, in Maryland and those States, depressed the efforts of the radical friends of the Administration and of emancipation, and given prominence to those who are unwilling advocates of emancipation."

Here is a convention nominating Mr. Lincoln and tying its delegation up to vote for him so tight that it is impossible to cheat in that, and then turning around and extending the right hand of fellowship and expressing sympathy for the Missouri radicals, who cannot find epithets vile enough to apply to him. All the radical members from Missouri in this House and the other branch of Congress are deadly hostile to the President, yet they have the sympathy of the Baltimore convention which nominated Mr. Lincoln. The radical members of the Missouri Legislature—the party associates of the members on this floor now collaborators with the gentleman from Maryland—voted against Mr. Lincoln's renomination, and against the resolution approving his administration, yet they all have the sympathy of the Maryland convention which instructed its delegates to vote for Lincoln "first, last, and all the time." The radical members from Missouri to the convention of Jacobins at Louisville all voted to nominate an independent candidate against Lincoln. How delighted they will all feel when they find that they have the "sympathy" of the Maryland convention which has endorsed President Lincoln and made him their candidate! Every radical newspaper in Missouri is unsparing in its denunciation of Lincoln, and most of them are pledged to oppose his election, even if he is nominated by the national convention of the Union. How pleasing the information will be to them that they have the sympathy of the Maryland convention which nominated Lincoln and handcuffed its delegates to prevent their cheating him!

I am afraid the Missouri radicals will not be able to see the point of this joke without some explanation, and as the gentleman from Maryland did not see fit to go into the matter I shall undertake the task myself. The late Baltimore convention nominated Mr. Lincoln because they could not help themselves. They were compelled to it by the overwhelming public opinion of the State. There are certain dark-lantern associations still existing in Maryland by which bogus delegates were sent from three counties, and they were fraudulently allowed to retain seats to the exclusion of the rightful delegates. But even this convention did not dare to outrage the sentiment of the people so far as to vote against Lincoln; but they sought, while thus putting the left arm about his neck, saying, "How art thou, my brother?" to stab him under the fifth rib. They tried, therefore, while nominating Lincoln, to put forward delegates who are expected to act as certain Democratic delegations did to Van Buren in 1844. They went to the convention instructed to vote for him, but betrayed their trust. I have heard, but don't know certainly whether the fact is so or not, that one of these delegates, appointed with instructions to vote for Lincoln "first, last, and all the time," being one of Mr. Chase's office-holders, has already declared his intention not to vote for Lincoln, but for whom he pleases. And since these gentlemen have chosen to go out of their way to make war on the real Union men of my State and express their sympathy for the Jacobins in Missouri, I do not consider it inappropriate to show up their double-dealing. They sought in every way to escape these binding instructions and send their delegates untrammelled. Mr. Sterling, a great friend, I understand, of the distinguished gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis.] stated that he did not want any instructions, because that would prevent Maryland from having any influence in regard to the candidate for Vice President. In other words, it would prevent the delegation from trading off the Presidency to obtain the candidate for Vice President from "my Maryland."

The resolution winds up with regrets that influences in the Cabinet have depressed the efforts of the radical friends of the Administration "and given prominence to those who are the unwilling advocates of emancipation." Who are these unwilling advocates of emancipation? Was he an unwilling advocate of emancipation who first unfurled that banner in Missouri on the Buffalo platform in 1848 in defiance of the pro-slavery sentiment of his State and in opposition to the views of his great friend, Colonel Benton, and who has maintained it ever since? Is he an unwilling advocate of emancipation who presided at the Pittsburg convention which formed the Republican party? Or is that man an "unwilling advocate" who voted against Banks for Speaker; who voted against Sherman for Speaker; who voted against Lincoln and for John Bell, always a trimmer and at last a traitor; and who, not two years ago, denounced the Administration and its anti-slavery policy in speeches delivered in Brooklyn and Baltimore? Let any honest man answer.

As I said in the outset of my remarks, this whole business in Missouri and Maryland, in the form and shape in which it has made its appearance in these Halls, has been concocted for the purpose of defeating the renomination of Mr. Lincoln. Does any sane man suppose that those seventy-odd gentlemen came all the way from Missouri as a grand committee of radicals to ask for the removal of Schofield, and with no higher game in view? Would they have gone to call on Mr. Chase in a body to express to him their thanks for the help and sympathy he gave them, and to toast him as their candidate for the Presidency unless they desired to notify the whole country that they were suffering a great grievance from the President, and that they looked to the Secretary for succor? Does anybody suppose that this grand protest would have been gotten up against Schofield's confirmation after an agreement to let the thing drop, and that my friends from Iowa would have been prevailed upon, by misrepresentations, to append their names to such a statement? Can it be supposed that such pains would have been taken to draw them into this trap merely for the purpose of procuring the removal of Schofield?

Mr. GRINNELL. I wish to say to the gentleman from Missouri, as one of the Iowa delegation which signed that representation in behalf of our State, that the voters of my district, many of them, reside on the borders of Missouri, and are competent to judge of the condition of affairs over the border, and that I signed that paper in perfect good faith.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. GRINNELL. We believed that one county in my district was in great danger, as there had been frequent raids into the southern portion of Iowa. I did not sign that paper with any intention of taking part against President Lincoln or Postmaster General Blair, nor for the purpose of affecting the political relations of the State of Missouri. I spoke of what I knew, and with good intentions.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman yield to me one moment?

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. Let me first say a word in reply to the gentleman's colleague. I did not intend to say anything, nor do I mean to be understood as saying anything to indicate that that gentleman or any part of the Iowa delegation were privy to the design for which the protest was gotten up. I say they were intrapped into

it. That is my opinion about it, and whatever the gentleman may think about the condition of affairs in Missouri, I think he is very much mistaken about it, and the facts since have shown that he was mistaken. I did not intend to say that he was privy to the designs of the men engaged in this business, which designs are shown by the utter want of foundation in fact for the statements they made, (I mean the protest, not the statement of the Iowa delegation,) and by their criticism of military affairs which they were wholly incompetent to criticise, by the manner in which that protest was produced in the Senate—a memorial against the confirmation of a general officer read in open session, and not in executive session where such confirmations are only considered—everything connected with it shows that the design was to attack the President who had denied the validity of the charges against Schofield. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know but the gentleman from Missouri has a perfect right to speak for the President of the United States in all matters; still I do not know that he has, and I may say that I do not believe that he has that right. When he speaks of the Iowa delegation being drawn into a trap in signing the paper to which he has referred, I wish to tell him as one member of the Iowa delegation that I fell into no trap. I know what that paper was; I know what it contained, and I know that it contained the truth. That is all I have to say in reply to the gentleman.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I do not dispute that the statement of the gentleman is in accordance with his view of the matter; but I maintain the statement I have made.

Mr. GRINNELL. I wish to say one word more—

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I cannot yield if these interruptions are to be taken from my time.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be taken from the gentleman's time unless unanimous consent be obtained that it shall not be.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. We object if it is to be taken from the time of the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the time occupied by interruptions will not be taken from the hour to which the gentleman is entitled under the rule.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri could not have been cognizant of the facts to which I alluded. I am very glad to bear evidence to the fact that the gentleman was at that time himself leading Iowa soldiers in battle; and I honor him for the position he occupied at the time of these occurrences. But, sir, I say there was a rebel correspondence between northern Missouri and the southern portion of my district for a long time. I say that these border men of Missouri, under the name of Missouri State militia, did come over into my district, and did there threaten loyal men. They did steal horses and rob hen-roosts. I say these northern Missouri men, under the name of Missouri State militia, did conspire with men in southern Iowa to blow up the court-house in one of the southwestern counties. They did come over there and unite themselves with Knights of the Golden Circle for the purpose of resisting the draft and preventing Union men from filling up the quota of Iowa. I know these facts; and while I give the gentleman from Missouri full credit for his valor and full credit for his patriotism, still I must say that he is not acquainted with these facts.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. The mere fact that a few marauders did cross the border and commit depredations is no justification for the harsh measure resorted to against General Schofield. It was well understood that the attention of the commanding officer of that department was then directed to another quarter, and that it was impossible to spare troops to guard the long line between the States of Missouri and Iowa. Iowa is so loyal a State, and so remote from the scene of real hostility, that no officer would be justified in placing troops to guard its border from mere imaginary dangers, or to prevent horse-stealing and hen-roost robbing. Do such facts, conceding them to be true, form any good ground for asking the removal of the general commanding a military department? Such trifles it appears to me bring shame to those who would make them the ground for the removal and degradation of a brave and meritorious officer.

Mr. GRINNELL. One word more, with the permission of the gentleman from Missouri. It was charged by him that the Iowa delegation in signing that Missouri protest had fallen into a trap. I wish to say I signed that paper with my colleagues with my eyes open. There was no trap. I believed, and my constituents believe to-day, that the general then in command in St. Louis was not as true as he ought to be to his position; I believed that he was using his official position for the purpose of degrading those who are called radical men, like myself. There were men connected with the Army who believed this; and it is my belief now. I believe it from the best of testimony. He may have been a brave man, he may have been a true man; but still the facts I have stated are true; and those of my constituents who had suffered by the raids of these Missouri State militia, whom he was upholding, had a right to enter their protest as they did.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, my opinion has not been changed by anything which has been said by the two gentlemen from Iowa. I concede to them entire honesty in their views and purposes, still I believe their interference was asked and obtained by misrepresentations. It was not against General Schofield that the originators of this scheme sought the aid of the Iowa delegation. Their purpose was to level a blow at the President, and induce the Senate of the United States to deal that blow.

Mr. GRINNELL. I wish distinctly to deny that the Iowa delegation had any part or any design to bring an accusation against the President of the United States. That delegation, sir, are not against the President.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I have again and again said that I did not suppose they had any such design. I put it upon those who originated this affair, and who, having obtained by misrepresentations the statement of the Iowa delegation, used it not against Schofield, but against the President, as the whole transaction in the Senate shows upon its very face. Now, sir, who is this General Schofield? I knew him as the officer who mustered the first troops from Missouri at the beginning of the war, in the midst of dangers that the men who are now denouncing him shrank from in dismay. They shrank away in alarm and their arms hung nerveless by their sides when this officer stood forward bravely in the performance of his duty. He was the companion and trusted friend of the heroic Lyon, who fell dead on the bloody field of Wilson's Creek, almost in his arms. He has approved his loyalty and efficiency on the field of battle; he has tested his valor and devotion to the country. His revilers are that class of noisy patriots whose devotion to the Government is attested only by their clamors.

I do not myself approve of his entire administration in Missouri, but I honor his patriotism and ability, and appreciate the difficulty of his position, made more so by those who have done more complaining than fighting. General Schofield assented to the order by which four counties in my State were depopulated, and the wives and children of twelve hundred Union men then in the United States Army were driven from their homes. He assented to this order given by General Ewing. I did not approve of it. It was a concession to the radicals, who threatened to overthrow the State government, but did not conciliate them.

My colleague [Mr. Brown] asserted in round terms that at a meeting or caucus of my friends in St. Louis, in August, 1862, I had advocated the removal of General Schofield and the substitution of another in the command of the department of Missouri, and that I had deputed him to bear my complaints to the President. I denied the statement; and when, in August, 1862, he came to this city and used my name with the President and General Halleck to effect that purpose I sent a telegram to General Halleck in the following words:

St. Louis, Missouri, August 12, 1862.

Major General H. W. HALLECK:

Nobody is authorized to ask Schofield's removal in my name. I have written to Hon. Mr. Blair asking that his powers may be more ample, and that he be disembarrassed from the authority of Governor Gamble.

D. C. WAGER, A. A. G.

General Halleck informs me that he told my colleague that he had received this dispatch, and thinks it probable that he showed it to him, and he therefore knew that I did not assent to his coming here to represent me. He knew this when he made the statement on this floor a few days since.

I will state that a meeting of our friends did take place about the time indicated. Many complaints were made in that meeting by my friends against General Schofield. He was not, however, in command of the department; no department commander had then been appointed to succeed General Halleck, who had been ordered here to the chief command a short time previous. General Schofield was in command of the district; Curtis commanded another district, and Schofield had expressed his desire to do what our friends complained of his not doing, but alleged that he had no authority, as he was only a district commander and did not have the authority necessary. I explained this to those present at that meeting. All that I said was in explanation of the matters alleged against General Schofield, based upon his own statements. The only resolution which I proposed was one asking that a department commander might be appointed, and the dispatch I have quoted and the letter referred to in it show very plainly that I would have been well satisfied with the appointment of General Schofield. The statement of my colleague is utterly devoid of truth.

Schofield some time afterwards gave me to understand that the motive of my colleague's volunteering to come to Washington and misrepresent me was that he was the owner of a lead mine in southwest Missouri which he was desirous should be well guarded by United States troops; that he (Schofield) did not consider it as important as some other interests, and that he could not spare the troops to advance my colleague's private speculations, and he attributed his hostility to this cause.

The great point of attack made by my colleague in his speech was the resolution I offered in this House, asking a committee to investigate the operations of the Treasury Department in the regulation of the commercial intercourse with the States in insurrection. He passed a high eulogium upon the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, and denounced me for presuming to introduce such a resolution. He denied that there was any ground for the investigation, and yet he was cautious to vote against my resolution, and so did all the friends of that distinguished gentleman. I say that there is ground for it. I say here in my place and upon my responsibility as a Representative that a more profligate administration of the Treasury Department never existed under any Government; that the whole Mississippi valley is rank and fetid with the fraud and corruptions practiced there by his agents; that "permits" to buy cotton are just as much a marketable commodity as the cotton itself; that these permits to buy cotton are brought to St. Louis and other western cities by politicians and favorites from distant parts of the country, and sold on "change to the highest bidder, whether he be a secessionist or not, and that, too, at a time when the best Union men in these cities are refused permits. That is equally true of the "trade stores," as they are called—monopolies of trade in certain districts or cities in the South. These "trade stores" are given to political partisans and favorites, who share the profits with other men who furnish the capital, Mr. Chase furnishing capital to his friends and partisans in the shape of a permit or privilege to monopolize the trade of a certain city or district; and furthermore, it can be established that the practice of taking bribes on the part of these Treasury agents for permits to trade, and for conniving at violations of law, is so common that it has almost ceased to attract attention or excite comment. It is the most corrupting and demoralizing system that ever was invented, and has become a public scandal. No wonder that General Grant, in his remonstrance against this system, said, "No honest man could do business under such a system." I am satisfied that, upon a rigid and honest scrutiny, the statements I have made can be established by competent proof. Here is a statement which I find in the Baltimore American, a staunch Union paper, and which appears to be vouched by the name of a party whom I take to be responsible and respectable, for otherwise that journal would hardly have inserted his statement. It is as follows:

BALTIMORE, February 2, 1864.

Messrs. Editors of the Baltimore American:

I desire to make known through your paper, to the community generally, something which I am sure will astonish every Union man in our city who has not previously heard of it, and they, I think, are few. It is this, Messrs. Editors, that on Saturday, 30th ultimo, the schooner Ann Hamilton, Captain Sterling, with Samuel G. Miles on board, as the agent of another party, cleared from this port with a cargo of fifty sacks of salt and a general assortment of merchandise, valued at perhaps $10,000, with permission from Mr. Risley, the agent of the Treasury Department, and sanctioned by General Butler, to take the same within the rebel lines, that is to say, to the counties of Northumberland and Lancaster, State of Virginia.

Had Jeff. Davis himself requested the Government authorities to send him the amount of goods taken from here by Mr. Miles, and the authorities had consented to grant the same, I am sure I would not have been more astonished. It is well known, Messrs. Editors, that the Government has no troops in either of those two counties, has no custom officers to examine what may be proposed to be landed, and that that section is as much under rebel jurisdiction as Charleston, South Carolina. As to the truth of this statement I can point out to you dozens of men in the State of Maryland who have been compelled to flee their homes and families in those two counties, and who dare not return to the same. No Union man can go to either of them, for the simple reason that he would be immediately arrested and sent on his way to Richmond.

But while it is a matter of astonishment that a cargo of goods should be allowed by those in authority to go there, (a portion of country entirely under rebel rule,) it is equally so that Mr. Miles, a man known to almost every Union man in Baltimore to be one of the bitterest rebels we have among us, who has from the commencement done and said all that he could against the Government; a man who could not engage in the worship of God in the New Assembly Rooms—could not think of such a thing, because General Schenck had ordered the stars and stripes to be suspended in the room; a man who indorsed and commended the action of the mob on the 19th of April, 1861, in murdering Massachusetts soldiers in our streets, and one perhaps who has rendered more aid and comfort to the rebels, or as much, at least, as any man in our city, by sending goods to the very counties named ever since the rebellion commenced, setting at defiance the blockade; that such a man, a known enemy of the Government, should be allowed to take within the rebel lines a large number of boxes of merchandise said to contain certain articles, as per manifest, and the vessel, too, commanded by Captain Sterling, who I am informed has long ago made the acquaintance of Fort McHenry on account of his blockade-running proclivities—if this is not astonishing, then, Messrs. Editors, what would be?

But, sirs, there is something also to be looked at in this affair. Who are the parties who have thus imposed on General Butler? for no one believes, who knows the General, that he would ever have consented to this project had he known the character of Mr. Miles. Some parties professing to be Union men must have imposed on Mr. Risley, and General Butler also; and I think, sirs, the community ought to know who they are. I, for one, cannot believe that General Butler would ever have consented to allow such a privilege to one so well known in this community as one of the greatest friends of those in arms seeking to destroy the very Government that he (General B.) has been so nobly and skillfully upholding.

I could give you many proofs of the truth of what I say in regard to Mr. Miles; and as to the fact of the vessel clearing from this port, that can be obtained by calling upon the proper officers at our custom-house. I will only add, Messrs. Editors, that if such a privilege is granted to Mr. Miles, and they are fully aware of his sentiments, &c., I think the authorities ought to carry the matter a little further and return to him the amount of money they have received from the sales of his goods they have captured while trying to run the blockade—more especially those captured on board the schooner Hampton, Captain Roe, (in one of the very counties to which he now goes,) about a year since—as that was quite a snug little sum.

By publishing this letter in your valuable journal, thereby calling the attention of the two gentlemen who I am sure have been grossly deceived in the matter, you will much oblige your friend,

STEPTOE B. TAYLOR.

Is this a matter worth inquiring into? Such an act in aid of the rebels in arms would send any one, except a Treasury agent, to Fort La Fayette.

Sir, if the friends of the Secretary of the Treasury had not felt that these facts could be proven, they would not have voted against investigation, but would on the contrary have invited it. The friends of the Secretary of the Navy when assailed by the friends of Mr. Chase have invited scrutiny and have not asked that those gentlemen who desired to investigate his proceedings or the affairs of his Department should be kept off the committee of investigation. The cotton-spinner, (Assistant Secretary Fox,) to whom the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] alludes so contemptuously, (forgetting for the moment that he is now attempting to patronize that most meritorious class of New England men,) has brought with him from his northern home the same sturdy honesty that distinguishes the men with whom he labored, as well as the honor of the Navy, which has never been tarnished and in which he gained his first distinction. He and the Secretary of the Navy will not permit their friends to shield them by voting against resolutions of inquiry or investigation, and are ready to commit the inquiry to those who make the accusations.

My colleague [Mr. Blow] was very apprehensive lest I should be put on the committee which I had moved, and gives that as a reason for voting against the scrutiny. I do not think the action of the Speaker in that regard need strike him with any great tremor. There has been no disposition on the part of the Speaker to place me upon committees when he could avoid it. I came here somewhat late, having "lingered in the field," as my colleague says reprovingly, until active operations were over, and stood upon no committee. Soon afterwards a committee was created on the conduct of the war, and to examine into fraudulent contracts in the War Department. There was immediately "a double shuffle" of the cards in the face of the House. One of my colleagues [Mr. Loan] resigned his place on the Military Committee, and was placed on the new committee, and I was put into his old shoes. It would seem, therefore, that the Speaker is not anxious to place me where I could pry into these delicate matters. I cannot perceive the propriety of the gentleman's doubts as to the Speaker's entire impartiality. He has already declared in a public card that he is not for Lincoln for the next Presidency, and even goes so far as to say that he is for none of the prominent candidates named for that high place. No man could possibly occupy a more impartial attitude. [Laughter.]

No one can have failed to observe the broad distinction between the conduct of the friends of the Secretary of the Navy and that of the friends of the Secretary of the Treasury upon matters of this kind. The Secretary of the Navy has invited scrutiny into the affairs of his Department, and those who have made accusations and moved resolutions of inquiry have become the conductors of the scrutiny without complaint or resistance on the part of his friends. This is proper and parliamentary; any other course would stifle investigation and be unfair to those who make the accusations. The law of parliamentary proceedings says that "the child is not to be put to a nurse that cares not for it"—an investigation is not to be committed to those who oppose it. "It is therefore a constant rule," says the Manual, "that no man is to be employed in any matter who has declared himself against it." "And when any member who is against the bill (or inquiry) hears himself named of its committee, he ought to ask to be excused." (Barclay's Digest, p. 84.) If the scrutiny is intrusted to those who are opposed to it, of course nothing will be found; nor is it fair to him who alleges, upon his responsibility as a member, that there is ground for investigation, to deny him the opportunity of establishing it. What I ask in this matter is that the friends of the Secretary of the Treasury will concede what is demanded by parliamentary law, and then I will stand or fall by the result. I am without the power, position, or ability of the distinguished Secretary, but my reputation is as dear to me as his can be to him or his friends. I have made the allegations, and I have offered to put them to the test. His friends have refused it, and in doing so have stabbed their friend. I have taken this course because time and again remonstrances have been made against the nefarious system which inflicts so much injury upon my constituents and the whole West; the Secretary has treated these representations with contempt; and his advocates, when hard pressed, have sought to shift the burden upon the shoulders of the President and General Grant. Not content with using this vast patronage to undermine the man who gave him his position, he seeks to cast the odium of his own corrupt acts upon him whose confidence he has thus betrayed.

What right under the law had he to impose its restrictions within the State of Missouri? The law was enacted to regulate trade and intercourse between loyal States and States in insurrection. Does it allow restrictions within the State of Ohio? Has Missouri ever been declared in insurrection? Missouri has always had a loyal government, recognized by every department of the Federal Government; and although her territory has been invaded by the enemy, yet for a year past no force as formidable as that with which John Morgan invaded Indiana and Ohio has trodden upon her soil, or remained there as long or fared better during their sojourn. Why, then, keep these restrictions in Missouri, and not in Ohio and Indiana? Until within the last month a man living in Missouri, twenty miles from St. Louis, could not get a barrel of salt or flour from that city without paying for a permit. I am told that a judge of our supreme court living in the adjoining county of St. Charles, paid for a permit in St. Louis to take a picture of General Washington to his home as a Christmas present to his children. This thing has been continued to within the last twenty days; and for the last six months no organized force of the enemy has penetrated north of the Arkansas river. It was at last discontinued on the petition of my distinguished radical colleagues, and blazoned as a triumph of their influence. The Secretary could not have been hurried any by my resolution, for he felt himself safe here in the hands of his friends. It was brought to me to sign. I signed, not that petition, but a statement "that in my opinion there had been no excuse for this thing for the last six months;" but for fear of offending the august Secretary my protest and signature were erased. My colleague taunts me with my zeal for my "trading friends." I have none who would "trade" off the rights intrusted to their defense for the smiles of a man in power.

The permit system has finally been abandoned in Missouri, but the agents and officials who formerly spread this network over our desolated State and pinched its ruined inhabitants, still remain. These dependents on the Secretary, these agents and missionaries of his presidential aspirations, are still extant and receive their salaries. Some of them, I suppose, employ themselves in disseminating that "strictly private" circular which came to life the other day, which informs us that the friends of Mr. Chase, who have so feelingly denounced all open efforts to bring forward a candidate for the Presidency, have been secretly forming an organization in his favor all over the country, and which charges the Administration of Mr. Lincoln with "corruption." None know better than the friends of Mr. Chase at whose door that corruption lies, as their efforts to stifle investigation here so plainly prove.

It is a matter of surprise that a man having the instincts of a gentleman would remain in the Cabinet after the disclosure of such an intrigue against the one to whom he owes his portfolio.

I presume the President is well content that he should stay; for every hour that he remains sinks him deeper in the contempt of every honorable mind.

Mr. Chairman, I give notice that on Monday next, or as soon thereafter as I am permitted to do so, I will reintroduce the resolution which I have already had the honor to propose to the House, and if not again refused by the friends of the Secretary, I will either establish the facts I have alleged, or I will make the amplest reparation in my power to the distinguished gentleman at the head of the Treasury.

FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

SPEECH OF HON. A. L. KNAPP,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1864.

The House having resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs—

Mr. KNAPP said:

Mr. SPEAKER: After the lengthened discussion already had upon this bill, I feel somewhat reluctant to detain the House from voting upon it, especially as I do not suppose that any argument can be made which will in any respect change the views of those constituting the majority upon this floor; but having, while serving upon the committee by whom this bill was reported, had occasion to examine into the merits of the proposed measure, and to some extent given it consideration, I feel it incumbent upon me to state my objections to the bill.

The measure, in my judgment, proposes such extensive and important changes in the whole social economy of so large a portion of the laboring population of a part of the United States as to call for careful scrutiny at our hands before we commit the Government to an undertaking so vast as I regard this to be.

It is apparent, I presume, to the mind of every gentleman who has examined this bill, as was remarked by my friend from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] who discussed this measure ten or twelve days ago, that perhaps nothing has been presented to the American Congress which surpasses this in the magnitude of the interest involved in it. I think that gentleman stated that the territory over which this bill proposes to operate contained an area not less than that of the original thirteen States which formed the present Government of the United States.

In order that we may comprehend what I consider to be the fair extent and scope of this measure, and the number of persons to be affected by the proposed legislation, let us look at it with reference to the intentions entertained by the dominant party upon this floor in regard to the rebellion and its suppression. I do not misstate their views when I say that in the efforts now being made for suppressing this rebellion they profess to intend nothing less than the entire overthrow of the military power now arrayed against the Government of the United States wherever it is manifested, and to reduce to the authority of the Federal Government every portion of the territory which ever belonged to and formed part of the United States.

This much I feel warranted in stating to be their assumed position and which probably will not be denied by any one.

I take it, also, I am not misrepresenting their position when I state that under the various acts of Congress already passed, and under the proclamations of the President of the United States, which latter, in their judgment, have all the force and effect of law, they intend to emancipate every slave now within the States in insurrection and formally attached to this rebellion. Efforts have already been put forward by the President, in the exercise of what they assert to be the appropriate war power of that officer, by which "the chains of slavery" have been stricken off the limbs of every slave in those States whose fortunes have made them a portion of what is called the confederate States. Thus much they insist to have been already accomplished.

I do not believe that I misrepresent them when I further say they intend by future legislation the entire emancipation of all the slaves which are held in those States which have never been recognized as forming part of the confederate States and heretofore exempted in the proclamations of the President.

If I am correct in this proposition, what then is the field over which this bill is destined to operate? It is to operate over each and every one of those States which have heretofore by their laws legalized and sustained the institution of slavery. Every person who is to be affected by this bill was at one time a slave. It is only thus by stating and examining what their own propositions and intentions are that we can fully or at all comprehend the measure and extent of the subjects proposed in this bill. Certainly, sir, in the language of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KALBFLEISCH,] they are vast enough, vast enough so far as territory is concerned, numerous enough so far as the individuals who are to be the recipients of the benefits of this legislation are concerned, to make us pause and fairly estimate and carefully weigh the reasons adduced by the friends of this measure before entering upon so gigantic a system of governmental espionage and patronage. Never, since the days when the children of Israel toiled in the brick-yards of Egypt under the task-masters of Pharaoh, has there been such a system submitted to any Government making the least claim to constitutional liberty as is contained in the bill now before the House. I know that Governments, under the lead of ambitious statesmen, under the lead of despots and emperors, have overrun vast sections of country, have brought under subjection millions of unwilling subjects, but never before, sir, in all the history of conquests, among all the triumphs of military power, has a Government sought so nearly and so closely to interweave its own action with the every-day social life of the people over whom they have extended their sway.

Then, sir, let us consider what are the special propositions of this bill. I propose in the outset to confine my remarks to the bill itself and to examine it in its details; and while I cannot expect to produce any effect by the few scattering arguments I may adduce, yet I will discharge my duty as one of the Representatives of the people in calling their attention to the magnitude of this system of vassalage that is proposed in the measure now under discussion. The bill proposes, in the first place, the creation of a bureau under the control of one man, styled a Commissioner, to whom, under the direction of the Secretary of War, shall be referred all questions arising under this act concerning persons of African descent and persons who are or shall become free by virtue of any law or order enacted or issued or promulgated in this rebellion, or by virtue of any act of emancipation for the freedom of such persons held to service or labor in such States, or who otherwise shall be entitled to their freedom. In pursuance of that power conferred in the first section of the bill, and to secure efficiency, he is also authorized to make all needful rules and regulations for the general superintendence, direction, and management of the persons thus committed to his care.

I stated at the outset that I conceived this bill legitimately to apply to all the territory comprised in the slave States heretofore in this Union. I suppose that its intent and design is to operate upon every person who, by virtue of any law of those States, has been "held to service or labor," using the words of the Constitution.

Now, sir, this bill also proposes to invest in one person the authority to make all needful rules and regulations for the general superintendence, direction, and management of these persons. Bear in mind that they are free. I am treating them to-day as free, for that is your theory and intent. What else? This Commissioner, under the same direction of the Secretary of War, is to enact and cause to be enforced all needful rules and regulations for "the economical and judicious treatment and disposition of all such persons, freemen as they are, to the end that they and the Government of the United States shall be mutually protected, and their respective rights and interests duly determined and maintained."

In order to systematize the vast field of labor opened by this bill, the appointment of subordinate officers becomes necessary, and is provided for. They are called superintendents and clerks. A superintendent may be appointed in any district, to be laid off by the Commissioner, not comprising less, however, than what was once a State. The Commissioner has power to appoint within that subdivision all necessary resident superintendents and clerks, who shall be paid for their services such compensation as the Commissioner may determine, under the directions of the Secretary of War, to be reasonable.

As a matter of course, a system so vast as this cannot be successfully put in operation by one man in Washington. It is necessary, from the extent of the field and the number of persons over whom the system is to operate, to have a large number of agents stationed within the immediate field of operations, under whose supervision and control come all those varied subjects. What power shall they have? They shall have power "to permit persons of African descent and persons who are or shall have become free as aforesaid, under such rules and regulations as may be from time to time prescribed by said Commissioner and approved by the Secretary of War, to occupy, cultivate, and improve all lands lying within those districts now or heretofore in rebellion, which lands may have been, or may hereafter be, abandoned by their former owners, and all real estate to which the United States shall have acquired title, and which shall not have been previously appropriated by the Government to other uses."

We now see the plan as it has been dimly shadowed forth in the leading features of this bill. In the first place, the general care, management, and disposition of four million people in the southern States is committed to this bureau. These people, as I have stated, are all to be made free. Perhaps I am not justified in saying that they are to be made equals as yet; but it strikes me that I would not be considered as uttering anything very heterodox if I stated that is part and parcel of this attempted legislation. That question, however, does not come up legitimately in what I propose to say now.

These resident superintendents and clerks are to assign to these people the various lands abandoned by their owners, and to which the United States may have acquired title. When my distinguished colleague, the chairman of the committee, was making his elaborate speech here a few weeks ago, he stated, in answer to a question asked by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] that Kentucky was in nowise interested in this bill. In his own words, Kentucky was not "in this ring." I asked him then whether lands that had belonged to traitors in the State of Kentucky were not made subject to the operation of the bill? To that question I obtained no answer. But the gentleman, seeing the point himself, has since attempted to amend the bill by providing that it shall only apply to the States in rebellion.

I have thus stated briefly, Mr. Speaker, the main objects of the bill and its method of operation, with one single exception, to which I now propose to refer. Other powers are conferred to the Commissioner of Freedmen's Affairs. He shall have power "to advise and aid them—that is, these freedmen—when needful, to organize and direct their labor, adjust with them their wages and receive all returns arising therefrom, which shall be duly accounted for to the Commissioner of Freedmen's Affairs," and all balances shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States after defraying the expenses and charges of the bureau. I am very glad that provision is made after defraying the expenses which legitimately arise that the balances are to be paid into the Treasury. I have no doubt but from that source, if this bill goes into effect, we shall have a magnificent sinking fund provided, by which ourselves and our posterity, for whom we are supposed to have some interest, may be relieved from the enormous charges incident to the prosecution of the war. I have no doubt that the thousand millions of debt already incurred, and which perhaps I may not be over sanguine in anticipating will be in future incurred, will be defrayed out of the profits accruing from this vast system of Government patronage and vassalage, and the tax-payers of the land relieved, to that extent at least, of the enormous load which is to be placed upon their shoulders. How it is going to agree with the gentleman's philanthropy I do not exactly see. He will doubtless explain it, because he is a learned and ingenious, as well as philanthropic, man.

He tells you that these people are entitled to the proceeds of their labor; that the great crying sin of this country has been that for years you have been grinding these men down in the dust, while hundreds and thousands of others have been flaunting in aristocratic pride from one length of the land to the other; that they have been living in all the magnificence and splendor that wealth can procure, and all drawn from the unrequited toil of these oppressed millions. The Government is now, however, to have the profits arising from this toil; and it is, I am glad to learn, to go for the purpose of alleviating the immense charges which the loyal people of this country will be under in the prosecution of this war to suppress this "unholy rebellion." I trust that the philanthropy of this undertaking can be made to hitch somehow with the profits of the scheme. I never knew or heard of a case when the profits were on the side of philanthropy that the two could not be got to work very amicably together.

True, it might appear that these people (the gentleman's premises being admitted) would be entitled to all the proceeds of their labor, but such old-fashioned ideas of justice I presume are obsolete; and under the new light now beaming upon the country we may safely take all they can make over their support, and yet maintain our character as philanthropists of the first water.

Mr. Speaker, let us now inquire what are the reasons which induce this action on the part of the Government. Before entering upon so stupendous a system, I may be pardoned for asking why this supervision on the part of the Government over four million people is undertaken at all. I am occupying your ground, and you will not hold me to a strict accountability if I call these persons citizens in embryo. I am now speaking from your stand-point.

What are the reasons? They are given by my eloquent friend from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] in his elaborate speech. He says that the Government has emancipated these negroes; that the President, under the operation of his war power, has stricken from the limbs of four million people the shackles of slavery, and that having done so it becomes our duty to do something for them. He says, suppose it to be wrong, suppose the emancipation proclamation of the President not to be in conformity with the principles of justice, and not warranted by the Constitution, that, nevertheless, it is done, and that it is for us to take care of these poor men. He says that they must be taken care of, with or without law; that they must not be permitted to starve. There is the reason; and you may examine the whole of the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] occupying more than an hour in its delivery, an elaborate and forcible speech, and you can find no reason given in addition to that one.

Planting himself upon the broad principle of philanthropy, humanity, and human rights, he lays down the proposition that because the Government, in the exercise of a doubtful power, has freed these slaves, therefore until they can support themselves it is bound itself to do it. This is the reason. It is the sum and substance of every argument in the speech of the gentleman. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that a great deal can be and has been said in all and every age about philanthropy, about humanity; it is an illimitable subject for declamation, and has been in every clime and every age; and while I am not, I think, wholly insensible to the beauties which this subject affords, I must confess that some other reason will have to be given before I can consistently with my duty to my constituents give a measure like this my support, which rests upon reasons addressed to my feelings alone. The power must first be shown to exist, then the justice of it considered with reference to the claims of the citizen generally upon us.

The gentleman in effect asks that the Government shall become the great patron, the great landlord, the great lord of all of these people; that they are to become the vassals of the Government. It is said that names do not change things. I believe that Shakespeare said something about that, which I endorse. I have read of several somewhat similar relations between individuals and Governments, and there is little difference but in name between them and this scheme. In the Roman republic a similar relation to some extent to that proposed in this bill existed; it was then called that of patron and client. It was the duty of the patron there to look after the interest of his client, and protect him from the exercise of unwarranted power, while in his own intercourse with the client it was not altogether certain that the strictest principles of right would always obtain. Coming down to later ages we find a similar system very generally in vogue throughout Europe, which is known in history as the feudal system. This relation between individuals was then termed that of "lord and vassal," with rights and duties which are familiar to gentlemen, and need not be recapitulated.

The relation established by the bill, similar to those I have referred to, that of dependence on the one part and control by the other, is to be henceforth denominated by the name of one of the nearest and dearest relations known among men, that of parent and child. These people, in the language of the gentleman, are "the children of the Government." I think, notwithstanding the attractive name given by the gentleman to this system, it will not be difficult to perceive what will be the real situation occupied by these freedmen to the Government; that no one will be deceived by the name of the parental relation sought to be attached to it.

In preparing this bill it seems to me that the gentleman has drawn from his thorough and extensive knowledge of the old feudal system I have referred to, which prevailed in England and throughout Europe generally many centuries ago, and upon which we supposed eight hundred years had made some improvement. The merest casual examination will show the similitude between the old, exploded system and the one contained in this bill. In the first case, upon the conquering of a nation and occupying its territory, the lands of the subjugated people were granted to and subdivided among the victorious soldiers, to be held as fiefs upon certain tenures and services to be performed by the vassal. Each petty chieftain then pursued the same course with his share, by dividing it among his own personal retainers.

Such seems to be the principle upon which this bill is based. The services these vassals are to render do not so clearly appear, but the "rules and regulations" can easily remedy this deficiency; and if, as I suppose to be the fact, these people are to be made citizens, it will not be difficult to imagine what these services will be.

I suggest to the gentleman that in the olden time, before the rights and duties of the parties were fully established, a ceremony took place called investiture, which I do not see provided for in the bill, but doubtless the "rules" will arrange that. I hope if this bill is passed and it becomes a law some such gentleman as my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. ELLOR] may be appointed a commissioner, and will see that all these people go through with this ceremony of investiture, a description of which I will read from Blackstone:

"Besides an oath of fealty or profession of faith to the lord, which was the parent of our oath of allegiance, the vassal or tenant, upon investiture, did usually homage to his lord; openly and humbly kneeling, being ungit, uncovered, and holding up his hands, both together, between those of the lord, who sat before him; and there professing that he did become his man, from that day forth, of life and limb and earthly honor," and then he received a kiss from his lord."

I trust some gentleman like my colleague upon this committee who is familiar with the whole operation of this system, whose philanthropic scruples and high Christian sentiments will not in the least prevent him from bestowing upon these people this sweet and touching token of the reception of their allegiance, may be appointed, and that when the lands are allotted, when these "freed children of oppression" shall be assigned the places intended for them, that he then may receive at their hands the pledge of their faithfulness, and in return signify in the manner of the olden time his acceptance of the fealty.

It would be a scene some gentlemen around me say they would like to look upon; doubtless they would, and they well may be pardoned for the desire, for it would be one not often afforded to the enraptured vision in these degenerate and practical days.

There have been great events in the past handed down to us in the sculptured marble and upon the speaking canvas, which touch our hearts and appeal to all the loftier and holier feelings of our fallen nature. We never look upon the representations without emotion, or turn from them without regret.

May I be pardoned, Mr. Speaker, if I attempt to dimly shadow forth the leading features of this lovely scene as it presents itself to my mind's eye, in order that some coming Rubens or Raphael, possibly of African descent, may seize the magic brush and transfer to the living, glowing canvas a faint delineation of a ceremony resurrected from the past, by men whose name and deeds were never born to die.

First, of course, in point of importance, the central figure of the picture, we see the dapper form of the gentleman from Massachusetts, seated in awful majesty, a calm, placid smile breaking brightly over his fine countenance; over his head the luxuriant palm and beautiful magnolia spread their graceful foliage, tempering the fierce light of the "garish sun" and creating a shade which finely assimilates with the more dusky colors of the remaining actors and harmonizes sweetly with the whole. Then comes the long-drawn ranks of eager vassals crowding to the mercy-seat, all swelling the magnificent chorus, until the vaulted arch above gives back the joyful strain—

"The day of jubilee has come, Glory Hallelujahum."

Next in the prominent foreground we perceive "one of the children" whose efforts have been rewarded by attaining to the dread presence, and now, ungit, uncovered, and humbly kneeling, his hands clasped between the fraternal palms of my friend, he acknowledges himself his man of life and limb and earthly honor. With rare appreciation and delicate tact, the artist has chosen the moment when the "homagium" on the part of the vassal has been performed, and, bending low, the representative of the parent bestows the kiss which seals the compact. Close by, and with anxiety depicted in every lineament of their classic countenances, will be noticed many a shy maiden, radiant in her dusky loveliness, and inwardly cursing the sex which thus debars her from enjoying then the ecstatic treat. Perfect bliss seems to be the portion of all, ("except as aforesaid,") and, amid such delights as I have feebly portrayed, the now jubilant disinherited no longer sigh for the times

"When toiling at the line,"

"Boast their golden sand and palmy wine."

But, Mr. Speaker, I can no longer dwell upon an ideal scene, which I trust will be perpetuated by the hand of genius, so that coming millions may gaze with rapture upon the affecting sight, and who, overpowered with emotion, will alternately admire the skill of the artist and the felicitous choice he has made of a subject.

But, seriously, I propose to inquire now into some of the objections to this bill. In the first place, I ask my friend when is this system to end? In what distant period of future time is this system of vassalage upon the one part and of lordship on the other to terminate? Instituted to take care of the negro, I suppose the fair inference will be that it is to terminate when the negro is able to take care of himself. I state the proposition fairly, and I would like to inquire when that will be? It is not given to human intellect to perceive, it is not within the province of human knowledge to decide, when this thing is to cease. We are taught, and I believe the doctrine is sound, that all things earthly will have an end; it is said that the "firmament's length will one day be drawn back like a scroll." We may, then, at least safely conclude that when this grand finale comes this system will not survive the general consummation. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, why should the Government do this at all? It is a pertinent question. Why should the Government undertake this vast job? Whence comes the power to do this?

I design calling the attention of the House to the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts upon this point. I presume that no gentleman here will deny the fact that the Congress of the United States is a body of limited and delegated powers, and unless within some of those delegated powers in the Constitution you find authority or warrant for the exercise of this particular power, you cannot exercise it at all. The gentleman thus states our right to pass this measure:

1. By the Constitution the President is made Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States; that therefore in time of war all the powers which pertain to any such commander are possessed by him; that this rebellion having called into being these powers, among which is that of liberating slaves, and this power having been exercised by the President, there follows with the exercise of the power the duty of protection to those over whom it has been thus exercised, and such protection cannot be given without the action of Congress.

2. Congress has power to declare war and to make rules concerning captures on land; that this people as captives of war become proper subjects of legislation.

3. Congress has power to make rules for the government and regulations of the land and naval forces; that legislation has become necessary and laws have been passed to regulate the conduct of the Army regarding slaves; that these laws will be imperfect unless further legislation is had, and hence the necessity for this measure.

4. The President, as Commander-in-Chief, has a right to issue all proclamations recognized by the laws of war as being within the province of military commanders, addressed to the public enemy; that the faith of the nation is pledged to make good all such proclamations, and therefore, to carry into effect the proclamation made in reference to these people, this legislation is required.

This is a fair statement of the argument of the gentleman as to whence we derive our power to fasten upon the country this stupendous system.

I will examine it in detail in a moment; but before doing so I want to say a word in reference to what fell from the gentleman in commenting upon the report of the minority of the committee, and what was said in that report concerning the want of power to pass this bill.

The argument of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KALBFLEISCH,] whose report I signed, the gentleman says is a very insignificant constitutional argument. I did not think myself that it was a very elaborate one. I do not myself propose to occupy the time of the House to-day by attempting to make such an one. Why? Because I do not conceive it to be within the power of mortal man to make an argument on the Constitution of the United States when the subject of it runs counter to the wishes, intentions, and designs of the party upon the opposite side of the House, which would, in the least, affect their action. Even if an interpretation of that instrument could be delivered to this nation to-day of as high a character and among solemnities equal to those by which the original law was delivered from Mount Sinai to the chosen leaders of the Israelites, I doubt whether such an interpretation would affect the action of men who are determined upon a particular line of policy. It has been reserved for this Congress to hear a member from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWWELL] describe Judge Story as nothing but "a second-rate lawyer." He said this of a gentleman whom, I had supposed, stood at the head of the American bar; a gentleman whose legal opinions are quoted in Westminster Hall with approbation; one whose decisions and ideas on constitutional law will, I presume, live quite as long as those of the gentleman by whom that statement was uttered. I do not know but what Mr. Madison may have been esteemed as a constitutional authority in his day. I certainly, with my limited knowledge of what he wrote and what he was, suppose that he, to some extent, understood the intent, design, and scope of that instrument, in whose formation he took so prominent a part. I heard the other day, in an argument in relation to the confiscation of property, his name, not precisely brought into disrepute, but I certainly heard his views very cavalierly treated—treated with contempt as coming from a man who was not qualified either by intellect or knowledge to judge of the subject. What light, then, can one of the humblest members of this House expect to throw upon this question, when the recorded opinions of the great minds whose lives adorn the page of American history, whose master intellects have illumined the paths they trod, are regarded as of insignificant authority by the intellectual giants upon this floor, whose luminous disquisitions have doubtless often excited the wonder and admiration of a court of country justices of the peace; even when the language used will admit of no doubt, and construction cannot be at fault, then comes in some gentleman, like my philological friend from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH,] and shows that the language used is a clear mistake, and intended to be something else.

I propose, therefore, to examine merely the argument which my friend makes without submitting any myself. In regard to this war power of the President, I admit that the Constitution makes him Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. The powers which thus devolve on him as such Commander-in-Chief are in nowise conferred upon him by the Constitution of the United States. They result to him from the fact of the position which the Constitution confers and from no powers emanating from the Constitution itself. The Constitution, then, makes him Commander-in-Chief. What are the powers he has from that fact? They are those which the laws of war, as sanctioned and provided by nations, confer upon every commander-in-chief of an army in the field. But to say that in the exercise of those powers he may emancipate slaves is to run counter to all history. Under the lead of a distinguished Massachusetts statesman years ago, (Mr. Adams,) this Government made the Government of Great Britain pay for the exercise of just such powers as these by its general in command in the State of Virginia during the last war. But suppose the President, in the exercise of a rightful power as Commander-in-Chief to emancipate slaves, has exercised that power, then does it follow that the nation should take upon itself the charge of supporting the persons thus made free? The gentleman upon this point says: "It then becomes our duty to see that they are protected." Protected from what? It might be to protect them from being again enslaved; but it certainly does not then follow that we are to inaugurate a system which seeks to control and direct their every-day action, to receive the proceeds of their labor, and out of it defray the charge of their support and supervision.

Freedmen's Affairs—Mr. Knapp.

HO. OF REPS.

The chairman of the committee traces this power again to that clause of the Constitution which confers on Congress power to declare war and to make rules and regulations concerning captures on land. Why, sir, that has no relevancy whatever to the question of providing for the support and maintenance of four million human beings. So forced a construction of so plain a thing was never, in my judgment, attempted before. During the Mexican war the army under General Scott captured the city of Mexico. That involved the surrender to the occupying army not only of the city, but the persons of the citizens, but did the Government of the United States become thereby responsible for the maintenance and support of the citizens of Mexico? Does any Government ever become responsible, on the occupation of a country or on the capture of a city, for the support of every person within its boundaries, or the direction of their every-day labor? Nothing is clearer than that no such power results from any such operations having taken place.

Again, the gentleman deduces this power from the clause of the Constitution which says that Congress shall have power to make rules and regulations for the government of the land and naval forces of the United States. Congress has such power, and has enacted rules and regulations called the Articles of War. When that is done, when the rules and articles of war are adopted, that power is exhausted. If, in the judgment of Congress, that power has not been wisely exercised, Congress has authority to re-examine it. It has power to reenact other and different rules for the government of the land and naval forces. But to deduce from that the power to establish this system of vassalage on the one hand and of patronage on the other, is something which could never have entered the brain of any reasonable man. My friend from Massachusetts can produce no book, unless he wrote the book himself, in which such an authority is laid down.

The President as Commander-in-Chief has the power, says the gentleman, to issue all proclamations that he deems necessary. I suppose he has, and I doubt whether such a power was ever exercised more thoroughly than it has been by the present President of the United States. But suppose the President has the power to issue proclamations addressed to the public enemy, what then? Then, says the gentleman, the nation is pledged to carry into effect these proclamations. The President declares that these people are free. Therefore the burden is cast upon us of supervising the labor, caring for, and supporting these people in all time to come. I submit respectfully to the judgment of the House and of my friend from Massachusetts that human ingenuity can no further go than the deducing of such power from such premises or such expressions in the Constitution. That is the sum and substance of the constitutional argument on the question as presented by the chairman of the committee. Seeing himself the weakness of the foundation upon which he has raised such a superstructure, the gentleman enunciates boldly his determination to do this whether the power exists or not. What does he say after concluding his constitutional argument and perceiving, as he must, its utter worthlessness? I quote his words:

"But if all proclamations were wrong and all laws were without constitutional support which have sought to liberate the slaves of enemies, still the rebellion itself has freed them, and they are subjects of our charge. We must protect them or be faithless in our office."

No comments of mine can show more clearly than the above statement does the entire want of power to pass this bill. In another part of his speech, not being able to drive from his mind the conviction that this question of our want of authority to enact such laws will be a serious impediment in the way of his measure, he says:

"Sir, we had no right to decree freedom and not guarantee safe guidance and protection. It does not meet the case to say we had no right to free them, and therefore we will not act."

A few sentences further on he resumes thus:

"Concede it was wrong, what then? Shall the Government support them? They must do so in some way, with law or without law."

He admits the difficulty of the attempt, but insists nevertheless upon our undertaking a task so fraught with difficulties and for which our sole warrant springs from the claim of charity.

If there is any duty on the part of the Government to support these persons who have been rendered destitute by the operation of this war, I ask why not support all the bruised and maimed men, the thousands and tens of thousands of widows, and the still larger number of orphans left without the protection of a father? If any objects which appeal to the charity of the Government are presented, I ask why not present the claims of these persons? Why not support the widows and orphans which this war has made? Why not support the offspring of those brave men who have laid down their lives in defense of what you call free institutions? If this bill is to be put upon the ground of charity, I ask that charity shall begin at home and first be extended to those who have made such sacrifices at the call of the country and its authorities. I hope I am not insensible to the claims which present themselves under this attractive garb, and when they are sought to be made the basis of legislation, turning this Government into a vast eleemosynary institution, I shall claim my right to decide who shall become the recipients of so magnificent a provision, and with every sympathy of my nature in favor of those of my own race. If you take the negro for a soldier and enroll him in the armies of the Republic, then treat him as you do other soldiers; pay him what you agree to, and out of his pay let him provide for the wants of his family. That is all you can do. It is impossible for the Government to make good to every one all the losses which may be sustained by reason of this war. I concede that. You have to act in this matter upon broad, general principles, seeking to do the same equal and exact justice to all. When you have paid the soldier a fair sum for his services, agreed upon between you, and provided for his wants as far as you are able by pensions, you have done all you can do. If you insist upon using the negro as a soldier, do for him if you please the same as you do for any other soldier, but why make such special and extraordinary provision for him and his family, when you even attempt nothing like it for the men of your own race who have periled life and limb in your defense? No one will question the humanity of the Government when we place these negroes upon the same footing with white soldiers for the same service.

Now, let us inquire why the Government should not do this thing. That is as important as why they should. My first objection is that it interferes with the exclusive rights of the States themselves over their own people. In the first place, you employ a host of officers unlimited in number by the terms of the bill. You increase the number of officers coming directly in collision with the authorities of the several States. It creates in all such States a number of Federal officers whose duties and powers affect the person of the inhabitant or citizen, if I may use the term, of the State. By this bill you operate directly upon that citizen, upon his every action. You control his wages and his labor, and in the meanest manner you seek to guide and direct his actions as a special protégé or ward of the Federal Government. If there is any power clearly and exclusively within the province of the several States, it is that to control and direct the social relations of their inhabitants. If the people of any State should be so unfortunate as to suffer from pestilence, famine, or the many calamities which have been visited upon the human race in all ages and climes, will it be pretended that the Federal Congress can take any such afflicted people under their charge and provide for their support? It is undoubtedly within the power of their State Legislature to make any provision for their relief which their ability will admit. They exercise original powers of sovereignty—we only those delegated to us.

Why depart from the recommendations of the President upon this subject? He has given this matter his attention; and in his message to us at the opening of this session thus alludes to this class of people and their necessities:

"The proposed acquiescence of the national Executive in any reasonable temporary State arrangement for the freed people is made with the view of possibly modifying the confusion and destitution which must, at best, attend all classes by a total revolution of labor throughout whole States."

And again, in reference to these same persons and their condition, in his proclamation attached to his message, he says:

"And I do further proclaim, declare, and make known that any provision which may be adopted by any such State government in relation to the freed people of such State, which shall recognize and declare their permanent freedom, provide for their education, and which may yet be consistent, as a temporary arrangement, with their present condition as a laboring, landless, and homeless class, will not be objected to by the national Executive."

Nowhere in his message does he even hint that it is our duty to undertake the management of the domestic affairs of these freedmen, but in every allusion to the subject it is expressly in reference to State action, and State action alone. He simply proposes to approve any action of a State government, upon certain conditions being recognized, which looks to the employment of these people, with a view to their own benefit and to prevent the confusion and difficulties which he recognizes as inseparable from the change in their personal status.

I merely cite, Mr. Speaker, the suggestions of the President as showing the views entertained upon these questions by him, and to which he has undoubtedly given some time and attention. I do not cite them as an authority particularly binding upon anyone, knowing, as I well do, that upon most of the questions connected with the negro he has been chased from the transcendent position he once occupied in the Republican synagogue.

There can be no doubt, then, I submit, that the States are the proper authority to take charge of the matters embraced in this bill, and act in the premises as their judgment may warrant. It is to them, and to them alone, belongs the right and power to determine in what manner shall be mitigated the evils arising from any system of pauperism from any cause within their limits. My friend from Massachusetts thinks differently, and says it is the duty of the Government to lead these people quietly through the wilderness into the land of promise. I recognize the scriptural allusion which the gentleman makes; but let me tell him I think the duties of this Government, as established by this bill, in leading these people into the land of promise, will be similar to those which the omnipotent Jehovah discharged to that chosen people of his whom he was leading into a similar declared land. That consisted, to a very great extent, in furnishing them with manna, and, for variety, an occasional supply of quails. The duty of this Government, by this bill, will be about the same. It is to furnish them with bread to eat and with clothing to wear, they to return to us the product of their toil for the benefit of the Government.

Another objection I have is that this bill creates a body of office-holders within the various States, to hold their appointment directly from the President of the United States. It matters not to me who occupies that exalted position; it matters not to me whether he is or is not of the political faith in which I have been raised. The objection would apply with just as much force if I subscribed to every political doctrine he ever promulgated. If there is any one thing to-day which has for years threatened the perpetuity of our form of government it is the amount of Federal patronage vested in that officer. The head of any constitutionally governed country upon earth to-day has not a tithe of the patronage which is this day vested in the Executive of the United States. By this bill you propose in effect to vest in him the appointment of I know not how many officers, thus swelling to that extent the already bloated patronage of that officer. The necessities of the system alone will limit the number. I need not enlarge upon the matter; it has been alluded to a hundred times in both branches of Congress, and its evils would not be more patent were I to discuss it during the entire time allotted to me. It will also build up a system of vassalage vast and fearful. It confines the vision of these people to one single object, and that the Government of the United States. Beyond that, short of that, there is no power, there is nothing to them. These people who occupy this territory in this way will become the vassals of the Government. If we put down this rebellion and occupy this territory, they will occupy these lands as "fiefs of the sword," in the same manner and upon much the same terms that vassals did in Europe eight hundred years ago, when conquered territory was divided among the victors.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

SENATE.

I come now to speak of the amount of expense which will be entailed on the Government by this bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts thinks it is not going to cost the Government anything, but rather that they will derive a revenue from it. I say we ought not to derive any revenue from it. These negroes, free men as you propose to make them, will be entitled to the utmost farthing their toils can produce them. But, sir, I think the gentleman himself must see that his proposed system will inevitably result in the expenditure of vast sums by the Government in carrying it into effect; that is, if he attaches any weight to the suggestions of the authorities he has read himself in support of his measure.

Says the committee, from whose letter to the President he quotes, "the Government must know even better than the people what the vastness of the question is, and it is not proper for us to ask if, Mr. President, the Government is doing or preparing to do what is necessary to meet it: to reduce the evils connected with emancipation to their lowest point and elevate its blessings to the highest; to establish a system carefully considered and adapted, and executed with energy and zeal, for the thorough and general dealing with the freedmen. It is plain to us, with our experience, that the question is too large for anything short of Government authority, Government resources, and Government ubiquity to deal with." They then recognize the fact and admit that the subject is so vast that no power short of Government power, no resources except of the Government, are sufficient to grapple with the details of this question, to manage it in its inception, and defray its expenses when started.

I would like to see that gentleman come down to the practical question of figures, and show this House a fair estimate of the expenses of the officers which will be required under this bill. I will submit my estimate. Perhaps my figures may not be correct, but they will afford some indication of what may be required under this bill. If this people number four million, will one resident superintendent and one clerk be too many for four hundred of them? Can one man superintend and direct the labors and energies and toil of more than four hundred persons? I submit that in the State of Illinois it would be considered a large undertaking for one man to direct the labors of four hundred upon our farms in the ordinary occupations of agricultural life. If we allow one for every four hundred, the number of superintendents will be ten thousand; if they each be allowed a clerk, that calls for just as many more employes. If you pay them at the rate of fifty dollars a month for superintendents, or $600 a year, it will amount to $6,000,000. Their clerks, at the moderate rate of twenty-five dollars per month, or $300 per year, will require $3,000,000, or, in all, a sum of $9,000,000 for salaries alone. This does not take into account at all the numberless other sources of expenditure, such as stock, implements of all kinds; necessarily to be procured before their labor upon the soil can be even commenced.

It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that the figures which I present are not extraordinary or unreasonable, when you consider the number of persons upon whom this bill is to operate. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] asks, what are we to do with these people? and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] I believe, indulged in the same inquiry. My answer is, Go ahead, subdue the rebellion, and reinstate the authority of the Government over every portion of our soil. These people are there. Emancipate them, if you see fit to do it, and if you have the power to do it. I am making no objection to that now. Go ahead, and carry out your designs. The land is there, and the people are there. Let them work. I have never yet read in history of a nation where there was a demand for labor and a supply on hand that an accommodation was not instantly effected. If a demand for labor exists, leave the matter to the operation of the laws of trade; leave it to the great rule which obtains in every civilized country on earth, the rule that prescribes that every man having an article to dispose of, and a demand existing for that article, will find opportunities enough to dispose of it to his own satisfaction and advantage. This people are not to be destroyed; this land is not to be annihilated; both will exist, I presume, in some shape when this war shall have ceased. When that happy time shall come—which God grant may not be far distant—I see no reason to doubt but employment will be open to these people where they have always lived, and that under some regulations, mutually advantageous, the now desolate earth will again yield her increase, and the prosperity of the future conceal the ravages of the present.

I have only one other remark or thought to suggest, for my time has nearly expired. I desire to say that I dissent from this measure on the theoretical points which have been advanced in its support. Here are four million people within the limits of our territory. They are of a different race and nationality, possessing different tastes and feelings. If they are to be made free and elevated to the condition of freemen, I have then only this to say, that if in the strife and toils of life they possess within themselves the capacities claimed for them by gentlemen upon this floor, if they possess the ability to show that they are men in every sense of the word, it will be within their power to obtain for themselves a name and place upon the earth. If, on the contrary, they do not possess the inherent capacity to sustain themselves in this battle of life with no other support than the laws afford to all; if they cannot, without special provision be made for them, resist the encroachments or aggressions, if it please you so to term it, of the white men by whom they will be surrounded, then, sir, history teaches us their fate. Your legislation will not, cannot protect them from what has invariably been the fate of a weak race when brought in contact with a strong and vigorous one. They must either submit to the position to which their inferiority will consign them, to become the "hewers of wood and drawers of water," and, choosing to dwell in the land because it is pleasant, they must bow their shoulders to bear and become a servant unto tribute; or else they must pass away before the resistless and onward march of the dominant race. The history of that race, our race, Mr. Speaker, teaches us that its course cannot be stayed, the natural obstacles of the physical earth vanish at its approach, and from before it inferior races pass away.

The numerous tribes that once roamed in their wild and savage freedom over these broad lands are obeying the decrees of this inexorable law, and the time is not far distant when, their hunting-grounds occupied by their harder competitor, their council-fires extinguished, all that will be left to attest they ever had an existence will be the record of their vices and their virtues, which coming ages may look upon more as the creation of the idealist than the accurate history of a race.

With us is fulfilled in part the ancient promise: in our development have the boundaries of Japheth been enlarged, and in this land to-day does he dwell in the tents of Shem.

Military Interference with Elections.SPEECH OF HON. L. W. POWELL, OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

March 3 and 4, 1864.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 37) to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, from interfering in elections in the States.

The bill was read by the Secretary. The first section provides that it shall not be lawful for any military or naval officer of the United States, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, to order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men within one mile of the place where any general or special election is held in any State of the United States of America, and that it shall not be lawful for any officer of the Army or Navy of the United States to prescribe or fix, or attempt to prescribe or fix, by proclamation, order, or otherwise, the qualifications of voters in any State or in any manner to interfere with the freedom of any election, or with the exercise of the free right of suffrage in any State. Any officer of the Army or Navy, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States who violates this section is for every such offense to be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine cases of misdemeanor, and on conviction to pay a fine of not less than $200, and not exceeding $20,000, and suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than two nor more than twenty years, at the discretion of the court; and any person so convicted is moreover to be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust, under the Government of the United States. The bill is not, however, to be so construed as to prevent any officer, soldier, sailor, or marine, from exercising the right of suffrage in any election district to which he may belong, if otherwise qualified according to the laws of the State in which he shall offer to vote.

By the second section any officer or person in the military or naval service of the United States, who shall order or advise, or who shall directly or indirectly, by force, threat, menace, intimidation or otherwise, prevent or attempt to prevent any qualified voter of any State from freely exercising the right of suffrage at any general or special election, or who shall in like manner compel, or attempt to compel, any officer of an election in any State to receive a vote from a person not legally qualified to vote, or who shall impose or attempt to impose any rules or regulations for conducting such election different from those prescribed by law, or interfere in any manner with any officer of the election in the discharge of his duties, is for any such offense to be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine cases of misdemeanor, and on conviction to pay a fine of not exceeding $20,000, and suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary, not exceeding five years, at the discretion of the court, and any person so convicted is moreover to be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the Government of the United States.

Mr. POWELL said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The object of the bill is to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, from interfering with elections in the States. The bill provides that the persons named, if they interfere with elections in the States, shall be punished, upon trial and conviction in the courts, by fine and imprisonment, and shall be forever after disqualified from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States. The importance of the bill at the present crisis in our affairs cannot be overestimated. In times of profound peace and quiet, when no abuses of the character proposed to be remedied by this bill existed, it would be evidently wise and proper to enact such a law. Wise lawgivers so shape their legislation as to prevent as far as possible all abuses that are calculated to sap the foundations of the political system, to impair or destroy the fundamental law, or to endanger or overthrow the rights or liberties of the people.

It cannot be doubted that upon the keeping of the elective franchise absolutely free depends the very existence of our form of Government and our republican institutions. Free States in all ages have regarded the purity of the elective franchise as of the greatest and most vital importance, and have enacted severe penal laws for the punishment of those who interfered by force or fraud to prevent free elections. I believe there is no Government on the face of the earth in which elections have been carried on for the purpose of appointing any of the officers of the Government, save and except the United States of America, that has not had laws to punish, and severely punish, those who should interfere with the freedom of the elective franchise. All the republics of antiquity had the severest laws punishing those who interfered with the freedom of their elections. In the second volume of Blackstone's Commentaries, by Mr. Tucker, on page 170, I find this:

"For in a democracy there can be no exercise of sovereignty but by suffrage, which is the declaration of the people's will. In all democracies, therefore, it is of the utmost importance to regulate by whom, and in what manner, the suffrages are to be given. And the Athenians were so justly jealous of this prerogative, that a stranger who interfered in the assemblies of the people was punished by their laws with death; because such a man was esteemed guilty of high treason, by usurping those rights of sovereignty to which he had no title. In England, where the people do not debate in a collective body but by representation, the exercise of this sovereignty consists in the choice of representatives. The laws have therefore very strictly guarded against usurpation or abuse of this power by many salutary provisions, which may be reduced to these three points: 1. The qualifications of the electors. 2. The qualifications of the elected. 3. The proceedings at elections."

By the laws of Great Britain persons convicted of bribery, force, or fraud at elections are punished severely. At the common law bribery and kindred offenses were crimes, and the British statutes punished persons guilty of such offenses on conviction with fines of £500, and deprived them of the privilege ever after of voting or holding any office of trust or honor under that Government. One section of this bill provides that the soldiers of the Army of the United States shall not be permitted to be kept within one mile of any poll where an election is going on, on the day of election. I find similar provisions in the English law, which I will read from page 179 of the same book:

"As soon, therefore, as the time and place of election, either in counties or boroughs, are fixed, all soldiers quartered to the place are to remove, at least one day before the election, to the distance of two miles or more, and not to return till one day after the poll is ended. Riots, likewise, have been frequently determined to make an election void."

By a statute passed in the reign of George II, to which I alluded in a running debate that arose upon the reference of this bill to a committee, and which statute is quoted at length in the report made by the Committee on Military Affairs, it is provided that the Secretary of War or the party who for the time being is acting as Secretary of War shall issue his orders to remove all soldiers from places of voting in the manner prescribed in the law I have just read. It further provides that if the Secretary of War or the person acting as such shall not issue the order as required by the statute, he shall upon conviction in the courts be dismissed from office and be ever after disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust, under the British Government.

That is the manner in which our English ancestors, from whom we have derived most of our maxims of civil and constitutional liberty, regarded this subject. Mr. Tucker, in his notes to Blackstone's Commentaries, in reference to the law I have read requiring soldiers to be removed from the place of voting, says, "A similar regulation in the election of Representatives to Congress seems highly proper and necessary." It is strange to me that we have never had such a law on our statute-book. I venture the assertion that we are the only people on earth who have had any regard for free government that have not had some such law. I suppose the only reason for the absence of such a law is that our elections have been regulated heretofore by officers appointed by the States, and it is only very recently that the armies of the United States have attempted to interfere in our elections.

By the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, and by the constitution of every State in the Union, the military is to be kept in strict subordination to the civil power; and I suppose that those who went before us never thought we should have rulers so wicked and corrupt as to use the machinery of the Federal Government for the purpose of prostrating the freedom of elections in the States; otherwise, I am sure that such laws as the one before us would have been enacted long before this. I find upon examination that seven of the States of the Union have enacted statutes to prevent soldiers making their appearance on election day at the places where the elections are held. I shall not trouble the Senate by reading all these statutes; but as the State of Maryland—unfortunately for the honor and dignity of that State—figures a good deal in this matter, I will take the liberty of reading the statute of Maryland from her Code, volume one, page 262:

"Article 35—Elections.

"Sec. 24. No commissioned or non-commissioned officer having the command of any soldier or soldiers quartered or posted in any district of any county in this State shall muster or embody any of the said troops, or march any recruiting party within the view of any place of election during the time of holding said election, under the penalty of $100. This section not to apply to the city of Baltimore."

I have similar provisions here from the statutes of the States of Mississippi, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Maine, and Massachusetts. The constitution of the State of Maryland provides that upon conviction for the offense of giving or receiving bribes or influencing any man to give an illegal vote, not only the man giving the bribe but the man giving the illegal vote shall forever after be disqualified from voting and from holding any office of trust, honor, or profit under the State government. Every State in the Union has severe penal laws, providing for the punishment of all who in any way interfere to prevent free elections.

With us, Mr. President, sovereignty resides in the people, and the people by the exercise of free suffrage declare their will and appoint their agencies to carry on the Government. He who attempts to interfere with this most inestimable right, whether he be President, major general, or citizen, is an enemy to the Republic and deserves the harshest punishment. In order to have free elections, there must be free speech and a free press; the sovereign people must have an opportunity of forming an enlightened public opinion upon the questions at issue, which can only be done after full and free discussion. Free speech and a free press in a Government like ours are the soul of republican institutions; free suffrage is the very heart-strings of civil liberty. To be free, the elections must be conducted in accordance with laws so framed as to prevent fraud, force, intimidation, corruption, and venality, superintended by election judges and officers independent of the Executive or any other power of the Government; the military must not interfere, but be kept in strict subordination to the law, which should be so framed as to prevent absolutely such interference. The only duty of the Executive is to see that the law is faithfully executed. The Executive must not use the power intrusted to him to prevent free elections. Mr. Locke, in his excellent treatise on Government, page 379, speaking of the executive power, says:

"What I have said here concerning the legislative in general, holds true also concerning the supreme executor, who having a double trust put in him, both to have a part in the legislative and the supreme execution of the law, acts against both when he goes about to set up his own arbitrary will as the law of society. He acts also contrary to his trust when he either employs the force, treasure, and offices of the society to corrupt the representatives and gain them to his purpose, or openly proclaims the electors and prescribes to their choice such whom he has by solicitations, threats, promises, or otherwise won to his designs, and employs them to bring in such who have promised beforehand what to vote and what to enact. Thus to regulate candidates and electors and new-model the ways of election, what is it but to cut up the Government by the roots and poison the very fountain of public security? for the people having reserved to themselves the choice of their representatives, as the fence of their properties, could do it for no other end but that they might always be freely chosen, and, so chosen, freely act and advise as the necessity of the Commonwealth and the public good should upon examination and mature debate be judged to require. This, those who give their votes before they hear the debate and have weighed the reasons on all sides are not capable of doing. To prepare such an assembly as this, and endeavor to set up the declared abettors of his own will for the true representatives of the people and the law-makers of the society, is certainly as great a breach of trust and as perfect a declaration of a design to subvert the Government as is possible to be met with."

Nothing can be truer than the sentiment uttered by Mr. Locke in the extract I have just read. It is certainly a subversion of the very foundation of the Government for the Executive to use the force and the power that the Government has placed in his hands for defensive purposes, to overthrow the free suffrages of the people and to appoint those to power who will be his truckling menials, his subservient agents to carry out his will, to aid him it may be to overthrow the liberties of the people whom they should represent, betray the Constitution that they should preserve and protect, destroy everything that makes the Government desirable and worthy of the support of an honest and free people. Yet, sir, such things have been done, and I regret to say that there are those in the Senate Chamber who not only do not denounce but who approve these usurpations, these plain, palpable violations of the Constitution of their country.

Mr. President, let us for a moment see what are the powers of the President of the United States. From whence does he derive this power to regulate elections and to appoint representatives of the people? for when stripped of its verbiage that is really what has been done in many parts of the States of Maryland, Missouri, Kentucky, and Delaware. Where, I ask, does the Executive of the United States derive such power? He certainly does not derive it from the Constitution. The second and third sections of the second article of the Constitution prescribe the duties of the President. Let us read those clauses of the Constitution and see what powers are conferred upon the Chief Magistrate. I hold that the President can exercise no power but what is conferred upon him by the Constitution. He is the agent of the people appointed for specific purposes to administer their Government as its Executive, within prescribed and limited powers. The Constitution provides, in article two:

"Sec. 2. The President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States; he may require the opinion in writing of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices, and he shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

"Sec. 3. He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper; he shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers; he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States."

There, sir, are the powers of the President of the United States. He is Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States, and under that clause I suppose those who oppose the bill claim that the President can rightfully exercise the power that he has exercised in overthrowing the freedom of elections in Maryland and other States. They claim it under the war power, which I will notice in another part of my remarks. The President is to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." What laws are they that the President shall see faithfully executed? The Constitution declares that—

"This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Military Interference with Elections—Mr. Powell.

SENATE.

These are the laws that the President is to see faithfully executed. Whenever he goes beyond that he is a usurper. The President, under the Constitution, can exercise no implied power. All the implied powers that can be exercised under our Government must be exercised by another and a different body of magistracy, to wit, the legislative; and that is the express language of the Constitution. The eighteenth paragraph of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution declares that Congress is clothed with the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into effect all the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or officer thereof; consequently the President can exercise no implied powers. He can exercise no power except that with which he is clothed by the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof.

In the States to which I have alluded, the President, or those acting under his orders, have prescribed the qualifications of voters and the qualifications of candidates for office, and that, too, in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States. This is a grave charge, but it is one that I will make good by testimony that none can doubt. Let us see who it is that has the right to prescribe the qualifications of voters. I suppose that no Senator will deny that as to all State offices the States have the power to prescribe the qualifications of the officer as well as of the voter. That power not having been delegated by the Constitution to the General Government, the States necessarily retain it. But there is an express provision of the Constitution. The tenth amendment, which declares, "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people," and the Constitution very clearly indicate who are qualified voters for members of Congress. The second section of the first article of the Constitution is in these words:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

The Constitution of the United States, in the clause just read, declares who shall be qualified electors for members of Congress. It fixes the qualification as the one ordained by the State government for the members of the most numerous branch of their Legislature. That is the fundamental law of the land; but in violation of that provision of the Constitution the military have seen fit, by military orders, to fix the qualifications of voters in the States. They have gone further, and fixed the qualifications for office. Not only the military have done this, but the President of the United States himself has done it. I am not going to waste all my time upon those who do the Chief Magistrate's bidding, but it is my purpose to-day to expose his atrocious violations of the Constitution. I trust that I shall speak of the President in a manner that is courteous, but I certainly shall do it in very plain language. The charges that I have to make I trust will not be misunderstood by any one. I will not deal in innuendo, insinuation, or hint, but I will make the charge directly, and I have the proof to sustain it.

The second section of the first article of the Constitution fixes the qualifications of a Representative in Congress:

"No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen."

The Committee on Military Affairs, who made a very elaborate report, which I have before me, and which I shall presently review, justify the military in all they have done in controlling elections. The sole object and design of the committee in their report seems to be the justification and vindication of the military authorities for their atrocious assault on the rights of the States and the liberties of the people and their wicked and illegal interference in elections; and they assault every person who says or does anything tending to prove that the military have usurped powers that belong to the civil officers of the States and to the people. The committee justify the President and the military authorities for this interference in elections upon the ground that it was right and proper that the military arm should have been so used to protect the voters, "the loyal voters," as they are called in the report. The Constitution prescribes the duty of the Chief Magistrate on this subject. I will read the clause from article four:

"SEC. 4. The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and, on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence."

The President of the United States has no authority or power to send his military into one of the adhering States for the purpose of preventing domestic violence at the polls unless he had been invited to do so by the State authorities, for the Constitution plainly and distinctly provides that he shall do it on application of the Legislature if in session, and if that cannot be, then on the application of the Executive; and that is one of the wisest provisions in that sacred instrument. It is a provision intended to prevent a despotic President from interfering by armed force with the rights of the States and the liberties of the people. Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, second volume, section eighteen hundred and twenty-five, page 633, speaking of this clause of the Constitution, says:

"It may not be amiss further to observe (in the language of another commentator) that every pretext for intermeddling with the domestic concerns of any State under color of protecting it against domestic violence, is taken away by that part of the provision which renders an application from the Legislature or executive authority of the State endangered necessary to be made to the General Government before its interference can be at all proper. On the other hand, this article becomes an immense acquisition of strength and additional force to the aid of any State government in case of an internal rebellion or insurrection against lawful authority."

This learned commentator takes the very view of this clause of the Constitution that I have heretofore indicated. But for this provision of the Constitution a corrupt, venal, or ambitious President could by means of the military force, under some imaginary plea of domestic violence, invade any State in this Union on the eve of an election, and dictate the persons who should be returned as members of the other House of Congress, who should be returned as members of the Legislature, who should be returned as Governors of the States. In a word, if you allow him to use the Army in this way without the invitation of the State authorities, a wicked and corrupt man would have it in his power to prostrate every State government in the Union, and to elect officers who would do his bidding, and thus overthrow the liberties of the people, and establish a consolidated despotism of which he would be the master.

Mr. President, after the few preliminary remarks which I have made, I will now proceed to the examination of the report made by the Committee on Military Affairs upon this bill.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me one word here—

Mr. POWELL. I prefer not to be interrupted. If the Senator has any questions to ask, if he will reserve them until I get through I shall then answer them with great pleasure.

Mr. HOWARD. I will say nothing, then, until the Senator gets through.

Mr. POWELL. I am willing to hear any questions the Senator wishes to ask.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator may as well proceed.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, this bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, came back to the Senate accompanied by a very voluminous adverse report. I have read the report with a great deal of care, and if I had not known that it was made by a committee composed of honorable Senators of this body, I never should have dreamed that such a document could emanate from a committee of the Senate of the United States. So far from meeting the case and discussing the bill fully, fairly, candidly, and impartially, the committee made a report of some fifty-two closely printed pages, almost every line of which is a labored defense of the President and the military authorities who had command in Kentucky, Maryland, and Delaware; and in order to make the defense of the military commanders and of the President complete, the report indulges in the harshest assaults upon every person whose name appears in the documents before the committee, that at all complains or censures the military for their unlawful and outrageous interference in the elections in those States.

The committee even travel out of the record to find objects for assault. The honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Johnson,] took occasion some weeks since, in a debate that sprang up in this body, to make some remarks upon the election that had occurred in his State last fall. The committee in the report notice that, and I will read what they say of it:

"The recent Maryland election is a fruitful topic of complaint. The Governor and one of her Senators unite in denouncing it. The former, in his message, informs the Legislature that 'a part of the Army which a generous people supplied for a very different purpose, was on that day employed in stifling the freedom of election in a faithful State, intimidating its sworn officers, violating the constitutional rights of its loyal citizens, and obstructing the usual channels of communication between them and their Executive.' And a Senator of Maryland has indulged in expressions which nothing but the most flagrant invasions of the elective franchise can excuse."

"But the weight of these imputations is seriously diminished by two considerations: both gentlemen owe their positions to an election conducted under the same auspices; both gentlemen are now on the losing side of the election which they impeach; and the country has not forgotten that it is the bad habit of the defeated partisans of the slavery interests to blacken the opponents whom they fail to defeat."

Mr. President, why step out of the way to make this assault upon the honorable Senator from Maryland? Nothing that the honorable Senator said was before the committee. They had before them the message and accompanying documents of the Governor of the State of Maryland, and upon that they could legitimately comment. They not only step out of the way to assault the Senator, but they impute to him most unworthy motives. Complaint is now made of the Maryland election, the committee say, because the Senator and the Governor are on the losing side. I, however, will not enter into any defense of the patriotic, able, and distinguished Senator from Maryland. He is in the Senate Chamber, and he is fully able to make his defense against all assaults and all assailants, whether they come from the Military Committee or from others in this Hall, or elsewhere. I will leave that matter to the honorable Senator himself. But I will simply say that I regard the assault as unjust, unwarrantable, and unworthy of a committee of this body. This is the first time I have ever seen in a report of a committee of this body an instance where they stepped out of the way to assail a Senator, and to attribute unworthy motives to him in order to strengthen and to build up the waning reputations of military commanders, whose conduct has been such that they must, in all after time, receive the condemnation of all honest, of all law-abiding and liberty-loving men.

Mr. President, allow me to read one or two extracts from this report. The committee in the outset of the report on the first page announce a proposition that is correct and which I heartily approve. I will read it:

"The bill is founded upon the supposition that the military have in some instances interfered in an illegal or improper way with popular elections in the States, and seeks to prevent that evil for the future by the infliction of severe pains and penalties."

"That elections should be free from all violence and intimidation, is an axiom of free government accepted by all, and so evident that it need not be discussed. Violence and threats of violence, and all disturbance, actual or threatened, calculated to keep the legal voter from the polls, or to constrain his free will and choice in exercising his right, are plainly incompatible with the principles on which our governments, whether State or Federal, rest."

I suppose the extract from the report which I have just read will receive the approval of every man who lives under a republican Government or appreciates civil liberty.

I will undertake to show, and that too from the evidence that was before the committee, that the very infractions of right which they notice in the extract from the report had occurred, that the evidence was ample, full, and complete before them when they made the report recommending that the bill should not pass. Yes, sir, the Committee on Military Affairs had evidence, abundant evidence, in their possession, documents that they review in this very report, proving that the military had interfered in the most striking and unmistakable manner in the elections in the States of Kentucky and Maryland.

Military Interference with Elections—Mr. Powell.

SENATE.

If the committee will adhere to the principle laid down in the extract which I have just read from their report, and will say that it is the duty of Congress by legislation to prevent the evil, then on the evidence I propose to present I shall have a right to demand their votes for this bill, or some bill to carry out the same views and objects.

The committee notice the statute of George II, passed in 1735, and they append a copy of it to the report.

I referred to that statute in the debate when this bill was up for reference; and the committee, in speaking of it, say:

"It cannot escape notice that the leading object of this ancient statute, as sufficiently evidenced by the preamble, was 'the preservation of the rights and liberties of the kingdom,' not their destruction. And the history of the time shows that the prohibition to keep military forces near places where there was an election of members of Parliament, arose from outrages practiced upon the electors by the ministers in posting troops so as to overawe them, and coerce them into the returning of candidates friendly to the ministerial party, and the supporters of prerogative against popular rights. And we are told that, so far did this party push their schemes, that in 1734, the year before the act was passed, the ministers, before the election took place, made out a list of the sixteen Scottish peers who were to be elected, which was approved by the Crown; and that, among other foul means resorted to for securing their election, a battalion of the king's troops were drawn up in the court of Edinburgh, contrary to custom, and without any apparent cause but that of overawing the electors. This outrage appears to have been the immediate occasion of the passage of the act. It was passed in the interest of liberty, and in resistance of the tyrannical schemes of the Crown and its flatterers to check its growth by stifling the voice of free election."

That is the commentary the committee make upon that wise statute, and a most excellent commentary it is, and it is the very object recited in that statute which is to be effected by the passage of the bill under consideration. We desire to prevent the President and his officers from interfering in elections. We desire to preserve the ancient liberties of the people, and we know that that cannot be done unless elections are absolutely free. We desire that the President shall not augment his power and overthrow the rights and liberties of the people by returning to the Congress of the United States or to the Legislatures of the States men elected at the point of the bayonet, who are willing tools, ready to do his bidding. It is for that very purpose that we propose this bill. Conduct far more outrageous against the right of suffrage has occurred in these United States within the last two years than is represented by the committee in their comment upon this statute of George II to have occurred in Great Britain.

The committee had before them an address and certain documents concerning elections in the State of Kentucky upon which they comment at some length. So far as the military interference in the State of Kentucky is concerned, I will state the facts very briefly, and I will notice the report of the committee on that subject. The first palpable act of the interference of the military in regard to elections in that State occurred in the winter of 1863. During that winter there was a meeting of the Democratic party assembled at the capital of Kentucky for the purpose of nominating candidates for Governor and the other State offices.

That convention was dispersed by a Colonel Gilbert, commanding a regiment of United States troops. I offered in this Chamber a resolution asking for a committee to investigate the conduct of that military officer in that interference with the right of the people to meet peaceably and to nominate candidates for office. The majority of the Senate declined to give me that committee. Afterwards, candidates nominated by one of the political organizations in Kentucky took the field. There were other persons, composed somewhat of both these parties, who determined, notwithstanding the interference at Frankfort, to organize the Democratic party. They did so by addressing a letter, which was signed by a large number of respectable gentlemen in the State, to Hon. Charles A. Wickliffe, requesting him to become a candidate for Governor. He did become a candidate for Governor, and other gentlemen became candidates for other State offices, and the State ticket was filled and regularly put on the track for the election to be held on the first Monday of August last.

Then it was that the military interfered in many parts of the State. In some parts of the State, I am happy to say, there was no interference or very little, except intimidation in consequence of military orders that had been issued. There was no direct and immediate interference by force, except in certain localities in the State. A committee of gentlemen who represented the organization that supported the Wickliffe ticket wrote an address to the people and to Congress in which they recited some of the acts of interference by the military authorities, which was presented to the Senate and referred to the Military Committee that had this bill in charge.

The committee in their report make very harsh and unjust remarks on the gentlemen who signed this address, and they do what is common with gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. Whenever they want to break the force of an argument, or refute a fact, whenever they desire to defeat an object that they think is calculated to injure the party in power, they accuse those who make the charge of disloyalty, and they vainly think that is an answer to every argument and a refutation of every charge. The gentlemen who compose the committee that framed this address are charged as disloyal in the report of the committee, and the Military Committee embody in their report the letter of the gentlemen who invited Mr. Wickliffe to become a candidate. They harshly criticize that letter, and they pretend to regard the letter as disloyal. In order that these gentlemen may have a full vindication, as far as it is possible for me to make it, I will append their letter entire to my speech, and send it to the people; the letter will fully vindicate them from the unjust charges of the committee. I am ready and willing to maintain against all opposition the sentiments and principles set forth in that letter. To be sure, the writers of the letter very justly censure the Administration for unconstitutional acts. Among other things, it says:

"We hold this rebellion utterly unjustifiable in its inception, and the dissolution of the Union the greatest of calamities."

"We would use all just and constitutional means adapted to the suppression of the one and the restoration of the other."

That is the kind of language used by these gentlemen; and yet because they have had the patriotism, manhood, and courage to set forth the facts, and to prove beyond doubt the most unjustifiable and outrageous interference of the military in the elections in Kentucky, the Committee on Military Affairs, to get clear of and weaken the force of the facts and arguments set forth in the address, being wholly unable to meet them in fair and manly argument, or refute the facts, denounce the authors of the address as disloyal. Sir, I make bold to say, that so far as I know the gentlemen who signed that letter, and I know the most of them, there is not one of them who is or ever was disloyal. They are, each and every one of them, Union men. Their Unionism has been tested; they have been tried and not found wanting in fidelity to the constitutional Union of our fathers.

The committee are very much mistaken in some matters stated as fact in their report. On the 10th page they say:

"The writers, though pretending to hold the rebellion 'utterly unjustifiable in its inception,' leave a strong implication that it had become not unjustifiable, and seem to regard the employment of negro troops to 'make war upon the whites' in the rebel States as changing its original character from unjustifiable to the contrary. And such they and their candidate undoubtedly regarded it, and had in contemplation to take measures of violence to resist it. At this time the recruiting of black troops, under the act of 1862, was in active progress in Kentucky, Tennessee, and other slaveholding districts."

Now, sir, at that time the enlisting of black troops was not actively going on in Kentucky. Every citizen of Kentucky knows that the committee are mistaken when they make that assertion. It has only been very recently that there has been any recruiting of negroes in Kentucky, and that, I believe, has been confined to the southern border of the State. And yet, sir, in order to make out a case against these gentlemen and against the Democratic candidate for Governor, Mr. Wickliffe, the committee assert as a fact what is not true. The committee, I have no doubt, were mistaken. I will not charge that they would intentionally misrepresent.

The committee base that assault upon the Democratic ticket and the gentlemen who signed that letter upon this clause in the letter:

"It is now obvious that the fixed purpose of the Administration is to arm the negroes of the South to make war upon the whites, and we hold it to be the duty of the people of Kentucky to enter against such a policy a solemn and most emphatic protest."

The committee construe that to mean the taking of violent measures against the Government! Every Union Legislature that has convened in Kentucky since this rebellion broke out has passed resolves protesting against the enlistment of that description of the population in the Army. The people of Kentucky have uniformly protested against it; and yet, because the gentlemen who signed that letter also protest against it, the committee think that is highly revolutionary. Let me ask the Committee on Military Affairs if the people of any State in this Union have not the right to make their protest against any policy of the General Government? Most undoubtedly they have. If not they are the veriest slaves. Why, sir, it is done on some measure or another in almost every State in the Union every month during the session of Congress. It is the mode in which a free people make known their will, and arrest the attention of those who administer their Government affairs for the time being; and yet the Committee on Military Affairs think there is something criminal even in that!

The committee say that Mr. Wickliffe and the gentlemen who invited him to become a candidate desired rebels to vote. I will read that part of the report:

"The authors of the address, with commendable truthfulness, say: 'It is very frankly admitted that we hoped and expected to obtain the support of the great mass of the southern rights men of the State. They were, for the most part, Democrats of long standing. Though classed by the adherents of the Administration as "disloyal," the great majority of them were not secessionists, and were entirely free from all complicity in the rebellion. So far from esteeming it a fault of which we should be ashamed, we regarded the effort to conciliate them, if it could be done without a sacrifice of principle on either side, as highly meritorious; and we now gratefully acknowledge the cordial support which that portion of our fellow-citizens were ready and anxious to yield to our platform and candidate whenever permitted to do so.'"

Upon that the committee remark:

"This is an express avowal of the purpose of the writers and of Mr. Wickliffe, their candidate, to obtain the votes, not only of loyal Democrats, but of persons who were open rebels, however numerous they might be. No one can deny this, and no one can deny that such a purpose was directly in the teeth not only of General Burnside's proclamation establishing martial law, but of the statute of Kentucky of March 11. It invited open enemies, whose hands were red with the blood of the defenders of the Government, and who were loaded with the spoils of plundered loyalists, to come to the polls and participate in the election of the officers of a loyal State! There is but one step, and that a short one, between this invitation and openly embracing the rebel cause."

The committee say that they invited those whose hands were red with the blood of Unionists, and who were loaded with the spoils of the plundered friends of the Union, to come to the polls. Why, sir, never were a committee more mistaken. Those gentlemen did no such thing. They desired no rebel to vote. They asked the vote of no rebel. They desired that the constitution and election laws of Kentucky should be carried out, and faithfully administered by the officers appointed by the State for that purpose. I have read the extract from the address that called forth that comment. It says that they expected the support of the southern rights men of the State. The honorable Committee on Military Affairs must be most profoundly ignorant of the principles and feelings of those who at one time were called southern rights men in Kentucky. That address tells you that the great majority of those southern rights men were not secessionists, and were entirely free from all complicity in the rebellion; and yet the Committee on Military Affairs say that the authors of this address invited those whose hands were red with the blood of Union men, and who were loaded with spoils taken from plundered loyalists, to come to the polls. The committee were drawing upon their fancy for their facts in making such a statement, and a most distempered fancy it must have been. They could not have been deluded by the words "southern rights," because this address states distinctly that the southern rights men were not secessionists, and were not implicated in the rebellion.

Allow me to say to the Senate at this point that the southern rights men in Kentucky never really amounted to a political organization. At the beginning of this rebellion, in the election of delegates to a border State convention, one portion of the candidates were called "Southern Rights" and the other "Union." The "Southern Rights" ticket, however, was withdrawn, and the "Union" ticket was elected without opposition. There might have been in some localities immediately after that some little party designation of that kind; but let me tell the Senate the southern rights men of Kentucky were, with a few exceptions, Peace Democrats. Many men who belonged to other political organizations heretofore now agree with them in sentiment. They were for the Constitution and the Union, were opposed to secession, were opposed to a dissolution of the Union, and they thought the only way in which that could be prevented was by peaceable means, by negotiation, compromise, and concession between the North and the South. They thought that war would result in a dissolution of the Union. It was because of their fervid devotion to the constitutional Union that they opposed the war. They believed that war would cause the loss of hundreds of thousands of valuable lives; that the country would be laid waste, towns and cities destroyed; that untold millions of property would be destroyed; that it would result in the demoralization of our people; in a national debt of thousands of millions; in heavy and ruinous taxes upon the labor of the people that would consume and exhaust their substance; in an overthrow of the Constitution; in the destruction of the rights of the States; in a dissolution of the Union; in the loss of the liberty of the people; and in the prostration and ruin of both the North and the South.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

SENATE.

The organization that put Mr. Wickliffe forward as a candidate was the Democratic party under its old name and under its old flag.

In this report the committee impugn the loyalty of Mr. Wickliffe; and upon what ground? Mr. Wickliffe was one of the first and staunchest Union men in the State of Kentucky. In the other end of this Capitol he voted men and money to carry on the war; and he never failed to do so until the last session, when he voted against an appropriation bill because the House would not insert a clause in it that the money should not be used for the purpose of freeing negroes and reducing States to provinces. It is well known that Mr. Wickliffe was a strong and warm friend of the war up to that time, until he thought the radical policy of the President was such as would destroy every hope of the restoration of the Union. He has never indicated an opposition to the war. He did vote against one appropriation bill, and assigned the reason I have stated; which, in my judgment, was a good and valid reason. Up to that time, however, I believe he voted all the men and all the money the Administration desired. When I say "all," I mean he generally voted in that way.

Well, sir, that sterling old patriot became the candidate of a party that were prevented from exercising the right of suffrage in Kentucky; and in order to justify that outrage and the striking of his name from the polls by the ruthless hand of the military, this committee say he is disloyal. I have no doubt if an angel of the Lord had appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs and told them there had been military interference in the elections in Maryland and Kentucky, that it was seen and known by all who were present at the polls, the writer of the report of the committee would have asserted that the angel was disloyal. Every man—I do not care how elevated his position or upright his standing in society, or how devoted he may have been in the past or the present to the Union—who asserts that there was interference in the elections, the committee say is disloyal, or they impute some unworthy motive to him.

In the letter addressed to Governor Wickliffe, requesting him to become a candidate, occurs this sentence:

"The Government has no more right to disregard the constitutions and laws of the States than the States have to disregard the Constitution and laws of the United States."

This proposition I did not suppose any constitutional lawyer would doubt. That both the States and the Federal Government are sovereign in their sphere, has been uniformly held by constitutional lawyers and the courts. It certainly follows that the General Government has no right to encroach upon the reserved rights of the States, and the States have no right to exercise the powers delegated to the General Government. The erudite writer of the report from the Committee on Military Affairs says this is "the precise doctrine of the nullifiers of 1832, and the very essence of secession." It is neither nullification nor secession, but a sound constitutional principle. The committee ask, who are to judge between them? I answer, the courts.

The committee, in their report, most shamefully misrepresent the statements made in the address concerning the elections in Kentucky. The writer of the report claims to have carefully read the address. In speaking of the address the committee say:

"It narrates with an air of sorrow the fact that in August, 1862, Governor Magoffin, of Kentucky, resigned his executive trust for the purpose of relieving the people, and especially that portion of them known as southern rights men, who had been the peculiar objects of persecution."

It is not true that the address narrates the fact of the resignation with an air of sorrow. The address states the reasons which rendered the resignation of Governor Magoffin and the appointment of Governor Robinson desirable, and adds:

"These events gave rise to the most pleasing anticipations, which were strengthened by the first acts of the new regime."

Now, sir, in the report, W. A. Dudley, J. H. Harney, the editor of the Louisville Democrat, Judge W. F. Bullock, Judge J. F. Bullitt, Nat. Wolfe, R. R. White, and Dr. R. C. Palmer, strong Union men, who signed the address to the people and the Congress of the United States, are denounced as disloyal merely because they do not concur with the Committee on Military Affairs on this subject of the interference of the military in the elections in Kentucky. They knew that the military did interfere; they had the proof of that interference; many of them saw it; and as honest and brave men they dared to say it. They dared to arraign in proper language the usurpation of the military for their atrocious conduct in overthrowing the right of free speech and free suffrage; and to break the force of their declarations, the committee have nothing in reply but to impeach their loyalty. Why, sir, two or three of the gentlemen who signed that address were members of the Legislature for the last two years, and one of them at least cast his vote for the expatriation law of Kentucky to prevent rebels from voting. The signers of the address, upon which the committee make such an unfair, unjust, and unwarrantable assault, are the peers in every respect, socially, morally, and intellectually, of the Military Committee of the Senate; no assault coming from that committee can injure them or tarnish their reputation for patriotism, truth, honor, or veracity in any community where the parties are known.

The gentlemen whose names are signed to the address are all denounced, or at least it is intimated that they are disloyal and unworthy of confidence and trust. Sir, among those names are the names of the most unflinching Union men in America. They are for the old Union as it was with the Constitution as it is. They are not like some of the members of the committee who make this report, for the Union only upon the condition that slavery shall not exist in it.

Mr. President, let us look a little further. The committee in this report say that the evils complained of in the address of the gentlemen whom I have named in Kentucky are merely imaginary. I will read that part of the report:

"So far as the committee have been able to ascertain, the evil which the bill is intended to remedy is almost wholly imaginary; and the fact that there is so little real ground for complaint against the military, considering the scenes of excitement and disorder in which they have been compelled to interpose, speaks loudly in praise of their justice and forbearance, and is high evidence of the impropriety of passing the bill."

Sir, let me say that honorable committee were never more mistaken in their lives than when they promulgated the sentence just quoted. In the documents that were before the committee the proof is abundant that the military did interfere and that gross violations of law took place in the Kentucky and Maryland elections, as I shall presently show.

I will call the attention of the Senate for a few moments to the military orders in Kentucky. The orders that prevented a free election in Kentucky were issued by various post commanders and commanders of districts in different parts of the State. General Boyle, commanding in western Kentucky, on the 25th of July, 1863, issued an order concerning seizing and impressing private property for military purposes, in which he instructed his officers that when it became necessary to take private property for the use of the Army, those who were regarded as rebel sympathizers and who were opposed to a vigorous prosecution of the war, and furnishing men and money for that purpose, should be first taken, and vouchers should be given to them marked "loyal" or "disloyal." General Hartsuff issued a similar order in eastern Kentucky. It was said throughout the State by the party opposed to the Wickliffe ticket that their votes at the polls would be regarded as evidence as to whether they sympathized with the rebels or not. The fact of such orders being issued, and the general impression being spread in the community that those who voted the Wickliffe ticket would be regarded rebel sympathizers and their property taken for military purposes, prevented hundreds of men from voting.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the Senator refer to military orders?

Mr. POWELL. Yes, sir; to the military orders of General Boyle and General Hartsuff, the one commanding in eastern and the other in western Kentucky, which are made a part of this address.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator produce such an order?

Mr. POWELL. Yes, sir, I intend to produce it, and I intend to make it and all the military orders to which I refer a part of my speech. I shall produce every order to which I refer. Fortunately I have all that I desire to refer to in my possession. I will state furthermore that the committee had these orders, and all the orders to which I shall allude, in their possession when they made their report.

It was stated generally throughout the State, as every man in Kentucky at all acquainted with affairs there at that time knows, that these orders—

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the Senator will allow me one word, as it is necessary to a clear understanding of the facts that he states. I understand the Senator to say that some military man in Kentucky issued an order to this effect, that the way in which the elector voted would be the proper mode of determining whether he was a loyal or a disloyal man. It was that order which I asked him to produce, if he has such a one.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. HOWARD. Perhaps I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. POWELL. I did not say such an order had been issued.

Mr. HOWARD. I understood the Senator to say such an order was issued.

Mr. POWELL. My statement is that such orders were issued as I have referred to.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator will excuse me. I deny that there was any such order issued; and I put the Senator from Kentucky upon that issue to produce the evidence of the fact which he asserts.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator is denying something I did not assert. I have stated to the Senator that I did not say the order went to the extent that he understood. My statement was that orders were issued in the eastern and western departments of Kentucky saying that when necessary to take private property for the Army, it should be taken from those who were denominated "sympathizers with the rebellion," and that those were classed as rebel sympathizers who were opposed to the war, and to furnishing men and money to carry it on. I said, in addition to that, that it was said throughout the State that the poll-books would indicate who were rebel sympathizers; that all who voted for Wickliffe would be classed as rebel sympathizers. That is what I said.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Military Interference with Elections—Mr. Powell.

SENATE.

General Burnside, on the 31st of July, issued an order placing Kentucky under martial law, and among other things declaring:

"As it is not the intention of the commanding general to interfere with the proper expression of public opinion, all discretion in the conduct of the election will be, as usual, in the hands of the legally appointed judges at the polls, who will be held strictly responsible that no disloyal person be allowed to vote, and to this end the military power is ordered to give them its utmost support.

General Burnside issued that order, as he states in a preamble to it, to prevent the rebel troops interfering in the election. There was no necessity for that order. At the time it was issued there were not in Kentucky more than about a thousand rebel soldiers, and they were cavalry in one portion of the State in rapid retreat; and on the day of election there were no confederate soldiers in the State. General Burnside at that time had under his command, it is said, fifty thousand men in Kentucky; so that when he issued that order there was no necessity whatever for it. The phraseology of the order itself, except that clause of it which says that he will hold the judges responsible, is in about as mild language as it could be under the circumstances.

But the committee go on to say that General Burnside had the authority and the power, and it was necessary to make that order placing Kentucky under martial law. That I deny. I will not now discuss the question as to whether General Burnside had the power to declare martial law. It is well known to the Senate that I hold there is no power in the Government, in the President, or any of his commanders, to declare martial law; but if it did exist it should be confined to besieged cities and localities occupied by the Army. But certainly there is no power to declare martial law in the adhering States, when they are not occupied by the forces of the enemy.

It will be observed that the orders of General Boyle, General Hartsuff, General Shackleford, Colonel Foster, Lieutenant Colonel Johnson, General Asboth, and others, were issued before General Burnside's order placing the State under martial law; so the excuse made by the committee in their report that the State was under martial law cannot avail those officers.

General Burnside plainly and palpably violated the Constitution of his country when he issued that order interfering with elections. He says the purpose was to prevent the rebels interfering in elections in that State. Let me ask, did the Governor of Kentucky invite General Burnside to bring his forces there to protect the election? No, sir. The Legislature did not do it; the Governor, in the language of the day a loyal man, never invited him to do it. Governor Robinson had no apprehension about the freedom of election there from rebel sources. I will read the preamble to this order of General Burnside:

"Whereas the State of Kentucky is invaded by a rebel force with the avowed intention of overawing the judges of elections, of intimidating the loyal voters, keeping them from the polls, and forcing the election of disloyal candidates at the election on the 3d of August; and whereas the military power of the Government is the only force that can defeat this attempt, the State of Kentucky is hereby declared under martial law, and all military officers are commanded to aid the constituted authorities of the State in support of the laws and of the purity of suffrage as defined in the late proclamation of his Excellency Governor Robinson."

I intend to show, and that too from the proof that was before the Committee on Military Affairs, that the proclamation of General Burnside was not carried out as he made it; that his subordinates violated his proclamation and the proclamation of Governor Robinson which he made a part of it; and General Burnside, notwithstanding the fact was published throughout the whole State that his subordinates had violated his proclamation and the proclamation of the Governor, never censured or punished one of them for it, so far as I am advised.

Governor Robinson issued a proclamation on the 10th of July concerning the elections, and he attached to it a statute law of the State of Kentucky entitled "An act to amend chapter fifteen of the Revised Statutes, entitled 'Citizens, Expatriation, and Aliens.'" That act of the Legislature declared all persons who had been or were engaged in the rebel armies or who had held office under the provisional government of Kentucky, or had given the rebels aid, expatriated; and that they were not entitled to any privileges of a citizen of the State after the act took effect. It took effect on the 11th of April, 1862. It was passed on the 11th of March, 1862, to take effect thirty days after its passage. That is the law of Kentucky. There could be no excuse then that there was no law of Kentucky to prevent rebels from voting.

But, sir, was the proclamation of the Governor of the State, inviting the attention of the judges of the election to that law, and directing them to enforce all the laws of the State, enforced by the military authority? I answer that it was not. The Committee on Military Affairs say that it was. There is a plain issue of fact; and I invite the Senate to the consideration of the proof. I will read the statement in the very language of the Committee on Military Affairs, and then no injustice can be done them. The committee, on the 12th page of their report, say:

"It is enough to say that, notwithstanding the manifest party exaggerations and distortions of fact of this pamphlet, it does not allege that any loyal man who offered to vote for a loyal candidate was excluded or in any way molested by the military authorities. The orders of the subordinate commanders were, so far as they are embodied in the pamphlet, and so far as we have been able to ascertain, in strict accordance with General Burnside's order and the statute of the State, which we have cited; and the pamphlet admits that these orders 'were carried out with rare fidelity by those to whom their execution was intrusted.'"

The address signed by the gentlemen from Kentucky alluded to does not admit that the order of General Burnside was carried out with strict fidelity. The committee are mistaken in that. The quotation from the address refers, not to the order of General Burnside, but to the orders issued by his subordinates, as a reference to the address itself will clearly show. In the address they say:

"General Burnside enforces the proclamation for the purpose of preserving the purity of elections, and (while himself threatening the judges of election should they permit a disloyal vote to be cast) directs that the soldiers shall interfere no further than may be necessary to enable the judges to discharge their duties under the laws of Kentucky. His subordinates threaten the judges and voters with confiscation, arrest, and imprisonment, and actually publish their orders and carry out their threats without punishment from the general or remonstrance from the Governor."

That is the charge in the address. Further on they say:

"The military orders before referred to were carried out with rare fidelity by those to whom their execution was intrusted."

What military orders? The orders of those subordinates. It clearly refers to them, and it says they were carried out with rare fidelity. Many of these orders were in conflict with the order of General Burnside. The order of General Burnside cites the proclamation of the Governor, and says that the election must be carried on in obedience to the law as promulgated by the Governor. The Governor desired the election carried on under and by virtue of the laws of Kentucky, and in no other way whatever. What are the qualifications attached to voters by the law of Kentucky? Under the constitution of Kentucky, all white male persons twenty-one years old, who have had the necessary residence in their districts, and who have not been convicted of certain crimes, are qualified to vote. The law of expatriation declares that persons who do, or have done, certain things enumerated in it, shall be expatriated, be no longer citizens, and shall not enjoy any of the rights or privileges of citizens; and whenever any such person attempts to exercise any of the privileges of a citizen he may be required to negative on oath the expatriation provided in the act, and upon his failure or refusal to do so shall not be permitted to exercise any such right. What, then, is a voter to do under the law of Kentucky when he presents himself and demands to vote, if he should be challenged? He must swear that he has not been guilty of the offenses prescribed in the statute of March 11, 1862; that is, that he had not been engaged in the service of the provisional government of Kentucky; that he had not been in the rebel army, and that he had not given them aid or assistance since the 11th day of April, 1862, the day on which the expatriation law went into effect. While on the subject of the date of the passage of the expatriation act, I will remark that the committee are in error when they say that the proclamation of Governor Robinson "was plainly necessary in order to call the immediate and earnest attention of the judges of elections as well as the people to its important provisions, which had been in force but three months." The date of the passage of the act is correctly given in the address as March 11, 1862, and it went into effect thirty days after its passage. The act had, therefore, been in force over fifteen months before Governor Robinson issued his proclamation on the 10th of July, 1863, and not but three months as stated by the committee. It is correctly stated in the report of the committee that Governor Magoffin resigned in August, 1862, and that this law was passed over his veto. I cite this as a specimen of the reckless misrepresentation of facts by the writer of the report, in his efforts to strike down the character of honorable gentlemen, in order to sustain those in power for a most unlawful and unjustifiable assault upon free suffrage.

The proposition, then, is very clear as to who were legal voters under the law of Kentucky. General Burnside said that the law must be carried out, as proclaimed by the Governor. What did his subordinates do? What were the orders issued by his subordinates? Here is an extract from one of them, issued by Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Johnson, at Smithland, Kentucky, July 16, 1863:

"Judges and clerks so appointed are hereby directed not to place the name of any person on the poll-books who be voted for at said election who is not a Union man, or who may be opposed to furnishing men and money for a vigorous prosecution of the war."

There is appended to that order an oath which varies from the oath prescribed by the law of Kentucky. The constitution and laws of Kentucky do not require that a man shall be in favor of furnishing men and money for a vigorous prosecution of the war to qualify him to hold office. In that particular the order is in conflict with the law of Kentucky and of the proclamation of General Burnside and Governor Robinson.

Here is also the order issued by General Asboth and others, west of the Tennessee river, in which they carry it still further. General Asboth in his order declares that both candidates and voters shall swear that they are willing to furnish men and money for a vigorous prosecution of the war before they are allowed to vote or stand for office.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator inform me what pamphlet he is reading from? Is it the report of the committee?

Mr. POWELL. I am now commenting on the orders from the 17th to the 20th page of the address, which was before the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. What is the pamphlet?

Mr. POWELL. It is An Address to the People and Congress of the United States.

Mr. HOWARD. The same that was referred to the committee?

Mr. POWELL. It was before the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. I have not a copy before me, and hence I inquire.

Mr. POWELL. I am reading from the address on the Kentucky elections, which the committee had before them; for I do not intend in this connection to use any other evidence than that which was before the committee. I have other testimony, but I am now dealing with the report of the committee upon the evidence they had before them.

I have here the order of General Shackleford, issued at Russellville, Kentucky, and the order of Colonel Foster, issued at Henderson. I have also the orders issued by Generals Asboth and Hurlbut, west of the Tennessee river. On the back of the order of General Asboth is a statement signed by James S. Martin, colonel commanding post of Paducah, that he had the order executed in the counties of McCracken, Graves, Cullaway, and Marshall.

From the evidence I have presented, is it not clear that the committee were mistaken when they said it was asserted in this address that the order of General Burnside had been faithfully carried out? They say the very converse, and they give the evidence and establish it beyond the possibility of a doubt by the official orders of the parties who made them and executed them.

It is apparent from the facts set forth in this address, notwithstanding the committee say that no loyal man was prevented from voting for a loyal candidate, that such was not the case. I suppose they will try to avoid this palpable misrepresentation by saying in reply that Mr. Wickliffe and the other candidates on his ticket were not loyal. No such false and slanderous charge against Mr. Wickliffe and other Democratic candidates will relieve the committee from this reckless misrepresentation. The proof is abundant in this address that in many of the counties the name of the whole Democratic ticket was stricken from the poll-book by the military authorities. In many voting places and in entire counties of Kentucky no man was allowed to vote for that ticket. In the county in which I live the names on the Democratic ticket were stricken from or not allowed to go on the poll-books in three or four of the voting precincts. That fact is stated in the address. It is asserted that in one precinct of that county sixteen votes were cast, all for the Wickliffe ticket. The military then came there, took the poll-books from the judges and clerk, returned them to headquarters, and stopped the election; and yet the committee say no loyal man was prevented from voting for a loyal candidate! They establish to their own satisfaction, I suppose, that Governor Wickliffe and the men on the Democratic ticket were not loyal. They sit in judgment upon the loyalty of those men, and, for the unworthy purpose of sustaining, justifying, and excusing the President and the military authorities in the most flagrant, unconstitutional, unjustifiable, and atrocious assault upon the freedom of elections, they indulge in false and slanderous imputations and charges against the candidates of the Democratic party.

Military Interference with Elections—Mr. Powell.

Sir, there is abundant evidence of the facts that I have indicated. Since the beginning of time there never was a more atrocious assault on free elections than took place in many of the counties in Kentucky. In many places the candidates were arrested. In the first congressional district Judge Trimble, the candidate for Congress, as loyal a man and as true to the Constitution and Union of his fathers as lives in the Union, was arrested by military authority. He was brought to the city of Henderson, a town just without his district, and there he was kept in military confinement near a month, until after the election was over. They told him that if he would decline being a candidate for Congress, they would release him. He would not so degrade his manhood as to decline the canvass at the bidding of military tyrants and usurpers, and he was kept in prison. They found that he would be elected by a large majority notwithstanding his imprisonment, and then they sent the military over his district and had his name stricken from the polls in almost every voting precinct in the district. The gentleman who beat him got some four thousand votes in a district that polls about twenty thousand.

That is the way that a Union man was treated. Yes, sir, Judge Trimble, who has borne the name of a Union man all the time, who in the earliest conflicts in Kentucky was a Union man, was arrested, imprisoned for near a month, and turned out on the day after the election. With these facts before them, a committee of this Senate say that no loyal man was prevented voting for a loyal candidate!

Mr. ANDERSON, who now occupies the seat in Congress from the first district in Kentucky, frankly acknowledges that he was elected by the bayonets.

There was also arrested in that first congressional district of Kentucky Mr. Martin, a member of our last Legislature, and a Union man. He was a candidate for reelection in the counties of Lyon and Livingston. He was arrested and brought to the same city of Henderson, without the congressional district in which he lived, and he too was confined by the military until after the election; and then he and Judge Trimble were both released without any investigation whatever. The military told them that they would release them at any time if they would decline being candidates. Mr. Martin was beaten because the military would not allow him to be voted for. I suppose the committee regard Mr. Martin as disloyal. Mr. Martin, by occupation, was a steamboat pilot. He piloted the first gunboat bearing the flag of the United States that went up the Cumberland river during this rebellion. That is the way he exhibited his Unionism. He was elected as a Union man to our Legislature. He never was anything else; but, like Judge Trimble, he did not agree in the abolition notions of President Lincoln; and for that offense they were stricken down and arrested by military authority, and their names stricken by the military from the poll-books. And yet the committee say that no loyal man was prevented from voting for a loyal candidate!

Mr. Blount Hodge, a true Union man, was a candidate for the State Senate. He resides in Livingston county. The military issued orders preventing his name going on the poll-books. These facts were before the committee when their report was made.

Mr. President, I will not indulge in any further vindication of the honorable gentlemen of Kentucky who are assailed by the committee. At home they need no defense; but I will say here in a single sentence that every charge, every aspersion, every insinuation against the loyalty, the patriotism, and the Unionism of those citizens is untrue, and that the committee are utterly mistaken when they make such charges. Such was the terrorism that prevailed throughout the State in consequence of military orders that many persons were deterred from voting, fearing if they voted the Democratic ticket their property would be taken by the military authorities for the use of the Army. The military not only struck the names of candidates from the poll-books, but in many localities swore the voters themselves. Yes, sir, officers of the Army and those in command of the soldiers at the polls administered oaths to the voters. That evidently was in violation of General Burnside's orders. If the committee had examined the address they would see further that it is charged that persons who voted that ticket were pursued, arrested, and imprisoned. Such was the terrorism and interference by the military that Mr. Wickliffe, the Democratic candidate for Governor, in some six or seven of the strongest Democratic counties in the State, did not get a single vote, and in many other strong Democratic counties he received very few votes.

So much, sir, for the evidence contained in the address which was before the Committee on Military Affairs when they made this report. I have shown beyond the possibility of doubt from the evidence before that committee that they are utterly, wholly, and entirely mistaken in many of the matters stated as facts in their report. From the facts as we have them here in this address, if the committee adhere to the principle laid down in the beginning of their report which I have read they will vote for this bill.

But, Mr. President, fortunately for me and fortunately for the country, I have here the proof taken in a contested election in the second congressional district of Kentucky now pending before a committee of the House of Representatives, in which Colonel John H. McHenry contests the seat of Hon. GEORGE H. YEAMAN on the very ground that the election was not fair, but was interfered with by the military authority. The evidence in that case I know was not before the Committee on Military Affairs; but I will say that the evidence as given by witnesses of the highest respectability shows that interferences as great and greater than is set forth in the address which was before the Committee took place. It is proven that men, whom the witnesses testify were Union men and had always been Union men, were not permitted to vote for Colonel McHenry, who was a candidate for Congress.

Does anybody doubt the loyalty of Colonel McHenry? Sir, he has tested his loyalty on well-stricken fields. At Fort Donelson and at Shiloh he led his regiment into the thickest of the fight and bore aloft the banner of the Union. He received the commendations of all his superior officers. There was no colonel on that field of Shiloh that displayed more gallantry, bravery, or skill in the management of his regiment than Colonel McHenry. And yet, sir, Union men were prevented by the military from casting their votes for him; and I have the evidence before me taken in the contested election to which I have alluded.

I repeat, sir, the proof is here, and if any Senator now or hereafter shall doubt the truth of what I have said about these elections, I will read the testimony to the Senate.

Mr. President, let us look into this report so far as it concerns Maryland. Two thirds of the report of the committee is devoted to the election in Maryland. I wish briefly to review the report so far as the Maryland election is concerned.

The committee have labored in their report to make a vindication of the President of the United States, General Schenck, and others for their interference in the election in Maryland; and in order to do that they assault the Governor of that State. The Governor of Maryland in his late message to the Legislature recites the interference with the election in that State, and in an appendix to his message he produces a great deal of proof, all of which was before the committee. I will read a few extracts from the message of Governor Bradford. I am happy to say that several members of the committee told me they never saw the report and did not know what was in it. I wish I could say that much for all of them.

Mr. DAVIS. Maybe you can.

Mr. POWELL. I do not know whether I can or not. I should like to say that much for all of them. It is a report of which the committee and all honorable men should be heartily ashamed. The Governor says:

"A few days before that election, a military order was issued from the Army headquarters at Baltimore, which in effect placed the polls under the surveillance and at the command of the military authority.

"I was the less prepared for any such order, from the fact that though in frequent personal communication with the military authorities of the department, I had received no intimation whatever of such a proceeding or of any supposed necessity for it. In that part of the State against which the movement was to be more particularly directed (the Eastern Shore) there would seem to have been less necessity, as there certainly was less semblance of authority, than elsewhere; for while martial law had been proclaimed upon the Western Shore of the State in June last, and had not been repealed up to the day of election, upon the Eastern Shore it had never been proclaimed at all."

In the case of Kentucky, the committee justify the interference in the elections on the ground that General Burnside had declared martial law in that State. Martial law seems to have been declared by General Burnside for the purpose of giving his subordinates and their justifiers an excuse for their unlawful and outrageous conduct. As I have before shown, the orders of his subordinates were issued before he placed the State under martial law. On the Eastern Shore of Maryland, Governor Bradford tells you, there was no martial law declared. Therefore General Schenck, and those acting under his authority, for their doings on the Eastern Shore of Maryland cannot be shielded and protected by the panoply of martial law. The Governor goes on to say, after speaking of the President modifying the order:

"Prominent among the provost marshals to whom the execution of this order was in part committed, were several who were themselves candidates for important offices.

"These marshals, appointed for the purpose of the militia enrollment and draft, were placed by the law creating them under the control of the Provost Marshal General, but, to insure the right to employ them about this election order, special authority was obtained from Washington to place them for the time being under the orders of the military authorities."

Here we find that these provost marshals, many of whom were candidates for office, were among the actors in this scene of interfering with the elections in Maryland.

"I, therefore, on the Monday evening preceding the election, issued a proclamation giving them this assurance, a copy of which is herewith submitted."

Saying that they must carry out the election in accordance with the law.

"Before the following morning military orders were sent to the Eastern Shore directing its circulation to be suppressed, the public papers were forbidden to publish it, and an embargo laid on all the steamers in port trading with that part of the State, lest they might carry it."

Here we find General Schenck suppressing as far as he could the circulation of the proclamation of the Governor to the people of the State. We find him laying an embargo on boats and the regular business of the State, for fear they might carry this proclamation to the people for whom it was intended. What was the reason for this interference? Governor Bradford in his message and in his proclamation says there was no necessity whatever for it. I do not suppose the loyalty of Governor Bradford was ever doubted until in an evil hour he fell into the hands of the Committee of the Senate on Military Affairs; and then, in order to shield the guilty culprits who had overthrown the constitution and laws of Maryland in one of the most vital parts, they attempt to strike down and blast the reputation of a loyal Governor of an adhering State. To what base uses will not the adherents of power lend themselves! There stands the message saying that these interferences have taken place, and in order to shield the guilty culprits the reputation of Governor Bradford has to be destroyed; he is charged with usurpation; his loyalty is questioned, his patriotism doubted; and he is gently admonished that he ought to be an inmate of a prison. The committee say, "the Governor bitterly complains of the suppression of his proclamation, instead of gratefully acknowledging the moderation which arrested its circulation instead of its author." Why these charges of usurpation; why these threats of imprisonment? Is it to seal the lips of those who dare speak of the usurpations and crimes of the party in power? A faithful Governor of an adhering State makes an effort to see that the laws of his State are faithfully executed, and he is denounced as a usurper and gently reminded of imprisonment.

Did Governor Bradford invite General Schenck, or the President of the United States, or any other military authority, to bring soldiers there for the purpose of preventing domestic violence in Maryland? No, sir; he says he did not. The clause of the Constitution that I have heretofore read and commented on declares that the United States authorities shall only interfere when the Legislature or the Executive of the State demand it to prevent invasion or domestic violence. Were there any rebel troops in Maryland? The imbecile Burnside, the jailer of Vallandigham, had the excuse of about one thousand rebel soldiers, who were rapidly running out of Kentucky, while he had about fifty thousand men under his control to fight them. He had that impotent and lame excuse for placing Kentucky under martial law. But, sir, I have not yet heard that there were any rebel soldiers in Maryland; and yet, in violation of the Constitution of the United States, we find that soldiers were sent to the polls to interfere in the elections in that State; and they did interfere, notwithstanding the Committee on Military Affairs cannot find it out, although they had all the testimony before them that is appended to the message of Governor Bradford. The Governor goes on to say:

"How far it accomplished the purpose claimed for it, or how far my anticipations of the consequences of the order and the abuses to which it would lead were realized, will appear by a brief reference to some of the transactions connected with its execution. These abuses commenced even before the opening of the polls. On the day preceding the election, the officer in command of the regiment which had been distributed among the counties of the Eastern Shore, and who had himself landed in Kent county, commenced his operations by arresting and sending across the bay some ten or more of the most estimable and distinguished of its citizens, including several of the most steadfast and uncompromising loyalists of the shore. The jail of the county was entered, the jailer seized, imprisoned, and afterwards sent to Baltimore, and prisoners confined therein under indictment were set at liberty. The commanding officer referred to gave the first clue to the character of the disloyalty against which he considered himself as particularly commissioned, by printing and publishing a proclamation in which, referring to the election to take place next day, he invited all the truly loyal to avail themselves of that opportunity and establish their loyalty 'by giving a full and ardent support to the whole Government ticket upon the platform adopted by the Union League convention,' declaring that 'none other is recognized by the Federal authorities as loyal or worthy of the support of any one who desires the peace and restoration of the Union.'"

There you see this lieutenant colonel issues his proclamation in which he invites the people to come up and establish their loyalty by giving a full and ardent support to the whole Government ticket, upon the platform adopted by the Union League convention, declaring that none other is recognized by the Federal authorities as loyal or worthy of the support of any one; and yet the Committee on Military Affairs assert that there was no interference! The Governor further says:

"Major General Dix, when in command of this department, at the time of the election in 1861, and when, too, rebellion was backed by its organized supporters in our very midst, took the true and statesmanlike view of the policy proper for such an occasion when, in directing his provost marshal, he said that while there was no difficulty in controlling Maryland by force, that this was not what was wanted, but that he wished to control it by the power of opinion, and that to satisfy the country that the people were on our side, we must leave them to an unbiased expression of their wishes. They were left to that unbiased expression, and such was its character that I had supposed no one would still require evidence of their loyalty."

"General Dix was even appealed to by some of the judges of election to authorize an oath to voters of doubtful loyalty, and although it appears from the tenor of his reply that the oath suggested was nothing more than an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, he refused to order it, saying to them, among other things, 'The Constitution and laws of Maryland provide for the exercise of the elective franchise by regulations with which I have no right to interfere.'"

General Dix spoke wisely. President Lincoln, however, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, did not so regard it. He did interfere with this very matter, and without being requested by Governor Bradford to do so. So far from requesting the President, as the Constitution authorized him to do when he desired the force of the United States to protect the State against invasion or domestic violence, he complained of the military being sent there. The President did not have the sanction of Governor Bradford, but did it against his protest, for he asked the President to repeal the order, and he did modify the order of General Schenck in one or two particulars, but really made it very little better than it was, and his modifications were disregarded in many localities in the State.

Sir, we find the President himself meddling in this matter of elections. He, as well as his chosen instrument, General Schenck, and all the other instrumentalities in the military service throughout that State, was in the exercise of the harshest usurpations against the loyal people of that State. Governor Bradford, in his message and proclamation, tells you that there were no candidates on the Eastern Shore but Union men, so far as he was advised; that throughout all Maryland there were not rebels or rebel sympathizers enough to affect the elections, except, perhaps, in one district, and that was not the district of which complaint was made. Why, sir, John W. Crisfield, known to many Senators here, an able and honored member of the last House of Representatives, was a candidate for reelection, known always as a Union man. He it was whom the soldiers of the Army of the United States, with the direct knowledge of the President of the United States, prevented receiving a reelection. I do not think there is a doubt about the reelection of Mr. Crisfield in the district on the Eastern Shore had the military not interfered.

In this Maryland case you cannot throw off the responsibility upon Schenck, nor upon Colonel Tevis, or other subordinates. You have the President most directly implicated. Here he is upon the record, violating the Constitution of his country by interfering with elections in States in order to return menials and miserable creatures to Congress who would do his bidding; and I arraign him for this offense before the Senate of the United States and the American people. I brush away the trash and come right to the Commander-in-Chief himself, and charge him, upon the most indubitable testimony, with trampling under foot the most inestimable right of free suffrage and free election, and, in order to effect his object, committing a palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States, which he has sworn to support.

There, sir, these documents place the President, and there is no power that can ever rescue him from that position. I regret that it is so. I regret that I have to state in my place as a Senator that the Executive, whom a grateful people have elevated to power and charged to take care that the laws are faithfully executed, has exhibited such infidelity to his oath and made such vital stabs on the Constitution of his country and on the free suffrage of the people; but truth compels me to make the charge. Here are the proofs ample to sustain it. Here are the President's own letters and orders. Out of his own mouth we condemn him. He cannot plead as an excuse that the Governor of Maryland desired it, for the Governor protested against it and appealed to him to relieve the State from that disgrace. He refused to do it. He cannot get off on the ground that Governor Bradford is disloyal. Oh, no; not at all. The Governor's truth, patriotism, and loyalty are above suspicion in the minds of all patriotic and honest men, notwithstanding the assault of the writer of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs.

But the learned Committee on Military Affairs try to weaken the force of the statements of Governor Bradford and of the honorable Senator from Maryland by saying that they were elected under similar circumstances. Suppose they were, sir; it only shows the greater necessity for the passage of the bill that I propose. If forty Governors were elected under similar circumstances that fact would afford forty additional reasons why this bill should pass. If military force was used to elect Governor Bradford, and to place the honorable Senator from Maryland in his seat here, that is no reason why others should be elected by such unlawful and outrageous influences. Two wrongs never made a right.

The report goes on to say:

"It is not true that 'the military, aided by the provost marshals, were to arrest voters whom they might consider disloyal approaching or hanging about the polls.'"

That was certainly in General Schenck's original order. The President, however, modified that part of it. The modification, as I have before stated, was disregarded.

"It is not true that 'a prescribed form of oath was furnished, without taking which no one if challenged could vote.'"

Now I think anybody who will read the order of General Schenck and read that oath must think the committee mistaken in making the assertion. General Schenck, after his first order and the proclamation of Governor Bradford were issued, plainly indicated in an address to the loyal people of Maryland dated November 3, 1863, that those who were challenged could not vote except by taking the oath. The indication is clear that they could not do it otherwise; and the military were sent, they say, to enforce that order, to compel the oath and to protect the judges! Is that what they did? I will show you presently that it was not. Speaking of the Governor's proclamation, the report says:

"That proclamation was much more liable to the charge of illegality than the order of which it complained."

The committee charge that the proclamation of Governor Bradford was illegal, more so than General Schenck's order. There can be no doubt about the illegality of General Schenck's order. The committee are even divested, so far as the Eastern Shore is concerned, of the excuse that there was martial law there. They are divested of another excuse that they might have, that Governor Bradford asked the interposition of the Federal Army to protect the State against invasion or domestic violence, for he not only did not ask it, as the Constitution required, (the Legislature not being in session,) before it could be lawfully furnished, but he protested against it. The Governor had the right to issue his proclamation. The learned and crudite committee say:

"The law of Maryland charges the Governor with no authority over elections, and vests him with no right to instruct the judges of election in the law of their duty."

It was left to the Military Committee of this honorable Senate, a learned committee, to be sure, to make the discovery that the Governor of Maryland had no constitutional authority to issue a proclamation concerning elections! They say the laws do not charge him with it. Why, sir, I see in the constitution of Maryland, which I have before me, that it is written in the tenth section of the second article that the Governor "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." And yet, because he advised the judges to execute the law—for that is all the Governor did—the honorable Committee on Military Affairs call him a usurper. They say he had no lawful right to do it.

Consistency is said to be something of a virtue, and the Senate will be astonished when I tell them that this committee commend Governor Robinson for issuing his proclamation in Kentucky, and setting forth the law of expatriation from Kentucky, and urging upon the judges of elections the strict observance of all the laws of the State regulating elections, and they censure soundly the gentlemen in Kentucky who issued the address from which I have read, because they took some exception to Governor Robinson's proclamation. The committee think the proclamation of Governor Robinson at that time was highly commendable and proper, and then they say that Governor Bradford had no lawful authority to issue his proclamation! To what miserable quibbles and inconsistencies those who defend tyrants and usurpers are driven!

The gentlemen who signed the address that was before the committee censured the Governor of Kentucky because he had not cited and published all the laws of Kentucky concerning elections, but only published one. But the Governor of Maryland in his proclamation does tell the judges to execute all the laws, and the committee think that is a usurpation. When the committee think they can make an assault on the gentlemen who wrote this address, they eulogize Governor Robinson and censure the gentlemen who signed the Kentucky address; but when they come to Maryland, in order to destroy a witness against Abraham Lincoln, Schenck and others, they charge Governor Bradford with doing things without any warrant of law. I suppose there is not a Senator here who does not know that every Governor is charged to see that the laws of the Commonwealth over which he presides are faithfully executed. The election laws are a part of the laws of the State. But that is not all. The committee say of Governor Bradford:

"This proclamation was, therefore, a palpable usurpation."

Sir, the Military Committee of the Senate pronounce a proclamation of the Governor calling the attention of the judges of election to the laws of that State and urging them to see the laws executed, and to see that the elections were absolutely free, a usurpation. Governor Bradford did it in obedience to the constitution of his State, and if he had not done it under the circumstances he would have been delinquent and fallen far short of the discharge of his duties as a wise, virtuous, and patriotic Governor. If that is a usurpation, allow me to ask the honorable Committee on Military Affairs what would they call the act of President Lincoln and General Schenck and his subordinates? They issued orders concerning elections in Maryland. They were not authorized by any constitution or any law to do it. They did it in palpable, direct violation of the Constitution of the United States, because the Governor of Maryland had not invited their interposition. They prescribed oaths to be taken unknown to the constitution and the laws of Maryland, thus prescribing the qualifications of voters to the extent at least of excluding all who would not take an oath unknown to their laws. And then, sir, we find this sentence in this most learned report:

"The execution of the order was as fair and upright as the order itself was legal and its purpose honest."

I understand the committee to assert that the order was constitutional and legal, and that its execution was fair and upright. A more palpable usurpation never existed than the issuing of the order. I have shown, and shown it, too, from the Constitution of the United States, that it was in violation of that sacred instrument. They had no plea of martial law. From the message of the Governor of Maryland we learn there was no plea of necessity, that plea which tyrants always urge. But they say the execution of the order was fair and upright. Now, Mr. President, the Committee on Military Affairs had before them the message of the Governor of Maryland, with the documents appended. They comment on them, they quote them, they refer to them; so, then, they cannot say that the evidence was not before them. About one third of the report is devoted to combating this message and the evidence accompanying it. Now let us see what the evidence is they had before them. I have given you the statement of the Governor. He says the provost marshals were many of them candidates, and that men were prevented from voting by the military. Now look at the evidence, and see how far the committee are correct in their statement that the order was carried out in a fair and upright manner. I will read to the Senate the order referred to by his Excellency Governor Bradford, made by one of the military officers on the Eastern Shore:

HEADQUARTERS THIRD MARYLAND CAVALRY,
CHESTERTOWN, November 3, 1863.

Whereas the President of the United States, in reply to a letter addressed to him by Hon. Thomas Swann, of Baltimore city, has stated that all loyal qualified voters should have a right to vote, it therefore becomes every truly loyal citizen to avail himself of the present opportunity offered to place himself honorably upon the record or poll-book at the approaching election, by giving a full and ardent support to the whole Government ticket, upon the platform adopted by the Union League convention. None other is recognized by the Federal authorities as loyal or worthy of the support of any one who desires the peace and restoration of this Union.

CHARLES CARROLL TEVIS,
Lieutenant Colonel Commanding.

What must be thought of an officer who issues an order declaring in substance that none would be regarded as true and loyal Union men unless they voted the ticket placed upon the platform of the Loyal League? I do not know precisely what these Loyal Leagues are, but I understand they are some kind of secret, oath-bound political society. That, then, is the platform that this officer tells you is the only one that the Government recognizes. That of itself would be enough to prevent a fair and upright election. There is abundant proof accompanying the Governor's message that loyal men were prevented from voting by the soldiers. The proof is that men offered to vote the Crisfield ticket, and that they were prevented and driven off by force by the soldiers, and that afterwards the yellow or Creswell ticket, the ticket of the loyal leaguers, was placed in their hands, and they were forced to vote it. I will read a sentence or two from the Governor's message and documents. It says:

"Mr. Davis came to vote, and Henderson said 'You can't vote.' He asked Davis 'Will you take the oath?' He said 'Yes'; and as we were about to administer the oath prescribed in General Schenck's order No. 53, which had been a test for Crisfield voters, Mr. Henderson ordered Sergeant Tontit to arrest Davis and take him in custody, and thus Davis left the poll without voting. Another man came up with a Crisfield ticket in his hand and offered to vote, and Henderson said to us, 'If you take that man's ticket I will take the ballot-box from you'; and thus he did not vote. A man named John Pruth came to vote, but was challenged by some one and refused to take the oath, was turned down, but after a while came with a Creswell ticket, and Henderson ordered us to take his ticket."

That is the statement of one of the election judges.

At this point the honorable Senator gave way to a motion to adjourn.

FRIDAY, March 4, 1864.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned yesterday evening I was commenting upon this clause in the report of the committee:

"The execution of the order was as fair and upright as the order itself was legal and its purpose honest."

I was endeavoring to show by the testimony before the committee that they were mistaken in thinking the order was fairly executed. I will read from the report of the committee another enunciation on this subject, and then I shall proceed to show that they were entirely mistaken in their assertions. On the 28th page of the report I find the following, referring to the election in the first congressional district in Maryland:

"There does not appear to your committee the least reason to believe that a single person was hindered from voting by the military in the first congressional district who had not been engaged in the rebel service or in aiding and abetting them, nor that the judges excluded any voter who proved his citizenship by confessing its obligations under oath."

The Committee on Military Affairs had before them the message of the Governor of Maryland and the documents appended to it concerning the election in that State; and from those documents, from the proofs before the committee, I will establish beyond doubt that the committee are in error in both the statements in the report that I have read. I have here a statement signed by ten gentlemen, who I am informed are gentlemen of the highest respectability, living on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, addressed to Governor Bradford, from which I will read an extract:

"Throughout the day special pains were taken to put obstacles in the way of those voting the conservative Union ticket, such as challenging them, making them take the oath, and this even in the case of old gray-headed Union men, while notorious sympathizers with the rebellion were permitted to vote unchallenged, provided they voted the emancipation ticket. One case which created some excitement at the time deserves particular notice. A man who has been always regarded as a sympathizer with the South went up to vote with an unconditional Union ticket in his hand, and was challenged by a Union man. The person desiring to vote then declared that he would not take the oath, and that if he had to take the oath he would not vote. And yet, with the military order in full force, whenever the independent Union ticket was presented, this man was permitted to vote! And more than this, the Union citizen who challenged the above party was threatened with arrest by a candidate on the emancipation ticket for merely carrying out the military order which this candidate and his friends were so strenuously upholding. One of the judges of election declared that the fact of a voter having an unconditional Union ticket in his hand was an evidence of his loyalty; and in the case above cited, as your Excellency will notice, this decision was fully carried out. These are but a part, a small part, of the events of the day. In other districts not only were persons refused permission to take the oath and vote, but the part of the order which was modified by the President was fully carried out as it was promulgated. Voters were driven away and told if they returned they would be arrested. A part of the cavalry regiment, in some districts, were permitted to vote, although not residents of the county or the shore, because they were soldiers!"

That evidence was before the committee when they made the report. In the memorial of the defeated candidates in Kent county, on the 69th page of the message and accompanying documents, I find the following:

"In one other of the districts the polls were not opened until nearly twelve o'clock, in direct violation of the laws of the State, when many of the voters of the district had returned to their homes. At the polls of four of the districts of the county a military officer was stationed near the judges of election, and challenged and rejected voters in many instances without referring to the judges, whose right and duty it was to decide upon the legality of such votes. The result of such unprecedented proceedings was that the voters of the county were impressed with the conviction that the election was entirely under the control of the military power of the United States, and that they would not be permitted to vote unless the caprice of the officers in command should sanction it, or they would vote for the candidates indicated by the order of Colonel Tevis."

On the 69th page of the message and accompanying documents I find the following statement by Thomas Sudler, one of the judges of election in Somerset county:

"I was one of the first at the voting place; I found the judges of election and certain soldiers; the polls were not then open. I saw the judges reading a paper, which I ascertained was the 'Order No. 53' issued by General Schenck. I then displayed the proclamation of the Governor of Maryland, which had reached me by express the night previous. The officers in charge of the soldiers asked me to read it, which I did. The sergeant—the officer mentioned above—then said: 'I have orders to enforce General Schenck's order No. 53.' I inquired further of the sergeant concerning his order; the sergeant replied that before he left the camp at Princess Anne, and before the proclamation had been received by the captain of the whole body of troops in the camp, he received orders to enforce the Order No. 53."

That was General Schenck's order—

"to challenge every voter, to examine all tickets offered, to administer the oath contained in Order No. 53, and to decline to allow any ticket but the yellow or Creswell ticket to be polled."

"There were very few voters at the polls; the mass of the people were deterred from coming out by fear of the soldiers, who were reported to have received orders to arrest all who voted for Mr. Crisfield."

I will now read from the statement of Cyrus L. Jones, on the 72d page:

"In response to a question I asked him, the sergeant pulled out of his pocket a yellow or Creswell ticket, and said, 'This is the only ticket that shall be voted to-day.' I then mentioned that I had received the proclamation of Governor Bradford, which had that very morning reached me by express, and called his attention to it. The sergeant said he 'had nothing to do with the Governor's proclamation'; that his orders 'were above that'; and added that the orders of the provost marshal had to be obeyed that day. I said, 'If the oath is to be administered to all who come, you will have to do it. Our orders are to allow every one twenty-one years old to vote.' I called the attention of my brother judges, saying, 'There will be a hereafter to this.' The sergeant then guarded the window through which the ballots were handed in to be put in the ballot-box with soldiers, took his place at the window, and rejected all who would not vote the yellow or Creswell ticket. He did not permit a single ticket of any other description to be polled, although I saw two men make several attempts, at different times during the day, to vote a ticket with Mr. Crisfield's name on it, and many other men were intimidated from offering to vote."

I will now read an extract from the statement of Mr. J. H. Tarr, dated Salisbury, November 12, 1863:

"When I approached the window to deposit my ballot, it being on white paper, and also knowing I was favorable to the election of Hon. J. W. Crisfield for Congress, L. D. Collier, deputy provost marshal, challenged my vote. I inquired upon what ground; he answered I was a copperhead, and no damned copperhead should vote that day. He referred me to General Schenck's order. I produced your able and ever to be respected proclamation, and read it aloud to the judges, one of whom was a candidate for judge of the orphan's court. His reply was, 'Damn the proclamation.' I then requested him to define loyalty, stating at the same time I would affirm to the condition of the oath as prescribed—this was refused, and I was ordered away from the polls. I left without voting."

38TH CONG.... 1ST SESS.

Military Interference with Elections—Mr. Powell.

SENATE.

Mr. Tarr goes on further to state:

"From the first outbreak to the present moment I have been for the Union, and am still for the Union. I voted for you, and have never regretted it."

This is addressed to Governor Bradford:

"I stand where I have always stood, for 'Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws,' with no sympathy for the rebellion."

That man, although he affirmed he was willing to take the oath, and says that he is a Union man with no sympathy for the rebellion, was refused his vote under the orders of this deputy provost marshal.

Mr. HOWARD. I rise to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky what book he is reading from?

Mr. POWELL. I am reading from a pamphlet entitled "Message of Governor Bradford to the General Assembly of Maryland, with documents, &c." The extracts I am now reading are from the documents accompanying the message. Here is an extract from a letter by Charles Cole to Governor Bradford, inclosing a certificate from Lewis F. Wachter:

"Inclosed is a certificate from Lewis F. Wachter, a highly respectable farmer of Frederick election district, showing how he was treated on election day, and compelled to vote against his sentiments. I saw that man pushed from the voting place and kicked at as he was descending the steps leading into the court-house, where the polls were held, and after he had retired a short distance I saw the same soldier who kicked at him seize him by the arm, thrust an 'Unconditional ticket' into his hand, and, with the assistance of another soldier, compel him to return and vote the ticket which had been placed in his hand."

And yet, with all these facts before them, the honorable Committee on Military Affairs in their report say that the election was fair, and that no Union man who would take the oath was prevented from voting. This Mr. Wachter in his certificate says:

"I hereby certify that I offered to vote the conservative Union ticket at the north polls, in the city of Frederick, on Wednesday, the 4th day of November, 1863, and that a soldier objected to my voting on the ground of disloyalty; that my ticket was taken from my hand at the same time by a soldier, and that I left the polls and had not proceeded further than thirty or forty feet before a soldier, whose name I am informed is Marcellus Shaffner, came up to me and said, 'Here, you will be entitled to a vote; now come and vote'; at the same time putting an Unconditional ticket into my hand, and seizing me by one of my arms, and another soldier by the other, I was forced again back to the polls through fear of personal violence, and compelled to vote against my sentiments."

Mr. President, how the committee could have put the statements I have heretofore read in their report with this evidence before them, is a matter most astonishing to me. The writer of the report reviews the message of Governor Bradford and the evidence accompanying it, reviews it elaborately, and after that review makes the statements I have quoted from the report. The motive that actuated the writer of the report to make the statements alluded to I leave the Senate to determine.

Mr. President, it is clear from the statements I have read that there was a most unwarrantable and unjustifiable interference with the election in the State of Maryland. The judges were prevented from executing the laws. In many cases they were imprisoned. Loyal men were forced from the polls when they attempted to vote the Crisfield ticket, and afterwards forced back to the polls and compelled to vote the Creswell ticket. In some places the Crisfield ticket was not allowed to be voted. Disloyal men, or men whose loyalty at least was suspected, were allowed to vote the yellow or Creswell ticket. Even when they were challenged, the soldiers would not permit them to be sworn; and in one case they threatened to take the ballot-box if the vote was not taken. Upon what ground the committee can base the assertion in their report that this election was conducted fairly, and that no person who was a loyal citizen and would take the oath was prevented from voting, I am wholly unable to comprehend.

Sir, we might well inquire why it was that at that particular juncture of Maryland affairs the military should be scattered all over that region of country? Were there any rebel soldiers there? Was the State of Maryland invaded? No, sir; they had no such excuse as General Burnside claimed for declaring martial law in Kentucky. Why was it done? The object is clear and manifest. Those soldiers were sent there for the purpose of carrying the elections in favor of the Administration. I read some time ago, and I regret that I have not got it before me now, an extract taken from the Boston Commonwealth, a leading Administration party paper, in which it complained somewhat of the conduct of the soldiery in the border State elections, and called them "irregularities," but said the Administration had been so negligent in allowing the Democrats to elect so many members of Congress in the previous elections that they were compelled to interfere in the border States in order to maintain a majority in the other end of this Capitol; and upon that ground they excused it. That was the reason the iron hand of the military was laid upon the people of the border States, to compel them to send members of Congress to this Capitol who were opposed to the sentiments of the people. It was done by the Administration for the purpose of having a majority in their favor in the other House.

But, sir, did anybody then, or does anybody now, pretend to say that the people of Maryland were not loyal? I will read to you what their Governor says on that subject. The writer of the report, in order to bolster up the President, General Schenck, and others in authority, assaults and attempts to destroy the reputation of Governor Bradford and everybody who testifies in reference to these violations of the law in those States. The destruction of the reputations of those who know and have spoken of these disgraceful and wicked usurpations is the only means by which they can escape from that damning infamy which must in all time accompany them. What does Governor Bradford say in regard to the loyalty of the people of Maryland?

"It is a well-known fact, that with perhaps one single exception, there is not a congressional candidate in this State whose loyalty is questionable, and in not a county in the State outside of the same congressional district is there, I believe, a candidate for the Legislature or any State office whose loyalty is not equally undoubted."

He says further:

"For more than two years past there never has been a time when, if every traitor and every treasonable sympathizer in the State had voted, they could have controlled, whoever might have been their candidates, in a single department of the State, or jeopardized the success of the General Government. No State in the Union has been or is now actuated by more heartfelt and unwavering loyalty than Maryland—a loyalty intensified and purified by the ordeal through which it has passed."

That is what the Governor says in his proclamation. General Schenck, in a paper that he issued in reply to this proclamation of the Governor's, indorses the loyalty of the people of Maryland, in this language:

"Governor Bradford himself cannot appreciate more highly than I do, the sterling loyalty of the great majority of the people of Maryland."

General Schenck himself says that a great majority of the people of Maryland are loyal. Where, then, was the necessity for this military foray upon them upon the day of election? It can only be accounted for by the reason that I have stated: the Administration did it for the purpose of preventing a free election in Maryland, and in order to send to the other end of this Capitol and elect as officers of that State government, men who were willing to do the bidding of the Executive. It was for that, and for nothing else, that it was done. There never was a greater outrage on any people on earth than was committed on the loyal people of Maryland in their last election.

I read yesterday the law of the free commonwealth of Athens on this subject. The Athenians were so watchful and so jealous of the right of free suffrage that a stranger who interfered in the assemblies of the people was regarded as a traitor, and was punished by their laws with death. Had President Lincoln and General Schenck lived in the time of the free commonwealth of Athens, and interfered with the assemblies of the people as they did with the right of free suffrage in Maryland, they would have been executed as traitors and felons, and would have justly deserved their fate. Yes, sir, in that free commonwealth, under their laws, had such an interference taken place as has been proved incontrovertibly by the evidence I have read to have taken place in Maryland, he who did it would have been punished with death as a traitor; and yet we find the Senate, through one of its committees, reporting against the passage of a bill visiting a much milder punishment than death upon those who interfere to prevent free elections, and that, too, upon the ground, as they state in their report, that the elections have been fair! They say there is no ground for the complaint that anybody entitled to vote was prevented from voting, or that there was any interference in the election, when the facts stand out so prominently that none can deny or dispute but that the interference was most atrocious, flagrant, and outrageous.

General Schenck commenced his operations to crush out freedom of elections, and to prevent political organization against the Administration before he issued his order No. 53, dated October 28, 1863. From the public journals I see that early in the fall of 1863 the Democrats of Talbot county, on the Eastern Shore, held a convention and nominated candidates for local offices of their county, clerk, sheriff, &c. The officers of the convention, and some of the parties named as candidates, gentlemen of the highest character and respectability, were arrested and required to report at headquarters in Baltimore, where General Schenck required them to take the following oath, which is cut from the Easton Gazette, Maryland:

"RELEASED FROM ARREST.—The Easton (Maryland) Gazette states that the parties recently arrested in that town while attending a political convention have been released after subscribing to the following:

"We, the subscribers, do hereby pledge ourselves and obligate by this written agreement that we will not, during the present rebellion against the Government and authority of the United States, organize or assist in the organization of any party inimical or opposed to the Administration of said Government; that we will not nominate, assist in the nomination, nor vote for any candidate or candidates for office of district, county, State, or General Government who are in sympathy with the so-called confederate States government, or opposed to the vigorous prosecution of the war now waged for the complete suppression of the existing rebellion. All this we promise and pledge without any mental reservation whatever, with a full purpose to keep and observe the same."

General Schenck required these gentlemen to swear that they would not during the present rebellion organize or assist in the organization of any party inimical or opposed to the Administration. Was there ever a more outrageous assault upon the rights of the citizen? General Schenck's object seems to have been to crush out all political opposition to his chief, Abraham Lincoln.

I honor the profession of arms; it is a noble profession. The brave soldier who fights the battles of his country, who draws his sword in defense of the honor, constitution, and laws of his country, and in defense of the liberties of the people, is justly entitled to and will receive our confidence, admiration, and warmest gratitude—all honor to such noble warriors! But he who holds position in the army of his country and uses his power to overthrow the constitution and laws of his country, to strike down the liberties of the people, to prevent free ballot and to build up the fortunes of a political party, as has been done in Maryland, will receive the scorn and contempt of all good, wise, and patriotic men.

The committee in their report treat briefly of the elections in the State of Delaware. I will not enter at any great length into a discussion as to the mode of conducting the election in Delaware. I have here a report of a committee of the Legislature of that State in which they examine fully into that whole question. The sworn proof is in the volume I now hold in my hand. It is proved incontrovertibly that the elections in Delaware in 1862 were carried to a great degree by the interference of the military. Governor Cannon—the Governor whom the Committee on Military Affairs laud in their report because in a proclamation to the people of that State he enjoins all good citizens and civil officers of that State to obey the military order General Schenck had issued concerning elections in Delaware, and they contrast his conduct with that of the Governor of Maryland—Mr. Cannon, it appears from the report and evidence, was elected Governor of Delaware in consequence of military interference. It is very clearly shown in the report of the committee of the Legislature of Delaware that the military did interfere, and that they did it at the instance of Mr. Cannon, who was then a candidate for Governor, and other candidates for high positions. It is also proved in the report that at what they call the "little election" in Delaware, which occurs about a month before the general election, the Democrats indicated a strength that would carry the State by a large vote, and the Republican leaders had the military brought in to prevent their defeat at the general election. It is proven by some of these provost marshals, and the provost marshals were in chief command, it seems, in Delaware, that they did not think there was any necessity for the military being there to preserve order. A singular fact in connection with these Delaware elections is, that these provost marshals were commissioned by the Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton, on the very eve of the election. The commissions were received the day before the election and were sent to Delaware in blank, and were there filled up by the party leaders of the Republican party.

It is further shown that great interferences took place in the election there. It is further proven that the then Governor of Delaware did not ask the intervention of the military to prevent domestic disorder and violence; but that he was opposed to their coming. The testimony of the ex-Governor is embodied in the report. It is proved very clearly by the testimony of ex-Governor Ross, that General Wool, a major general in the Army of the United States, came to the State of Delaware with a body of troops on the eve of the election. General Wool, in an interview which Governor Ross had with him, told him the election should be fair. After the polls were opened, discovering that these provost marshals and their adherents were preventing the Democrats from casting their votes, and interfering with the election, Governor Ross went to General Wool and told him he promised them a fair election, and the provost marshals were conducting it far otherwise than fairly. General Wool told him—and it is in the testimony of Governor Ross, sworn to in this book—that for the time being he had no control; that he was really under the command of the provost marshals, and declined to interpose in order to prevent interference at the polls.

Thus it will be seen that Mr. Stanton, the Secretary of War, was engaged in this business of interfering in elections. He sent blank commissions of provost marshals to his party friends to be filled up to suit their purposes. Sir, they must have been very menial tools of power to consent to act as provost marshals to do this dirty work of preventing honest and loyal men from casting their votes. It seems it was all trusted to the members of the Republican party who were managing for the time and controlling the election. You will find that the President put his own hand to the work in Maryland, aided by General Schenck; General Burnside of infamous memory controls it in Kentucky; and Edwin M. Stanton, the Secretary of War, perpetrates a similar outrage in Delaware.

I discovered from the reading of the testimony that instructions accompanied the commissions of these provost marshals; and I introduced a resolution into the Senate asking the Secretary of War to send us the orders and the instructions, if any had been given, to those provost marshals. That has been some three weeks ago. A few days ago I had a second resolution sent to the Secretary of War on the subject; and he stands in contempt of the Senate and does not send us those instructions and orders to his provost marshals, or tell us whether he ever sent any or not; and yet one of his provost marshals swears that instructions did accompany his commission, and he exhibited his commission from Mr. Stanton as Secretary of War.

So far as the Missouri elections are concerned, it is unnecessary for me to say much. I must do the military commander of Missouri the justice to say that of all the orders that have been issued on the subject in the States, his are by far the best; and yet there are one or two things in his orders that are very objectionable. I repeat, however, that it is unnecessary for me to say much in regard to the Missouri elections. I have before me and I have examined the testimony taken in three contested seats in the other end of this Capitol from that State, and I can say without fear of contradiction there never were greater outrages committed on the elective franchise than by the military in Missouri. Why, sir, they arrested and imprisoned men for attempting to vote, they tore up the poll-books, they drove legal voters from the election poll, and almost every outrage you could imagine they committed. Upon that subject we have sworn testimony, and that testimony is undergoing investigation in the other end of this Capitol; and I find by the journals of yesterday morning that the Committee of Elections in the House have determined to send back all those cases to the people upon the sole ground that the military interfered with the freedom of the elections. It is a pregnant fact, and one that I hope the Senate will consider on the passage of this bill. When we find such evidence and such action upon the evidence as has taken place in the other House, I do not think the Senate ought for a moment to hesitate to pass this bill, on the ground that there has been no interference with elections.

But, Mr. President, had there been no such interference it would still be wise and proper to pass this bill. We should not wait for crime to be committed before we pass laws denouncing penalties against it; but as wise lawgivers we should make the law to prevent as well as punish crime. The fact that the law was on the statute-book would deter those who contemplated such offenses. If such offenses should be committed as are set forth in this bill, none will say that the offenders ought not to be severely punished. The evidence is full and abundant that there has been the most outrageous interference by the military in four of the States of this Union in the elections.

The writer of the report from the Military Committee claims power to do all these things under the law of necessity, military necessity, and it is under that plea that these persons are justified. I have heard that plea, Mr. President, ever since these encroachments upon the Constitution and the laws of the country have been going on. They speak of the nation struggling for its life. Well, sir, I confess, and I do it regretfully, too, that the nation is struggling for its life. I regard the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof as the life of the country, and that is seriously endangered, for we find the President and those he controls, who should protect and defend the Constitution, invading it at almost every point. I do not think that the life of the nation is in any more danger from the rebels—though God knows that danger is great enough—than it is from domestic traitors at home who are charged with the preservation of the Constitution, and yet are killing it.

The writer of the report seems to assume that the Executive has a right to govern every other department of the Government, and control the institutions of all the States, and that he is to be appealed to for the protection of the people. Is it not most humiliating, sir, that the people in a country governed by constitutions and laws should be driven to appeal to any one man for protection? Montesquieu, in his book upon the Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire, makes a remark on this subject which I will read to the Senate. Speaking of the senate's entreating Pompey to undertake the defense of the republic, he says:

"If that name might be properly given to a government which implored protection from one of its citizens."

The doctrine of those gentlemen who desire to clothe the Executive with this supreme power, with this absolute power, with this more than dictatorial power, places this great Republic in that humiliating attitude. I do not think that a citizen in a country governed by law was ever driven to the necessity of appealing to one man for protection. Sir, the citizen who for the time being fills the chief executive office is bound to see that the laws are faithfully executed: that is his duty. There is no liberty save in the supremacy of the law. In all free Governments the citizen appeals to the law for protection.

Mr. President, all usurpers and all tyrants that have gone before us, those who have overthrown the liberties of every people who have lost their liberties, claim their powers under this plea of necessity. Caesar, when he led his army from Gaul, crossed the Rubicon, and overthrew the liberties of his country, did it upon the plea of necessity, and tyrants the world over have done the same thing. The President seems to me to follow in the footsteps of Caesar, Pompey, and Cromwell. The Chief Magistrate, I regret to say, seems to copy all the faults, while he has exhibited none of the virtues of those distinguished men.

Now, sir, allow me to read to you what the same writer says about the action of these two distinguished men in Rome—how it was they sapped the foundations of the liberties of the people. Speaking of Pompey, Montesquieu says:

"He employed the vilest of the populace to incommode the magistrates in the exercise of their functions, in hopes that wise people, growing weary of living in a state of anarchy, would be urged by despair to create him dictator."

Do we not find the same thing going on here? Are not the President and his military officers interfering with the civil magistrates? There can be no doubt about it.

Speaking of Caesar, the same author says:

"He raised troubles in the city by his emissaries; he made himself master of all elections; and consuls, prætors, and tribunes purchased their promotions at their own price."

"He made himself master of all elections." That is what is being done here. How was it with Oliver Cromwell? The Protector appointed twelve major generals to take charge of the twelve districts into which he divided the British empire, and they went forth armed with all power; they decimated the people; they taxed them at their discretion, and exacted enormous tribute from them, and in that way the people were held in subservience to the military authority. The Protector dissolved one Parliament and carried on his Government by a Council of State. After a while, believing that such had been the glory of his administration in its foreign wars, and such was the subserviency of the people created by the action of his twelve major generals, that he could have a Parliament elected that would be subservient to his will, he ordered an election. The election was held, and how was it conducted? I will read an extract from Mr. Hume on that subject:

"Cromwell began to hope that, by his administration, attended with so much luster and success abroad, so much order and tranquility at home, he had now acquired such authority as would enable him to meet the representatives of the nation, and would assure him of their dutiful compliance with his Government. He summoned a Parliament; but not trusting altogether to the good-will of the people, he used every art which his new model of representation allowed him to employ, in order to influence the elections and fill the House with his own creatures. Ireland, being entirely in the hands of the army, chose few but such officers as were most acceptable to him. Scotland showed a like compliance; and as the nobility and gentry of that kingdom regarded their attendance on English Parliaments as an ignominious badge of slavery, it was on that account more easy for the officers to prevail in the elections. Notwithstanding all these precautions, the Protector still found that the majority would not be favorable to him. He set guards, therefore, on the door, who permitted none to enter but such as produced a warrant from his Council; and the Council rejected about a hundred, who either refused a recognition of the Protector's Government, or were on other accounts obnoxious to him. These protested against so egregious a violence, subversive of all liberty; but every application for redress was neglected, both by the Council and the Parliament."

"The majority of the Parliament, by means of these arts and violences, were now at last either friendly to the Protector, or resolved, by their compliance, to adjust, if possible, this military Government to their laws and liberties."

Mr. President, from the authorities I have read it seems that we are following in the footsteps of nations whose liberties have been overthrown and trampled down beneath the iron heel of military despotism. It is said that history but repeats itself, and it seems to me in view of all the lights in the past which we have before us, that this once great and glorious country of ours is about to be destroyed and its liberties overthrown by the same means that have destroyed all the free Governments that have gone before us. It is a fact that we should well ponder and consider, that it is by military power that free nations heretofore have lost their liberties. It is our duty, if it is possible to do so by wise laws, to see to it that the hopes of the world in regard to the glory, prosperity, and perpetuity of this Republic shall not be wrecked on the same rock.

I said a moment ago that if we are to have liberty we must be governed by law; that liberty can only exist in the supremacy of the law. On that point Mr. Locke says:

"Where law ends, tyranny begins. If the law be transgressed to another's harm, him whomsoever in authority exceeds the power given him by the law and makes use of the force he has under his command to compass that upon the subject which the law allows not, ceases in that to be a magistrate, and acting without authority may be opposed as any other man who invades the rights of another."

That is a wise maxim laid down by Mr. Locke; but if I had uttered it a year or two ago my loyalty ality perhaps would have been very much questioned. The President of the United States, however, utters the same sentiment in his inaugural address, for in that address he declares:

"If by the mere force of numbers a majority should deprive a minority of any clearly written constitutional right, it might in a moral point of view justify revolution; certainly would if the lost right were a vital one."

The last part of the extract I read from Mr. Locke is in substance the same. He says if the lawful rights of the people are overthrown by their magistrates, they have a right to resist. Mr. Lincoln says the violation of the Constitution in a vital point would justify revolution; and allow me to tell you, Senators, that one reason why the people have submitted so quietly, so uncomplainingly, to the many usurpations of the Executive is that they hoped in a short time to have the privilege of relieving themselves of the President by means of free suffrage; but if you allow the military to prevent free elections you not only stab the Republic in its very vitals, but you will by that means cause many persons who think that these usurpations of power ought to be resisted only at the ballot-box to look about for other means to redress their grievances. If you do not wish blood to flow in this land, if you wish to preserve our institutions, allow the people the privilege of turning out every four years their President if they desire to do so. Give them free speech, free press, free suffrage. Allow me to tell you that these three things are the greatest conservative elements in this country. The people will bear patiently great wrongs from wicked and corrupt officials, provided free speech, free press, and free suffrage are left them. By these lawful agencies they can in a short time turn unworthy and corrupt officials from their high places. A wise and prudent people prefer the use of these constitutional and peaceful agencies to force to rid themselves of unworthy public servants. In the various phases of political parties that have existed heretofore in this country, the Executive has been sometimes denounced for usurpation, and we have had no revolutions. And why? Because the people knew that they had the power in their hands, if a majority were of their opinion, in a short time to clothe other magistrates with power. But, sir, for the first time in the history of the Republic we find that the Federal military have taken charge of elections. It is a matter that the Senate should gravely consider and prevent, if they possibly can do so, by placing upon the statute-book salutary and wise laws to prevent the recurrence of the evil. Senators, if you allow the President to exercise this power, if that magistrate should be a corrupt or an ambitious or a depraved man, do you not know that he will use it for the purpose of perpetuating his power, and reflecting himself? There is no Senator in this Chamber but must know that what I say is true. Why not, then, pass the bill without hesitation, and do your duty at least to prevent it?

I regret to say that I am very thoroughly satisfied that the President is using the military in this way, and tampering with elections for the purpose of perpetuating his power. Nothing will convince me to the contrary but such action on the part of the Executive as will clearly indicate that he is not using the military arm of the Government for that purpose. His amnesty proclamation is a move in that direction; and at this point I will, for a few moments, advert to that proclamation, dated the 8th December last, accompanying the President's last message. I regard the proclamation as unwise, inexpedient, unconstitutional, and revolutionary. I do not know that I have ever seen a more revolutionary document than this proclamation. It is revolutionary because it overthrows the Constitution, overthrows the laws, and by it the Executive assumes powers that are not conferred upon him by the Constitution. In a word, he sets up his own will as the law; he becomes for the time being a despot; his will governs instead of the Constitution and the written laws of the country. The President, in his proclamation, not only prescribes the qualifications of voters, but the qualifications of officers. What right has the President of the United States, whence does he derive the power, to say who shall be a qualified elector in the State of Arkansas, or who shall be qualified to hold office in that State?

Take his proclamation and his letter to General Steele, and you will see that the President assumes all these powers. He undertakes to prescribe the qualification of voters, and of the persons who shall hold office in that State. I read yesterday and commented upon the clause of the Constitution that declares who are qualified electors. I suppose no Senator will contend that the President of the United States, by virtue of his office, has the right to alter or to amend the constitutions of the States of this Union, or the right to say who shall be a qualified voter for the State offices in any State, or who shall be qualified to hold State offices; and yet the President assumes the power to do all these things in his amnesty proclamation and in his letter to General Steele touching elections in the State of Arkansas. I will read from that letter on this matter:

"The constitution and laws of the State, as before the rebellion, are in full force, except that the constitution is so modified as to declare that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude except in the punishment of crime."

By what authority does the President of the United States assume to amend the constitution of the State of Arkansas? I had thought that that right was conferred alone upon the sovereign people of that State. I have always supposed that under our form of Government the people, and the people alone, were clothed with the sovereign power to make constitutions and to alter or amend them. And yet we find that the President of the United States undertakes to exercise that power. It is a power as despotic and as absolute as that exercised by William of Normandy in England after the battle of Hastings. Is there a Senator here who will dare rise in his place and say that the President has the power to alter or amend the constitution of any State of the Union? The President assumes it in his letter to General Steele, and he undertakes in the amnesty proclamation to prescribe the qualification of voters, for he says that all who choose to come in and take that oath may exercise the right of citizens. In his letter to General Steele he requires that when the officers are elected they shall appear at General Steele's headquarters at Little Rock and take that oath. Of course that is prescribing the qualification of the officers as well as of the electors.

That is not all, Mr. President, that is being done in this direction. We find that the same thing, to some extent, is being done in Tennessee; Governor Johnson's proclamation, although very objectionable, is free from many of the objections that are contained in the others. General Banks is commanding in Louisiana, and he issues orders regulating elections, regulating labor, and establishing a kind of semi-peonage among the negroes, and in his order he uses this remarkable language:

"Opinion is free and candidates are numerous. Open hostilities cannot be permitted. Indifference will be treated as a crime and faction as treason."

Was there ever so atrocious a sentiment as that? Here is a major general of the Army of the United States who speaks of candidates being numerous and opinions free, and yet he says, in the very next two lines, that he will treat indifference as a crime; in plain Saxon, that the man who does not vote will be a criminal and will be punished with an iron hand. What kind of freedom of opinion is that? Yet, sir, we find one of the President's creatures, one of his military subordinates, whom he has put over one of the military departments, uttering that unconstitutional and atrocious sentiment.

You see, sir, that the military are swallowing up all the other powers of the Government, both State and national; and it seems that those who attempt to pass laws to arrest it meet with very little favor from the Committee on Military Affairs. I hope we shall fare better in the Senate. The proclamation of the President is unjust to loyal men. That proclamation will not allow any person to exercise the functions of citizenship in one of those States unless he shall take the oath prescribed. Then, and only then, is he a qualified voter. Only then is he qualified to hold office. And who are allowed to avail themselves of the benefits of this amnesty? Any person, a citizen of one of those States, can avail himself of it unless he falls within the excepted classes; and those are, officers in the army of high grade, such as have left the Congress of the United States, &c. It is unnecessary for me to enumerate them all. The exception applies to those who have held civil office and those who have held high military command, &c. All others who come in and take this oath are clothed by the grace of the President's pardoning power with the qualifications of suffrage, and they are permitted to hold office.

I say it is unjust to loyal men. There are many stanch, loyal Union men in those States, men who never have had sympathy with the rebellion. The President, in his first message, said that in all those States, except South Carolina, he believed a majority were loyal to the old Union. The President requires all these persons to take this oath. If a man had been in the army of the confederate States, and had slaughtered a hundred Union soldiers, he is a qualified elector on coming and taking this oath; but a man who had ever been a Union man but who could not conscientiously take the oath is excluded. I hold that the oath is of such a character that a conscientious, honest man would not take it; and moreover I think it very unjust to require of a man who is and has ever been devoted to the institutions of his country, and who has been in no wise engaged in this rebellion, to submit to the humiliating condition prescribed for those the President regards as pardoned felons.

The oath requires a man to swear that he will support the Constitution of the United States. I suppose with all Union men there would be no difficulty about that part of the oath, for they have been supporting it all the time. But it further requires them to support the negro policy of the President and his proclamations on that subject. I, for one, firmly believe that the President's emancipation proclamation is unconstitutional. I think he had no power to issue it or to proclaim the freedom of negroes in the States; and I have no doubt that a large majority of the Union men in that country concur with me in opinion. Yet, sir, you see he requires them to take that oath, which an honest loyal man cannot take, if he believed his proclamation to be in violation of the Constitution, when he swears to support the Constitution. He cannot in the same oath swear to support proclamations which deprive him of his property, and which he thinks are in conflict with the Constitution.

The oath requires a man not only to swear to support the proclamations that have been issued, but to swear to support those that may be issued in the future. It applies as well to the future as to the past or the present. What honest man would swear that he would support all other proclamations the President might make on the subject of negroes or negro slavery, even provided he approved the proclamations already issued? The President, in the plenitude of his power, might issue a proclamation that only negroes should vote and that only negroes should hold office; and yet he would swear a man in advance to support it. I tell you, sir, an honest, conscientious man cannot take this oath. This proclamation and the oath elevates the negro above the white man. I will read one clause of it on that subject. Speaking of those who are excluded from the benefit of the proclamation, the President says:

"And all who have engaged in any way in treating colored and white persons in charge of such otherwise than lawfully as prisoners of war, and which persons may have been found in the United States service as soldiers, seamen, or in any other capacity."

He excludes from this amnesty a soldier in the rebel army, if he has treated a negro soldier, seaman, or white persons in charge of such, otherwise than as a prisoner of war; but he does not exclude those engaged in the confederate army who have treated white soldiers and white seamen or their commanders otherwise than as prisoners of war. If one of those rebel soldiers lays his hand on a negro, and does not treat him as a prisoner of war, he cannot be pardoned; but he may take white soldiers and seamen prisoner and execute them in cold blood after they have surrendered; he may treat them with the utmost cruelty and with the most savage barbarity, and that man can come up and avail himself of the amnesty in President Lincoln's proclamation. If he touches the saintly person of a negro in that way there is no chance for him to avail himself of the President's amnesty.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Military Interference with Elections—Mr. Powell.

SENATE.

I believe that this is a Government of white men. I believe it was made by white men and for the benefit of white men; and I still believe that a white man is better than a negro. I think every such discrimination in favor of the negro against the people of our own race is most atrocious, and wholly unjustifiable.

There is another thing in this amnesty proclamation upon which I will say a word: and that is the one-tenth principle. When one tenth of the population, that is, one tenth of those who voted at the last presidential election, shall come forward and take the oath, they shall be enough to govern, says the President. That destroys every principle of republican Government. It is a principle that I suppose none will deny in a republican and democratic Government, that majorities shall rule; but here the President says one tenth may rule. He overthrows the great principle upon which all republican and democratic Governments rest, and he says one tenth, and that one tenth may be, and I have no doubt will be, composed of the most despicable people of that country; for it is that kind who are willing to come in, after they have been engaged in the rebel army, if they get a little tired and swear out of it. I have not much opinion of those men who swear into one army one day and into another the next. They are not the kind of men who should be permitted to govern any people.

The loyal men there who believe the President's negro policy is unconstitutional cannot avail themselves of the amnesty. It is such only as will come up and submit themselves to that humiliating degradation; brave and upright men are not going to humiliate themselves by taking such a degrading oath. One tenth of that kind of men are to govern. They are to govern the nine tenths. How will they govern them? He promises them that protection which is provided for by the Constitution, which declares "the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of Government." I suppose the President intends to keep charge of the governments of these States in all time by a standing army to enable this one tenth to govern the nine tenths. Sir, you cannot cause one tenth of any free white people on this continent to govern nine tenths, unless you make the nine tenths absolute slaves. You must stand by with your bayonets fixed and coerce nine tenths into absolute unconditional obedience before one tenth can govern them. The government the President proposes to guaranty to these States is not a republican government within the meaning of the Constitution, and it is a gross abuse of language so to call it.

Many honorable Senators on the other side of the Chamber, and the school of politicians to which the President belongs, have made a great deal of clamor about the three-fifths slave representation provided for in the Constitution. Carry out this one tenth principle in Arkansas, the one tenth who will avail themselves of the amnesty of the President, by taking that most humiliating of oaths, will have it in their power to elect all the members of Congress to which Arkansas would be entitled upon the enumeration of her population at the last census; and do you not think that one man down there will have as much power as ten men in Minnesota or Michigan? Certainly so; and that is the policy of the President whose party has been clamorous upon the negro representation of three fifths provided in the Constitution for the slave States.

Sir, I do not care upon what ground you place the question; the President is not clothed with the power that he has exercised. There are two theories among the Republicans on this question. Some say these States are dead, out of the Union, have committed suicide; others say they are still States in the Union. Well, if they are States in the Union, what power has the President of the United States to alter or amend their constitutions, or to fix the qualification of voters in the States, or the qualification of State officers? He has none. Nobody will contend that the President of the United States, by virtue of his office, has any power or any right to alter or amend the constitution of any State in the Union. If Arkansas is a State in the Union the President has no power to alter its constitution, which he has assumed to do. If it is not a State of the Union, but is a Territory that has been acquired by conquest, purchase, or otherwise, then I ask what authority has the President to admit it as a State into the Union, or to make a constitution for it? Is it not plainly written in the Constitution that Congress may admit new States? Congress, and Congress alone, has the power to form governments for the Territories of the United States. If he holds, then, this to be a Territory, he exercises a power conferred by the Constitution on Congress. So take it in any way you please, and the President is exercising power absolutely forbidden by the Constitution.

I regard the amnesty proclamation as a most unfortunate one. I believe it will put off and delay a cessation of hostilities, and perhaps a reconstruction of the Union, for a long time to come. I admit that the President is clothed with the pardoning power; but when he undertook to issue an amnesty proclamation he should have made that proclamation ample, full, complete; he should have restored these people to all their rights of person and property under the Constitution; he should have told all those who came back and rallied under the old flag that they should enjoy all the rights and all the protection that the Constitution secures to a citizen of the United States. By such a proclamation the President would have weakened the rebel cause. I believe that if such a proclamation were now issued Arkansas and many of the border States of the confederacy would soon return to the Union.

As it is, you place upon them the most humiliating conditions, conditions that a brave and honest people who love liberty never, never will submit to. Why, sir, is there a Senator here who would, for the purpose of being permitted to exercise the right of citizenship in a democratic and republican Government, take an oath that he would be bound to support all the proclamations that the Executive should issue on any one given subject? No, sir. The whole scheme of the President is impracticable. The object, in my judgment, is not to bring those States back into the Union in good faith, but to establish a kind of rotten-borough system, to have votes to help to reflect him President. We may as well speak plainly as we are speaking on the subject. I believe the expedition sent down to Florida was for the purpose of inaugurating the same system there; and that foolish and disastrous expedition results about this way: a loss of fifteen hundred of the soldiers of the United States in an effort to get three electoral votes.

I stated a moment ago that the Executive was swallowing up every other department of the Government. I am not going to consume the time of the Senate by reciting at any great length the usurpations of the Administration. The President and the party in power have violated the Constitution in almost every vital part. The Constitution confers on Congress the power to raise and support armies, and to provide and to maintain a Navy. The President has added to the regular Army twenty thousand men without warrant of law. He has added eighteen thousand seamen to the Navy without the authority of law. The Constitution has been violated by taking money from the Treasury without authority of law.

"The freedom of speech has been violated by the arrest and imprisonment of a number of persons, charged with no crime, and whose only offense was the utterance of sentiments distasteful to the men in power.

"The freedom of the press has been subverted by the suppression of a number of newspapers.

"The right to security from arrest when no crime is charged has been disregarded in the arrest and incarceration of a large number of persons, denounced by the parasites of the Administration as 'sympathizers with the rebellion.'

"The right to security from unlawful searches and seizures has been violated in numerous instances, in which domiciles have been visited, and papers, &c., seized without legal authority.

"The right of a trial by jury has been refused in the cases of citizens arrested and imprisoned, or banished by military orders of courts-martial.

"The freedom of every citizen has been taken from him by the illegal and unnecessary suspension of the right to demand the writ of habeas corpus.

"The right of property has been abrogated by the emancipation proclamation and the confiscation act.

"The inviolability of contracts has been destroyed by the act which makes depreciated Treasury notes a legal tender for all debts.

"The freedom of religious worship has been violated on repeated occasions by the interference of military officers.

"The right of States to the management of their militia has been taken from them by the conscription act, which places the whole military power of the country at the disposal of the President.

"The formation of the State of West Virginia was a violation of the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution.

"The heretofore undisputed right of the people to elect their legislators and rulers has been taken from them, and the will of majorities disregarded, as is abundantly manifested in the manner in which elections have recently been carried by the grossest corruption, by military orders, in the border States of the South."

Nearly all the violations of the Constitution that I have enumerated have been by the Executive Department of the Government. It seems to me that the Executive, aided by the military power, has swallowed up the powers of this Government, both State and national, almost as completely as did the rod of Aaron swallow up the rods of the magicians.

We are all subject at any day to arrest and imprisonment without warrant, without trial, without a hearing. We find the President, through his Secretaries and military commanders, exercising that power. I regard the presidential office as a unit, and that all those Secretaries act by virtue of his authority. They are but his chief clerks, as Mr. Randolph used to call them, and the present Secretary of State, in one of his dispatches to some Government in Europe, says it is all the action of the President, whether done by one of the Departments or another. That is certainly the true theory of the Government. Citizens of the highest position and respectability have been arrested without warrant and thrown into prison, where they have languished, some of them, as long as seventeen months without accusation or trial. These officials go on as if they would enjoy power forever. This is an exercise of power that would have caused a dictator of Rome to be punished. Cicero, during his consulship, when he was engaged in putting down the conspiracy of Catiline, being clothed with dictatorial power by the Roman senate, put to death five Roman citizens, and that, too, with the advice and consent of the senate. For overthrowing that conspiracy no man ever was more lauded, and for that he was called parens patrie; but after that struggle was over, Cicero, who had been so eulogized by all Rome, was indicted, tried, convicted, and banished because he had put a Roman citizen to death without trial. Yet, sir, with a written Constitution that absolutely forbids it, when there is no authority in our Government to confer dictatorial power upon the President, he imprisons at will thousands of our citizens without charge, without trial. Sir, the President and his satraps had better beware. A brave people will not stand these things all ways. A day of reckoning will come, and an awful day it will be to those guilty men who have overthrown and trodden under foot the Constitution and laws of their country, and unlawfully deprived the people of their dearest rights.

It is pleasant when we see that a gleam of light has broken in upon persons from whom we expected little good. I hold in my hand an extract from a speech of the most distinguished radical in America—a man of learning, a man of eloquence, indeed of rare elocution. I had thought that his whole soul was fully absorbed in this negro question, and that he could not talk without bringing it in. I mean Wendell Phillips. But while I think him a fanatic of the deepest dye, he differs from others of his party; he sometimes has lucid intervals. Allow me to read an extract from a speech of that eloquent man on this very point:

"But let me remind you of another tendency of the time. You know, for instance, that the writ of habeas corpus, by which Government is bound to render a reason to the judiciary before it lays its hands upon a citizen, has been called the high-water mark of English liberty. The present Napoleon, in his treatise on the English Constitution, calls it the germ of English institutions. Lieber says that that, with free meetings like this, and a free press, are the three elements which distinguish liberty from despotism, and all that Saxon blood has gained in the battles and toils of two hundred years are these three things. Now, to-day, every one of these—habeas corpus, the right of free meeting, and free press, is annihilated in every square mile of the Republic. We live to-day, every one of us, under martial law or mob law. The Secretary of State puts into his battle, with a warrant as irresponsible as that of Louis, any man whom he pleases; and you know that neither press nor lips may venture to arraign the Government without being silenced. "We are dealing with rapid strides—you say, inevitable; I don't deny it, necessarily; I don't question it; we are tending to that strong Government which frightened Jefferson; toward that unlimited debt, that endless army. We have already those alien and sedition laws which, in 1798, wrecked the Federal party and summoned the Democratic into existence. For the first time on the continent we have passports, which even Louis Bonaparte pronounced useless and odious. For the first time in our history, Government spies frequent our great cities."

"That, sir, is a very graphic and truly eloquent picture of the times in which we are, and I hope the country will take warning. We seem to have yielded everything to the military power, and I regret to say with a tameness and submission which, in my judgment, are unbecoming members of an American Congress. A military republic we have, and we have a republic but in name—the animating principle, the security of the citizen in life, liberty, and property, is gone. Allow me to call attention to an extract on that subject from one of the speeches of the great Webster, who spoke upon that, as he did upon most other subjects, with the most profound wisdom. This is from his speech delivered on the completion of the Bunker Hill monument:

"A military republic, a Government founded on mock elections, and supported only by the sword, is a movement indeed, but a retrograde and disastrous movement from the regular and old-fashioned monarchical system. If men would enjoy the blessings of republican Government they must govern themselves by reason, by mutual counsel and consultation, by a sense and feeling of general interest, and by the acquiescence of the minority in the will of the majority, properly expressed; and above all, the military must be kept, according to the language of our Bill of Rights, in strict subordination to the civil authority. Whenever this lesson is not both learned and practiced, there can be no political freedom. Absurd, preposterous is it, a scold and a satire on free forms of constitutional liberty, for forms of Government to be prescribed by military leaders, and the right of suffrage to be exercised at the point of the sword."

Sir, we are in those very times; we have seen the right of suffrage exercised at the point of the sword. There never was a time, it does not exist now, and has not existed since this unfortunate civil war commenced, in which it was necessary for the President to overthrow the Constitution and elevate the military above the civil power. There is power enough in the Constitution to furnish the President every dollar and every man needed for this war. Congress can give him the sword and the purse. What more can you confer? Nothing. Where, then, the necessity and the excuse for these wanton violations of the Constitution, this reckless overthrow of the liberties of the people, this setting at naught the laws and the constitutions of the States, this regulating of elections by the sword? None. None. The genius of our Government is founded upon the principle that the military shall be kept in strict subordination to the civil power. But the friends of the President claim it as a matter of necessity to save the life of the nation, when they must see that the President is trampling under his feet the Constitution, and crushing out the liberties of the people, and destroying every vital principle that gives value to free Government.

But, sir, we have had other great chieftains before. There was a man who lived in this Republic that I suppose was thought by all wise and good men to be almost as great as Abraham Lincoln is thought to be by his cringing, truckling, and obsequious followers; that man was George Washington. He led our armies through a seven-years' war in most trying times, when the organization of the civil authority was very defective. It had none of the force, none of the power that we have now under our well and admirably adjusted Constitution; when there was great difficulty in procuring men for the Army and money to defray the necessary expenses of the Government. Many of the States failing to furnish their quotas of men and money, there being no central controlling power, Congress had no means of enforcing its decrees upon the States. Surrounded by such embarrassments, Washington for seven years led the armies of the colonies until the war was brought to a successful and glorious close. Did Washington, during that long and arduous struggle in which the colonies were engaged, ever think it necessary to subordinate the civil to the military authority? No, sir; no. In 1783, when he resigned his commission at Annapolis, he was addressed by Thomas Mifflin, President of the Continental Congress, as follows:

"You have conducted the great military contest with wisdom and fortitude, invariably regarding the rights of the civil power through all disasters and dangers."

This I regard as the highest and most deserved compliment that was ever bestowed upon mortal man.

Sir, I would that this vacillating, dissembling, weak, and I fear wicked and corrupt, man in the White House had been infused with the wisdom, virtue, and patriotism that animated the soul and prompted the actions of the great Washington in our revolutionary struggle. Washington and his compatriots were engaged in a struggle for civil liberty; the sword was used only to resist the encroachment of tyrants, and was subordinated to the civil power. The resistance was successful. They then laid broad, deep, and strong the foundation of civil and religious liberty. They proclaimed the Constitution as the fundamental law, and threw it as a strong and impenetrable shield around the rights of the States and the liberties of the people. The Executive is now using the sword which should only be directed against the armed enemies of the Republic for the sacrilegious purpose of suppressing free speech, free press, and free suffrage, and the overthrow of the Constitution, the rights of the States, and the liberties of the people of the adhering States.

Amid the startling assumptions of the military power we find that one member of the Cabinet has recently woke up on this subject. The polite and venerable Attorney General, Mr. Bates, is seized with dread apprehension because the military power is interfering with the civil authority. I congratulate the country that the first law officer of the Government has at last sounded the alarm on this momentous question. I will read a part of the letter of the honorable Attorney General on this subject; and I do it with profound satisfaction.

It seems that the military authority arrested a Judge Knapp at Santa Fe, in the Territory of New Mexico, and imprisoned him and otherwise interrupted him in the discharge of his duties. He wrote a letter, and a very manly one it was, protesting against the interference of the military to the Attorney General. The Attorney General took the matter under consideration and conferred with his Excellency the President; and thereupon he wrote this note to Judge Knapp:

"Your letter of the 4th of August complaining of military arrests was slow in reaching me, and then such was the urgent and continued occupation of the President in the great affairs of the Government that I have not been able until now to fix his attention on the particular outrage on you, as your letter makes me believe it to be.

"There seems to be a general and a growing disposition of the military, wherever stationed, to encroach all power, and to treat the civil Government with contempt, as if the object were to bring it into contempt.

"I have delivered my opinion very plainly to the President, and I have reason to hope that he, in the main, concurs with me in believing that those arbitrary proceedings ought to be suppressed."

I am delighted that even the Attorney General has been aroused on this subject, and I should have been further delighted if he had announced that the President concurred with him in opinion; but instead of that he says he hopes he does in the main concur.

Now, sir, what have we seen for the last two years? We have seen the military authority overthrowing the civil rights of citizens in every part of the country. We have seen citizens, neither engaged in the military nor naval service of the United States, seized and tried before drum-head courts-martial and punished, and some of them banished from their country. We have seen the military arrest judges who were faithful, loyal, and true men; for instance, Judge Duff, in the State of Illinois, when presiding in his court; Judge Constable, of the same State; and Judge Carmichael, of Maryland. Judge Duff was brought here a prisoner and lodged in the Old Capitol; and without any charge being brought against him was released. Judge Carmichael was subsequently imprisoned in Fort McHenry. The Attorney General stood by and saw all that, and he complained not. I am glad that the imprisonment of this judge in New Mexico has aroused the Attorney General from his slumbers. I am rather inclined to believe that the reason why the Attorney General is waking up now is that the military has laid its mailed hand upon a Republican judge; for this judge was appointed by Mr. Lincoln. When Judges Constable, Duff, and Carmichael, who are Democrats, were arrested, we did not hear a word from the Attorney General. However, I congratulate the country that the Attorney General has at last woke up. It is better late than never. I have no doubt, judging from the long time it has taken the Attorney General to come to the conclusion that the military is attempting to overthrow the civil power, that he will wait until the seventh angel spoken of in the Revelation of John shall appear, with one foot upon the land and the other upon the sea, trumpet in hand, and with loud and shrill blast summon a guilty world to final judgment, before he will begin to think for a moment that judgment day is near at hand. [Laughter.]

But, sir, I am delighted to find that the Attorney General is seized with dire alarm and dread apprehension in consequence of the encroachments of the military upon the civil power. The usurpations on the part of the military must have been very great to have brought forth the earnest protest of the Attorney General, who has not only given an opinion to the President that he had a right to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, but has justified the President, as far as I am advised, in all of his subsequent usurpations of power. So astounding have these abuses become that even Mr. Bates has made protest against them.

I hope soon to hear others who have been liegemen of the President making manly protest against his usurpations; and to hear their appeals to their countrymen, rallying them to the rescue of their down-trodden liberties and a violated Constitution.

The Secretary of War, by virtue of what authority I do not know, has undertaken to administer the churches. Yes, sir, Edwin M. Stanton and General Butler are making themselves kind of chief pontiffs, and are "running the churches," the one in the valley of the Mississippi and the other in Norfolk and Portsmouth. If the President had decided to appoint persons to regulate and supervise the churches, and to take the religion of the people under his control, I would have supposed he would have selected gentlemen distinguished for their charity, kindness, and benevolence; men of high moral tone, meek and gentle in their manners; men eminent for their piety and theological learning, whose lives were adorned with every Christian virtue, to have discharged this most responsible and delicate trust. The two persons who have unlawfully assumed the control of the churches have none of the qualifications that I have indicated. If the President had searched the entire country I do not believe he could have found two persons upon whom to confer this delicate trust more unsavory than Edwin M. Stanton and Benjamin F. Butler. In their manners and intercourse they are both heartless ruffians; they are strangers to kindness, gentleness, benevolence, and those elevated manly virtues that gracefully adorn the life of a Christian gentleman. But, sir, they have usurped the power to control the churches in the localities I have mentioned, in violation of the Constitution and the rights of the people who own those houses of public worship.

There is a little curious history about this subject. I have here the order of the Secretary of War placing under the control of Bishop Ames all the churches of the departments of the Missouri, the Tennessee, and the Gulf, belonging to the Methodist Episcopal church South. This is one of the most startling usurpations of the military power that has fallen under my notice. The Constitution secures religious freedom to the citizen explicitly. Where did the Secretary of War get the power to transfer all these churches to the control of Bishop Ames? Listen to this order:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, November 30, 1863.

To the generals commanding the departments of the Missouri, the Tennessee, and the Gulf, and all generals and officers commanding armies, detachments, and corps, and posts, and all officers in the service of the United States in the above-mentioned departments:

You are hereby directed to place at the disposal of Rev. Bishop Ames all houses of worship belonging to the Methodist Episcopal church South in which a loyal minister, who has been appointed by a loyal bishop of said church, does not now officiate.

It is a matter of great importance to the Government, in its efforts to restore tranquillity to the community and peace to the nation, that Christian ministers should, by example and precept, support and foster the loyal sentiment of the people.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Military Interference with Elections—Mr. Powell.

SENATE.

Bishop Ames enjoys the entire confidence of this Department, and no doubt is entertained that all ministers who may be appointed by him will be entirely loyal. You are expected to give him all the aid, countenance, and support practicable in the execution of his important mission.

You are also authorized and directed to furnish Bishop Ames and his clerk with transportation and subsistence when it can be done without prejudice to the service, and will afford them courtesy, assistance, and protection.

By order of the Secretary of War:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Sir, the first article in the Amendments of the Constitution says:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

The Secretary of War violated that provision of the Constitution when he assumed jurisdiction over these churches. By what authority does he assume to appoint indirectly, through Bishop Ames, ministers to all the churches in the three departments mentioned belonging to the people called the Methodist Episcopal church South? Bishop Ames does not belong to that church himself. He belongs to the Methodist Episcopal church North. The Methodist Episcopal church North and the Methodist Episcopal church South are two separate and distinct institutions. They divided, I believe, in May, 1845. Since then they have been separate and distinct ecclesiastical bodies. Mr. Stanton by this unauthorized and unconstitutional order has clothed Bishop Ames with the power to take possession of all those churches. The minister may be loyal, but if he happens to have been appointed by a disloyal bishop he must be kicked out. They did deliver a chapel in Memphis under that order to Bishop Ames. I have the order here, and I will read it:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF MEMPHIS,
December 23, 1863.

Rev. BISHOP AMES:

In obedience to the orders of the Secretary of War, dated Washington, November 30, 1863, a copy of which is here attached, I place at your disposal a "house of worship" known as "Wesley Chapel," in the city of Memphis, State of Tennessee, the said house being claimed as the property of the Methodist Episcopal church South, and there being no loyal minister, appointed by a loyal bishop, now officiating in said house of worship.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES C. VEATCH,
Brigadier General.

Mr. Stanton's order is being executed. I understand that the minister who was turned out of that church is a most excellent man, a man who preached Christ and Him crucified, and never babbled politics in his pulpit or elsewhere. He was turned out by the order of Pontiff Stanton, through his instrument and nuncio, Bishop Ames. I desire to cast no reflection upon Bishop Ames. I am told he is a worthy man. His sense of justice must have been very much blunted when he undertook this ecclesiastical mission.

While this was going on, on the very day General Veatch wrote the order to deliver Wesley Chapel to Bishop Ames, what do we find? We find a letter dated on that very day, December 23, 1863, written by the President of the United States, concerning a certain minister in St. Louis—Mr. McPheeters—in which the President said he knew nothing about these things, and then goes on to say:

"But I must add that the United States Government must not, by this order, undertake to run the churches."

"We must not undertake to run the churches," says the President; and he goes on to say that the Government has nothing to do with them. The President seems to be profoundly ignorant of what his chief of the War Department is doing. I do not know that I can properly solve the contradictions growing out of the President's declarations and the acts of his Secretary of War and major general.

Before I pass to that point, however, let me state that General Butler has issued an order that the churches in Portsmouth and Norfolk shall be controlled by the provost marshals, that they shall appoint and displace ministers in the churches, make assessments, &c., subject to the approval of the commanding general. Yes, sir, Ben. Butler, the Haynau of America, he whose administration in New Orleans brought disgrace on our country, whose friends in the House of Representatives refused a few days ago to allow a resolution to pass asking for a committee to investigate his conduct, is discharging the functions of grand hierarch in those cities. The provost marshal may present the minister to the church, but it must be by the approval of General Butler.

While all this was going on, the President wrote the letter, an extract from which I have read. He seems to be profoundly ignorant on the subject. He says the Government must not run the churches. I can only solve that by one of two hypotheses. It may be that the President has got it into his head that he will run the churches, but is not exactly ready to say so, and is using Stanton and Butler as a kind of feelers, as pilot-fish, as some of the friends of General Frémont and General Hunter think they were used in regard to the emancipation proclamation. General Frémont issued an emancipation proclamation, General Hunter issued one, and General Phelps issued another. The President revoked all those proclamations, and presently he issued an emancipation proclamation himself. The friends of those parties sometimes say that the President permitted those proclamations to see which way the popular current was running, then revoked them; and when he found the whole radical party, the whole Republican party, pretty much concurred in that policy, then he ventured upon it himself. He may be using Stanton as a pilot-fish in this matter, running him ahead; and if he thinks the people will not revolt at it and it will not be exceedingly obnoxious he may venture upon this measure. "To save the life of the nation he may find it necessary to unite Church and State." In the mean time his letter concerning Rev. Mr. McPheeters is thrown out as something to fall back on in the event running the churches should appear very unpopular. This may be the proper solution of this matter. I do not, however, think it is.

My opinion is that Stanton is doing this thing upon his own authority against the wishes and without the knowledge of the President. What, then, is the duty of the President if that be the case? If Mr. Stanton willfully and knowingly acts contrary to the wishes of the President, or issues orders of the gravest importance, involving rights of the most delicate character, compelling people not to worship at all, or to worship under the ministry of a man whom they do not want—if Mr. Stanton does this without the approval of the Executive, what ought the Executive to do? He ought to dismiss him from office, and do it quickly and promptly. If he does not do it the country will come to the conclusion that he does not so much object to it after all, notwithstanding his assertion "that the Government must not undertake to run the churches."

Sir, this is a most shocking usurpation of the military power; and I think if I have the good fortune to get this bill through about elections I shall introduce another one punishing Secretaries of War and officers of the Army who attempt to appoint ministers to churches.

Mr. President, what are we to do when we see such startling usurpations by the military authority? Does not our duty imperiously drive us to the point of passing the most rigid laws to prevent a repetition of such outrages? If we maintain our institutions and our liberties at all, we must maintain free press, free speech, and free suffrage, and last, but not least, freedom of religion. You see that they have all been stricken down by the military power. We shall fall far short of our duty unless we make every law that we think is calculated to restrain them. The people, if they maintain this Government, must do it, as I have said, by maintaining free speech, free press, and free suffrage. They must do another thing. They must keep separate and distinct the various departments of this Government. They must not allow one department to encroach upon another, but each department must be kept within its own sphere. When they do that, one is a check upon the other. We must never allow them to be consolidated.

We should not allow the executive to encroach upon the judicial or the legislative department. Neither should we allow the legislative or the judicial to encroach on each other, or the executive department. Our fathers decreed these separate departments for wise purposes; and you will have no liberty unless they are kept independent of each other. In a word, you will have no liberty except in the supremacy of the laws. Liberty must be regulated by law. No man, because he may be clothed with executive, judicial, or legislative power, should be allowed to trample the laws under his feet. The higher the official the more guilty the criminal if he violates the laws of the land, because of his sworn duty to see them faithfully administered or executed. I would punish a judge of the Supreme Court, or the President of the United States, or a Senator in Congress much more harshly for infracting a law than I would an unlettered man in the country, because they know their duty; they err knowingly, wittingly, and maliciously.

Mr. President, I beg the pardon of the Senate for trespassing upon their time so long. The only excuse I have is in the importance of the subject. I know that so important a bill as this, taking into consideration the circumstances by which we are surrounded, has not been before this Congress. I was met at the very outset with opposition. On introducing the bill I hoped and believed that every Senator would support it with alacrity and pleasure; but it met with opposition at the threshold, and against my earnest protest it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, a committee to which it certainly did not properly belong. After keeping it for a long time, the committee have reported it back adversely, accompanied by a report of fifty-two printed pages. I had to review all the testimony and to examine that report at length, and I could not get through with the subject and do it justice in less time than I have occupied. I hope, therefore, for the reason I have assigned, that the Senate will excuse me for the great length of time that I have trespassed on their patience.

APPENDIX.

Proclamation by the Governor.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

For the information and guidance of all officers at the approaching election, I have caused to be hereafter published an act of the Legislature of Kentucky, entitled "An act to amend chapter fifteen of the Revised Statutes, entitled 'Citizens, Expatriation, and Aliens.'"

The strict observance and enforcement of this, and all other laws of this State regulating elections, are earnestly enjoined and required, as being alike due to a faithful discharge of duty, to the purity of the elective franchise, and to the sovereign will of the people of Kentucky, expressed through their Legislature.

Given under my hand as Governor of Kentucky, at Frankfort, this 10th day of July, 1863, and in the seventy-second year of the Commonwealth.

J. F. ROBINSON.

By the Governor:

D. C. WICKLIFFE, Secretary of State.

An act to amend chapter fifteen of the Revised Statutes, entitled "Citizens, Expatriation, and Aliens."

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That any citizen of this State who shall enter into the service of the so-called confederate States, in either a civil or military capacity, or into the service of the so-called provisional government of Kentucky, in either a civil or military capacity, or having heretofore entered such service of either the confederate States or provisional government, shall continue in such service after this act takes effect, or shall take up or continue in arms against the military forces of the United States or the State of Kentucky, or shall give voluntary aid and assistance to those in arms against said forces, shall be deemed to have expatriated himself, and shall no longer be a citizen of Kentucky; nor shall he again be a citizen, except by permission of the Legislature by a general or special statute.

Sec. 2. That whenever a person attempts or is called on to exercise any of the constitutional or legal rights and privileges belonging only to citizens of Kentucky, he may be required to negative on oath the expatriation provided in the first section of this act; and upon his failure or refusal to do so, shall not be permitted to exercise any such right or privilege.

Sec. 3. This act to be of force in thirty days from and after its passage.

Passed and became a law, the objections of the Governor to the contrary notwithstanding, March 11, 1862.

The following is the affidavit which may be used to negative the expatriation provided in the first section of the above act, upon the failure or refusal to take which no one can run for an office or vote for a candidate. It is the duty of all election officers to require it:

"You, A. B, do solemnly swear that since the 11th day of April, 1862, you have not entered into nor been in the service of the so-called confederate States, nor in the service of the provisional government of Kentucky, in either a civil or military capacity; and you do further solemnly swear that since the said 11th day of April, 1862, you have not taken up or been in arms against the military forces of the United States or the military forces of the State of Kentucky; and you do further solemnly swear that since the said 11th day of April, 1862, you have in no way, either directly or indirectly, given any voluntary aid or assistance to any person or persons who were in arms against the military forces of the State of Kentucky. So help you God."

[General Orders, No. 120.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO,
CINCINNATI, OHIO, July 31, 1863.

Whereas the State of Kentucky is invaded by a rebel force, with the avowed intention of overawing the judges of elections, of intimidating the loyal voters, keeping them from the polls, and forcing the election of disloyal candidates at the election on the 3d of August; and whereas the military power of the Government is the only force that can defeat this attempt, the State of Kentucky is hereby declared under martial law, and all military officers are commanded to aid the constituted authorities of the State in the support of the laws and of the purity of suffrage, as defined in the late proclamation of his Excellency Governor Robinson. As it is not the intention of the commanding general to interfere with the proper expression of public opinion, all discretion in the conduct of the election will be, as usual, in the hands of the legally appointed judges at the polls, who will be held strictly responsible that no disloyal person will be allowed to vote, and to this end the military power is ordered to give them its utmost support. The civil authority, civil courts, and business will not be suspended by this order. It is for the purpose only of protecting, if necessary, the rights of loyal citizens, and the freedom of election.

By command of Major General Burnside.

LEWIS RICHMOND, A. A. G.

General Hartsuff and Rebel Sympathizers.

[General Orders, No. 14.]

No. 4.] HEADQUARTERS TWENTY-THIRD ARMY CORPS,
LEXINGTON, KENTUCKY, July 24, 1863.

For the information and guidance of officers in impressing property, it is hereby directed that, whenever his impressment may become necessary for the troops of the twenty-third Army Corps, it will be taken exclusively from rebels and rebel sympathizers; and so long as the property needed is to be found belonging or pertaining to either of the above-named classes, no man of undoubted loyalty will be molested.

Among rebel sympathizers will be classed those persons in Kentucky, nominally Union men, but opposed to the Government and to the prosecution of the war, whose acts and words alike hinder the speedy and proper termination of the rebellion.

Property will only be taken by the proper staff officers, who will in every case give receipts for it. Appropriate blank receipts will be furnished by the chief commissary and chief quartermaster at these headquarters.

By command of Major General Hartsuff:

GEORGE B. DRAKE, A. A. G.

No. 7.] HEADQUARTERS DISTRICT OF KENTUCKY,
LOUISVILLE, July 25, 1863.

By authority of the general commanding the department, the following general order is made:

1. It is ordered that no forage or other property belonging to loyal citizens in the State of Kentucky be seized or impressed except in cases of absolute necessity, and then only on the written authority from the headquarters of the twenty-third Army Corps or from these headquarters.

2. Whenever it becomes necessary to seize or impress private property for military purposes, the property of sympathizers with the rebellion and of those opposed to furnishing any more men or any more money to maintain the Federal Government and suppress the rebellion will be first seized and impressed.

3. The negroes of loyal citizens will not be impressed on the public works and military roads unless absolutely necessary. The negroes of citizens who are for no more men and no more money to suppress the rebellion, and the supporters, aiders, and abettors of such, will be first impressed, and officers detailed for the purpose are required strictly to observe this order in the execution of their duties.

4. All horses of the enemy captured or subject to capture will be taken possession of by quartermasters and reported to Captain Jenkins, chief quartermaster, Louisville, who is ordered to allow loyal citizens to retain horses to supply the places of those stolen by the enemy; but disloyal persons mentioned in paragraphs two and three, who encourage raids by the enemy, will not in any case be allowed to retain captured horses or horses justly subject to capture.

5. For all property seized or impressed proper and regular vouchers will be given, with indorsement as to the loyalty or disloyalty of the owners of the property.

By order of Brigadier General Boyle:

A. C. SEMPLER, A. A. G.

[General Orders, No. 23.]

HEADQUARTERS FIRST BRIGADE,
SECOND DIVISION, TWENTY-THIRD ARMY CORPS,
ROSSELVILLE, KENTUCKY, July 30, 1863.

In order that the proclamation of the Governor and the laws of the State of Kentucky may be observed and enforced, post commandants and officers of this command will see that the following regulations are strictly complied with at the approaching State election:

None but loyal citizens will act as officers of the election. No one will be allowed to offer himself as a candidate for office, or be voted for at said election, who is not in all things loyal to the State and Federal Government, and in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war for the suppression of the rebellion.

The judges of election will allow no one to vote at said election unless he is known to them to be an undoubtedly loyal citizen, or unless he shall first take the oath required by the laws of the State of Kentucky.

No disloyal man will offer himself as a candidate, or attempt to vote, except for reasonable purposes; and all such efforts will be summarily suppressed by the military authorities.

All necessary protection will be supplied and guaranteed at the polls to Union men by all the military force within this command.

By order of Brigadier General J. M. Shackelford, commanding:

J. E. HUFFMAN,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Oath to be taken at the Election.

I do solemnly swear that I have not been in the service of the so-called confederate States in either a civil or military capacity, or in the service of the so-called provisional government of Kentucky; that I have not given any aid, assistance, or comfort to any person in arms against the United States; and that I have in all things demeaned myself as a loyal citizen since the beginning of the present rebellion; so help me God.

Colonel John W. Foster, of the sixty-fifth Indiana regiment, commanding post at Henderson, Kentucky, issued an order similar to the above order of General Shackelford.

[General Order.]

HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES FORCES,
SMITHLAND, KENTUCKY, July 16, 1863.

The county court judges of the counties of Trigg, Caldwell, Lyon, Crittenden, and Livingston, are hereby directed, in appointing judges and clerks for conducting the State elections in August next, to observe strictly the laws of Kentucky, which require that such judges and clerks shall be unconditional Union men.

Judges and clerks so appointed are hereby directed not to place the name of any person on the poll-books to be voted for at said election who is not a Union man, or who may be opposed to furnishing men and money for a vigorous prosecution of the war against the rebellion against the United States Government. The judges and clerks are further directed to permit no person to vote at said election without taking the oath required by the laws of Kentucky, unless said person so presenting himself to vote is personally known to the judges to be a Union man.

Any person violating this order will be regarded as an enemy to the Government of the United States, and will be arrested and punished accordingly.

By order of

THOMAS JOHNSON,
Lieutenant Colonel Commanding.

The oath prescribed by Lieutenant Colonel Johnson, to be taken by voters, is in substance similar to the oath attached to the proclamation of General Shackelford.

[Special Orders, No. 159.]

HEADQUARTERS SIXTEENTH ARMY CORPS,
MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE, July, 1863.

1. In so much of the State of Kentucky as is within the district of Columbus, it is ordered—

1. That no person be permitted to be a candidate for office who is not avowedly and unconditionally for the Union and the suppression of the rebellion.

2. That no person shall exercise the privilege of an elector and vote at said elections who is not avowedly and unconditionally for the Union and the suppression of the rebellion.

3. The military authorities in said district of Columbus will see to it that this order be carried out. Judges of election will be governed by the principles herein set forth, and will demand evidence upon oaths in such cases as may be in doubt, and allow no person to exercise the franchise of voting who does not take the oath required.

By orders of Major General S. A. Hurlbut:

HENRY DINMORE,
Assistant Adjutant General.

[Orders.]

HEADQUARTERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBUS,
SIXTH DIVISION, SIXTEENTH ARMY CORPS,
COLUMBUS, KENTUCKY, July 15, 1863.

The above orders of the general commanding corps are communicated to the civil and military authorities for their information. Military officers making arrests for violation of these orders will be governed by the circular from office of Commissary General of Prison, dated Washington, May 11, 1863.

By order of Brigadier General Asboth:

T. H. HARRIS,
Assistant Adjutant General.

[General Orders, No. 47.]

DISTRICT OF COLUMBUS,
HEADQUARTERS SIXTH DIVISION,
SIXTEENTH ARMY CORPS,
COLUMBUS, KY., July 29, 1863.

That no further doubt may exist as to the intent and meaning of Special Orders No. 159, dated Headquarters Sixteenth Army Corps, July 14, 1863, it is ordered that no person shall be permitted to be voted for, or be a candidate for office, who has been or is now under arrest or bonds, by proper authority, for uttering disloyal language or sentiments.

County judges within this district are hereby ordered to appoint, as judges and clerks of the ensuing August election, only such persons as are avowedly and unconditionally for the Union and the suppression of the rebellion, and are further ordered to revoke and recall any appointment of judges and clerks already made who are not such loyal persons.

Judges and clerks of elections are hereby ordered not to place the name of any person upon the poll-books, to be voted for at said election, who is not avowedly and unconditionally for the Union and the suppression of the rebellion, or who may be opposed to furnishing men and money for the suppression of the rebellion.

The following oath is prescribed and will be administered by judges of elections to voters and to such candidates as reside within this district:

"I do solemnly swear that I have never entered the service of the so-called confederate States; that I have not been engaged in the service of the so-called 'provisional government of Kentucky,' either in a civil or military capacity; that I have never, either directly or indirectly, aided the rebellion against the Government of the United States or the State of Kentucky; that I am unconditionally for the Union and the suppression of the rebellion, and am willing to furnish men and money for the vigorous prosecution of the war against the rebellious league known as the 'confederate States;' so help me God."

Any voter, judge, or clerk of elections, or other person, who may evade, neglect, or refuse compliance with the provisions of this order will be arrested and sent before a military commission as soon as the facts are substantiated.

By order of Brigadier General Asboth:

T. H. HARRIS,
Assistant Adjutant General.

On this order of General Asboth is the following indorsement:

I had the within order enforced in the counties of McCracken, Graves, Callaway, and Marshall.

J. S. MARTIN,
Colonel Commanding Post of Paducah.

No. 14.] DEATSVILLE, NELSON COUNTY, KENTUCKY,
August 3, 1863.

I, Moses D. Leeson, captain commanding company B, fifth Indiana cavalry, hereby certify that under the orders and instructions of Lieutenant Colonel Thomas H. Butler, commanding fifth Indiana cavalry, I ordered the polls to be opened by the regularly appointed judges, sheriff, and clerk, namely, W. R. Livers, T. C. Warren, Thomas Cown, and R. E. Harrell, and permitted no other candidates' names to appear on the poll-books but the following: for Governor, Thomas E. Bramlette; for Lieutenant Governor, R. T. Jacob; for attorney general, John M. Harlan; for State treasurer, James Garrard; for auditor, W. T. Samuels; for register of land office, James A. Davidson; for superintendent of public instruction, Stevenson; for Congress, Aaron Harding; for the Legislature, Dr. W. Elliott; for county attorney, G. W. Hite; for county clerk, W. T. Spalding and William M. Powell.

MOSES D. LEESON,

Captain Com'g Company B, Fifth Indiana Cavalry.

No. 15.]

We, the undersigned, do hereby certify, as officers of precinct No. 2, at Cloverport, Kentucky, that, after opening the polls, Captain Herbrook, by authority from General Shackelford, ordered us to strike off the entire Wickliffe ticket, and also Milton Board's name, from the poll book, which was accordingly done in obedience to said order.

WILLIAM B. JONES, }
WILLIAM S. ALLEN, } Judges.

Attest: J. C. HEST, Clerk,
J. R. ALLEN, Sheriff.

FORKS OF ROYAL, August 3, 1863.

I do certify that at Rough Creek Spring precinct, district No. 4, there was a poll opened for C. A. Wickliffe and others forming a Democratic ticket, and for State officers; that I suppressed the same by order of General Shackelford, between seven and eight o'clock a. m.

EIGHTH ARMY CORPS,
BALTIMORE, MARYLAND, October 27, 1863.

It is known that there are many civil-disposed persons, now at large in the State of Maryland, who have been engaged in rebellion against the lawful Government, or have given aid and comfort or encouragement to others so engaged, or who do not recognize their allegiance to the United States, and who may avail themselves of the indulgence of the authority which tolerates their presence to embarrass the approaching election, or, through it, to foist enemies of the United States into power. It is therefore ordered:

1. That all provost marshals and other military officers do arrest all such persons found at, or hanging about, or approaching any poll or place of election on the 4th of November, 1863, and report such arrest to these headquarters.

2. That all provost marshals and other military officers commanding in Maryland shall support the judges of election on the 4th of November, 1863, in requiring an oath of allegiance to the United States, as the test of citizenship of any one whose vote may be challenged on the ground that he is not loyal, or does not admit his allegiance to the United States, which oath shall be in the following form and terms:

"I do solemnly swear that I will support, protect, and defend the Constitution and Government of the United States against all enemies, whether domestic or foreign; that I hereby pledge my allegiance, faith, and loyalty to the same, any ordinance, resolution, or law of any State convention or State Legislature to the contrary notwithstanding; that I will at all times yield a hearty and willing obedience to the said Constitution and Government, and will not, either directly or indirectly, do any act in hostility to the same, either by taking up arms against them, or aiding, abetting, or countenancing those in arms against them; that, without permission from the lawful authority, I will have no communication, direct or indirect, with the States in insurrection against the United States, or with either of them, or with any person or persons within said insurrectionary States; and that I will in all things deport myself as a good and loyal citizen of the United States. This I do in good faith, with full determination, pledge, and purpose to keep this, my sworn obligation, and without any mental reservation or evasion whatever."

3. Provost marshals and other military officers are directed to report to these headquarters any judge of an election who shall refuse his aid in carrying out this order, or who, on challenge of a vote being made on the ground of disloyalty or hostility to the Government, shall refuse to require the oath of allegiance from such voter.

By order of Major General Schenck:

W. H. CHESEBROUGH,
Lieutenant Colonel and Assistant Adjutant General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, November 2, 1863.

SIR: Yours of the 31st ultimo was received yesterday about noon, and since then I have been giving most earnest attention to the subject-matter of it. At my call General Schenck has attended, and he assures me it is almost certain that violence will be used at some of the voting places on election day, unless prevented by his provost guards. He says that at some of those places the Union voters will not attend at all, or run a ticket, unless they have some assurance of protection. This makes the Missouri case of my action, in regard to which you express your approval.

The remaining point of your letter is a protest against any person offering to vote being put to any test not found in the laws of Maryland. This brings us to a difference between Missouri and Maryland. With the same reason in both States, Missouri has, by law, provided a test for the voter with reference to the present rebellion, while Maryland has not. For example, General Trimble, captured fighting us at Gettysburg, is, without recanting his treason, a legal voter by the laws of Maryland. Even General Schenck's order admits him to vote, if he recants upon oath. I think that is cheap enough. My order in Missouri, which you approve, and General Schenck's order here, reach precisely the same end. Each assures the right of voting to all loyal men, and whether a man is loyal, each allows that man to fix by his own oath. Your suggestion that nearly all the candidates are loyal I do not think quite meets the case. In this struggle for the nation's life, I cannot so confidently rely on those whose election may have depended upon disloyal votes. Such men, when elected, may prove true, but such votes are given them in the expectation that they will prove false. Nor do I think that to keep the peace at the polls, and to prevent the persistently disloyal from voting, constitutes just cause of offense to Maryland. I think she has her own example for it. If I mistake not, it is precisely what General Dix did when your Excellency was elected Governor. I revoke the first of the three propositions in General Schenck's General Order No. 53, not that it is wrong in principle, but because the military being, of necessity, exclusive judges as to who shall be arrested, the provision is liable to abuse. For the revoked part I substitute the following:

That all provost marshals and other military officers do prevent all disturbance and violence at or about the polls, whether offered by such persons as above described, or by any other person or persons whatsoever.

The other two propositions of the order I allow to stand. General Schenck is fully determined, and has my strict order besides, that all loyal men may vote, and vote for whom they please.

Your obedient servant,

A. LINCOLN,
President of the United States.

His Excellency A. W. BRADFORD,
Governor of Maryland.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, January 20, 1864.

Major General STEELE:

Sundry citizens of the State of Arkansas petition me that an election may be held in that State at which to elect a Governor; that it be assumed at that election, and henceforward, that the constitution and laws of the State as before the rebellion are in full force, except that the constitution is so modified as to declare that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except in the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted; that the General Assembly may make such provision for the freed people as shall recognize and declare their permanent freedom, and provide for their education, and which may yet be construed as a temporary arrangement suitable to their present condition as a laboring, landless, and homeless class; that said election shall be held on the 28th of March, 1864, at all the usual places of the State, or all such as voters may attend for that purpose; that the voters may attend at such place at eight o'clock in the morning of said day, may choose judges and clerks of election for that purpose; that all persons qualified by said constitution and laws, and taking the oath presented in the President's proclamation of December 8, 1864, either before or at the election, and none others, may be voters; that each set of judges and clerks may make returns directly to you, on or before the day of — next; that in all other respects said elections may be conducted according to said modified constitution and laws; that, on receipt of said returns, when five thousand four hundred and six votes shall have been cast, you can receive said votes, and ascertain all who shall thereby appear to have been elected; that on the day of — next all persons appearing to have been elected, who shall appear before you at Little Rock, and take the oath, to be by you severally administered, to support the Constitution of the United States and said modified constitution of the State of Arkansas, and be by you declared qualified and empowered to enter immediately upon the duties of the offices to which they have been respectively elected.

You will please order an election to take place on the 28th of March, 1864, and returns to be made in fifteen days thereafter.

A. LINCOLN.

General Butler recently issued the following order:

NORFOLK, VIRGINIA, February 11, 1864.

All places of public worship in Norfolk and Portsmouth are hereby placed under the control of the provost marshals of Norfolk and Portsmouth respectively, who shall see the pulpits properly filled by displacing, when necessary, the present incumbents, and substituting men of known loyalty and the same sectarian denomination, either military or civil, subject to the approval of the commanding general. They shall see that all churches are open freely to all officers and soldiers, white or colored, at the usual hour of worship, and at other times, if desired; and they shall see that no insult or indignity be offered to them, either by word, look, or gesture, on the part of the congregation. The necessary expenses will be levied, as far as possible, in accordance with the previous usages or regulations of each congregation respectively.

No property shall be removed, either public or private, without permission from these headquarters.

By command of Brigadier General E. A. Will.

LOUISVILLE, June 13, 1863.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned, in behalf of many in all parts of this Commonwealth, believe it a political necessity to reorganize the Democratic party in the State, in association with those of the North who have stood by the Government and the Constitution throughout this deplorable civil war. They constitute the only political party of the North with whom any party South will have any affiliation, while a political association between the two sections of the country is indispensable to a restoration of the Union.

We cannot consent to the doctrine that the Constitution and laws are inadequate to the present emergency; that the constitutional guarantees of liberty and property can be suspended by war.

Our fathers certainly did not intend that our Constitution should be a fair-weather document, to be laid away in a storm, or a fancy garment to be worn only in dry weather. On the contrary, it is in times like the present that constitutional restraints on the power of those in authority are needed.

We hold the Federal Government one of limited powers, that cannot be enlarged by the existence of civil commotion. We hold the rights reserved to the States equally sacred with those granted to the United States. The Government has no more right to disregard the constitutions and laws of the States than the States have to disregard the Constitution and laws of the United States.

We hold that the Administration has committed grave errors in confiscation bills, lawless proclamations, and military orders setting aside constitutions and laws, and making arrests outside of military lines where there is no public danger to excuse it.

It is now obvious that the fixed purpose of the Administration is to arm the negroes of the South to make war upon the whites, and we hold it to be the duty of the people of Kentucky to enter against such a policy a solemn and most emphatic protest.

We hold as sacred and inalienable the right of free speech and a free press; that the Government belongs to the people and not the people to the Government.

We hold this rebellion utterly unjustifiable in its inception, and a dissolution of the Union the greatest of calamities. We would see all just and constitutional means adopted to the suppression of the one and the restoration of the other. Having observed your uniform and consistent course since the origin of our troubles we believe you a faithful representative of our views, and urgently request that you permit your name to be used as a Democratic candidate for Governor at the ensuing election.

Extract from Statute of George II, chapter 30, [1735.]

An act for regulating the quartering of soldiers during the time of the elections of members to serve in Parliament.

Whereas, by the ancient common law of this land, all elections ought to be free; and whereas by an act passed in the third year of the reign of King Edward I, of famous memory, it is commanded upon great forfeiture that no man by force of arms nor by malice or menacing shall disturb any to make free election; and forasmuch as the freedom of elections of members to serve in Parliament is of the utmost consequence to the preservation of the rights and liberties of this kingdom; and whereas it hath been the usage and practice to cause any regiment, troop, or company, or any number of soldiers which hath been quartered in any city, borough, town, or place where any election of members to serve in Parliament hath been appointed to be made, to remove and continue out of the same during the time of such election, except in such particular cases as are hereinafter specified: To the end, therefore, that the said usage and practice may be settled and established for the future,

Be it enacted by the King's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That when and as often as any election of any peer or peers to represent the peers of Scotland in Parliament, or of any member or members to serve in Parliament shall be appointed to be made, the Secretary at War for the time being, or in case there shall be no Secretary at War, then such person who shall officiate in the place of the Secretary at War, shall, and is hereby required, at some convenient time before the day appointed for such election, to issue and send forth proper orders in writing for the removal of every such regiment, troop, or company, or other number of soldiers as shall be quartered or billeted in any such city, borough, town, or place where such election shall be appointed to be made, out of every such city, borough, town, or place, one day at the least before the day appointed for such election, to the distance of two or more miles from such city, borough, town, or place, and not to make any nearer approach to such city, borough, town, or place as aforesaid until one day at the least after the poll to be taken at such election shall be ended, and the poll-books closed.

11. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That in case the Secretary at War for the time being, or such person who shall officiate in the place of the Secretary at War, shall neglect or omit to issue or send forth such orders as aforesaid, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, and shall be thereof lawfully convicted upon any indictment to be preferred at the next assizes, or sessions of oyer and terminer, to be held for the county where such offense shall be committed, or on an information to be exhibited in the court of King's Bench, within six months after such offense committed, such Secretary at War, or person who shall officiate in the place of the Secretary at War, shall for such offense be discharged from their said respective offices, and shall from thenceforth be utterly disabled, and made incapable to hold any office or employment, civil or military, in his Majesty's service.

An act to regulate elections, approved April 16, 1846.

"SEC. 33. No such election shall be appointed to be held on any day on which the militia of this State shall be required to do military duty, nor shall the militia of this State be required to do military duty on any day on which any such election shall be appointed to be held."—Nixon's Digest, Laws of New Jersey, 1799-1855, p. 220.

"SEC. 1. No meeting for the election of national, State, district, county, city, or town officers, shall be held on a day upon which the militia of the Commonwealth are by law required to do military duty."—General Statutes of Massachusetts, 1860, chap. 7, p. 58.

Penal provisions and regulations affecting purity of elections.

"SEC. 63. If any officer of the militia parades his men, or exercises any military command on a day of election of a public officer, as described in section sixty-three of chapter ten, and not thereby excepted, or except in time of war or public danger, he shall for each offense forfeit not less than ten nor more than three hundred dollars."—Revised Statutes of Maine, 1857, chap. 4, p. 84.

Penalties for the violation of election laws.

"SEC. 5. If any officer or other person shall call out or order any of the militia of this State to appear and exercise on any day during any election to be held by virtue of this chapter, or within five days previous thereto, except in cases of invasion or insurrection, he shall forfeit the sum of $500 for every such offense."—Revised Statutes of New York, Banks & Brothers, Fifth Edition, vol. 1, title 7, chap. 6, p. 448.

1. Of elections by the citizens.

"110. No body of troops in the Army of the United States or of this Commonwealth shall be present, either armed or unarmed, at any place of election within this Commonwealth, during the time of such election: Provided, that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent any officer or soldier from exercising the right of suffrage in the election district to which he may belong if otherwise qualified according to law."—Furdon's Digest; Brighly, 1700-1861; Laws of Pennsylvania, p. 383.

SPEECH OF HON. D. W. VOORHEES,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 5, 1864.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. VOORHEES said:

MR. CHAIRMAN: I arise to address the House to-day with feelings of profound depression and gloom. It is a melancholy spectacle to behold a free Government die. The world, it is true, is filled with evidences of decay. All nature speaks the voice of dissolution, and the highway of history and of life is strewn with the wrecks of time, the great despoiler, has made. But hope of the future, bright visions of reviving glory are nowhere denied to the heart of man save as he gazes upon the downfall of legal liberty. He listens sorrowfully to the autumn winds as they sigh through dismantled forests, but he knows that their breath will be soft and vernal in the spring, and that the dead flowers and the withered foliage will blossom and bloom again. He sees the sky overcast with the angry frown of the tempest, but he knows that the sun will reappear, and the stars, the bright emblazonry of God, cannot perish. Man himself, this strange connecting link between dust and deity, totters wearily onward under the weight of years and pain toward the gaping tomb—but how briefly his mind lingers around that dismal spot! It is filled with tears and grief, and the willow and the cypress gather around it with their loving but mournful embrace. And is this all? Not so. If a man die, shall he not live again? Beyond the grave, in the distant Aiden, hope provides an elysium of the soul where the mortal assumes immortality and life becomes an endless splendor.

But where, sir, in all the dreary regions of the past, filled with convulsions, wars and crimes, can you point your finger to the tomb of a free commonwealth on which the angel of resurrection has ever descended, or from whose mouth the stone of despotism has ever been rolled away? Where, in what age and in what clime, have the ruins of constitutional freedom renewed their youth and regained their lost estate? By whose strong grip has the dead corpse of a republic once fallen ever been raised? The merciful Master who walked upon the waters, and bade the winds be still, left no ordained apostles with power to wrench apart the jaws of national death, and release the victims of despotism. The wail of the heart-broken over the dead is not so sad to me as the realization of this fact. But all history, with a loud unbroken voice, proclaims it, and the evidence of what the past has been is conclusive to my mind of what the future will be. Wherever in the wide domain of human conduct a people once possessed of liberty, with all power in their own hands, have surrendered these great gifts of God at the command of the usurper, they have never afterwards proven themselves worthy to regain their forfeited treasures.

Sir, let history speak on this point. Bend your ear, and listen to the solemn warnings which distant ages perpetually utter in their uneasy slumbers. Four thousand years of human experience are open and present for the study of the American people. Standing as we do, the last and greatest Republic in the midst of the earth, it becomes us most deeply in this crisis of our destiny to examine well the career and the final fate of kindred Governments in the past.

The principles of self-government are of ancient origin. They were not created by the authors of the American Constitution. They were adopted by those wise and gifted minds from the models of former times and applied to the wants of the American people. Far back in the gray, uncertain dawn of history, in the land of mystery and of miracles, the hand of Almighty benevolence planted the seeds of constitutional government by which life, liberty, and property were made secure. Abraham and Lot each governed his household and his herdmen by law; and although they became offended at each other, yet under the divine sanction they refrained from the pleasures of conquest, subjugation, confiscation. They divided the country before them by a primitive treaty, and the grass continued to grow for their flocks unstained by fraternal blood and uncrushed by the hoof of war. And in long-after years, when the descendants of the patriarchs broke their prison doors in Egypt and lay encamped in the wilderness, the omniscient Presence came down and gave them a frame-work of fundamental law in which the popular will was largely recognized. A system of jurisprudence was devised for the people of Israel which protected liberty and administered justice. Under its influence the feeble fugitives and homeless wanderers without bread and without water in the desert became an empire of wisdom, of wealth, and of power. The liberal institutions of the Jewish theocracy produced statesmen, poets, historians, and warriors, who will continue to challenge the admiration of posterity by the splendor of their achievements as long as generations come and go on the waves of time. They lived within the immediate jurisdiction of Jehovah. They possessed the ark of the covenant, and took counsel with ministering angels directly from the portals of Paradise. With all these evidences of celestial favor in their behalf, it is not to be wondered that they claimed an exemption from the changes and mutations of human affairs, and boasted that the seal of perpetuity had been impressed by the divine hand on the pillars of their Government. But public virtue became debauched; the popular heart corroded with the lust of conquest and of gain; primitive purity faded away under the baleful breath of embittered factions; the fires of patriotism were smothered by rankling hate and the thirst for revenge; and all these evil passions broke forth in the voice of a malignant majority clamoring for a king. In that hour of disastrous eclipse, the spirit of liberty took her flight forever from the hills of Judea. Thousands of years have rolled away since then. The Holy Land has been the theater of conflicts which rocked the world as the throes of an earthquake. Genius and heroism have there blazed as stars in the eastern skies. There, too, was enacted the sublime tragedy of redemption—that tragedy which summoned the inhabitants of all worlds as its witnesses, and filled nature with agony in all her parts. The eyes of mankind have been turned back and fixed upon those scenes of immortal interest for more than thirty centuries. But who has lifted up and restored her fallen system of liberal institutions? The people surrendered their rights, their franchises, their self-control, and welcomed the power of one man. The base act has never been reversed. As the tree fell so it lies. It died at the root. Despotism reigns undisturbed and unbroken, in darkness and in silence, where once the light and music of freedom gladdened the souls of the stately sons and dark-eyed daughters of Israel.

And leaving the land of sacred history, what similar scenes of human weakness and human folly meet us at every step in the onward pathway of time. Where now are those splendid structures which once adorned the shores of the Ægean, the Euxine, and the Mediterranean? Athens, the eye of Greece, the school of the world—has her dismal fate impressed no lesson on the thoughts of mankind? Fifteen hundred years before the birth of our Saviour, the light of civil order and civil freedom arose in the island of Crete, and sent its rays through the vale of Tempe, the rich plains of Thessaly, over the fruitful fields of Attica and Bœotia, and hovered with an everlasting and an imperishable radiance around the heads of Olympus, Helicon, and Parnassus. It is true that kings governed in those early days, but absolute power in one man was unknown. Laws made by the people chained the licentious hand of oppression. The proudest monarchs of those warlike ages governed in obedience to the will of the legislative departments. They enacted no laws; they executed them as they found them. A house of peers and an assembly of the people shared the supreme authority and insured safety and liberty to the citizen. Ulysses speaks of one chief "to whom Jupiter hath intrusted the scepter and the laws, that by them he may govern." But he recognizes that these instruments of government are bestowed by the popular favor, for, when shipwrecked upon a strange coast and addressing himself as a suppliant to its queen, he says:

"May the gods grant you and your guests to live happily; and may you all transmit to your children your possessions in your houses and what-soever honors the people hath given you."

But even this limited and constitutional system of monarchy was not long borne by that proud race which drank in the love of liberty from the free air of the mountains over their heads, and the breath of the restless and stormy ocean at their feet.

"Those vigorous principles of democracy which had always existed in the Grecian Governments began to ferment; and in the course of a few ages monarchy was everywhere abolished; the very name of king was very generally proscribed; a commonwealth was thought the only Government to which it became men to submit; and the term tyrant was introduced to denote those who, in opposition to these new political principles, acquired monarchical sway."

Then sprang into existence that wonderful cluster of republics whose memory yet fills the earth with its fragrance of noble deeds and exalted genius. Liberty hovered over that classic peninsula of southern Europe like the angel of creation hovering over night and chaos, and from the fostering warmth of her embrace came forth an immortal world of letters, of art, of science, and of law. The Macedonian, the Spartan, the Athenian, and all lifted their heads among the stars, and barely condescended to pity and despise neighboring nations who were less free than themselves. They pointed to Marathon and Salamis, Thermopylae and Plataea, as the American points to Saratoga and Bunker Hill, Yorktown and New Orleans. They kept their festive days of national deliverance and joy as the 4th day of July and the 8th day of January have been commemorated and hallowed by us. They sounded all the depths and shoals of honor, drank deep draughts from the very fountains of freedom, achieved immortality in every department of human thought and action; and yet, with their cups full of glory for more than a thousand years, sparkling to the brim with rights and privileges more sweet to their taste than the honey of Hymettus, they dashed it to the earth, and its shattered fragments remain as they fell. The lust of power on the part of public rulers, and the luxury, sloth, and indifference of the people, nursed so long in the lap of prosperity that they allowed the usurper to march on in his lawless career unchallenged and unquestioned, worked the overthrow of the republics of Greece. And what traveler, standing upon those blighted and withered plains, has beheld a sign of resurrection for more than two thousand years? Now and then, it is true, a murmur or a groan has disturbed the deadly sleep in which that land is embraced, but it only shows that she dreams of the past, not that she will awake to the future. Her birthright was abandoned by her own sordid hand, and it cannot be reclaimed. A petty power of northern Europe now gives a king to the countrymen of Homer, Themistocles, and Solon.

But, sir, another name, more prominent than all others, presents itself to the student of antiquity in this connection. Roman history stands out upon the canvas of time as plainly marked as the events of modern ages. We see Tarquin the Proud expelled from his throne, and the foundations of the Commonwealth laid five hundred years before the Christian era. For the next five centuries we behold a race of men who "would have brooked the eternal devil to keep his state in Rome as easily as a king."

How fondly the devotee of liberty dwells upon that period! With what grandeur the names of the mighty dead, and the sublime creations of their genius, arise to our view! In what does the boasted civilization of the present surpass the achievements of a race and an age to whom the revelations of God were unknown? Who has spoken as Cicero spoke? What historian has guided a pen so full of majesty and of beauty as that which inscribed the annals of Tacitus? Whose muse has winged a loftier flight or sung a nobler strain than Virgil's? In arms, too, what warriors have improved upon the skill and magnificence of Scipio and Cæsar? But it was still more in the dignity and freedom of her private citizens that Rome was great than in the renown of her most illustrious leaders, statesmen, and orators. Kings of powerful nations bowed their uncovered heads before the Roman people. The magistrates, consuls, and military commanders paid homage and obedience directly to the public will. The sovereignty of the people was absolute. The principles of self-government were never in the history of nations more fully or clearly displayed. Jurisprudence became an enlightened science, from whose pages a light extends to the present hour, and under whose guardian protection the humblest citizen of Rome was secure in every right declared unalienable by the Declaration of American Independence. But why linger upon the well-known story of Roman liberty and Roman greatness? I use it but to illustrate. The melancholy conclusion came. As the son of the morning fell from heaven, so Rome fell from the luminous sphere of liberty never to hope again. The world grew dark as her light faded away, and ten centuries of gloom succeeded her downfall. And why perished this mistress of the earth? Not because the vandal ravaged her borders; not because the Gaul burned to avenge the victims of Cæsar; not because the Goth beat her gates to pieces; but because her people submitted to the encroachments of executive authority, lulled by the syren voice of a false security, until at last they awakened to find their chains and manacles forged and fastened. Their links yet fester in the flesh of the descendants of Brutus, and their clankings may yet be heard in the forum where Cato warned his countrymen against the approach of despotic power. No deliverer has ever arisen. Liberty has never been wooed to return. Once abandoned and surrendered by those whom she has crowned with honor and greatness, in the midst of the earth she goes forth with the air and feelings of insulted majesty to seek more worthy objects of her love and care.

Sir, modern history contains no exception to the rule which the fate of ancient republics has established. Aspirations for freedom have at different periods ascended from almost every portion of the map of modern Europe. A system of confederated States built up and nurtured the free institutions of Holland for more than three hundred years, while the night of despotism lay thick and heavy on all the surrounding horizon. As revolted colonies, as States in rebellion, the Dutch republic maintained a defensive war for thirty years against the whole power of Spain when Philip II controlled the councils and commanded the wealth of the civilized world. Their proudest cities were besieged and fell a prey to pillage and murder. In pitched battles they seldom triumphed over the superior numbers and equipments of the powerful Spaniard. Their country was trodden under foot; their houses plundered; their fields laid waste; and the wild boar and the wolf roamed unmolested through the streets of once populous towns. But the endurance and patriotism of a people to whom no terms were offered except abject, unconditional submission, outlived and broke the rage of their oppressors. A free Commonwealth, the United States of Holland, arose and extended the spirit of enterprise, commerce, and refinement into all the four quarters of the earth. She conquered the sea and subdued distance. The peaceful victories of her trade were celebrated at the Cape of Good Hope, and in the harbor of New York, in the Indies of the East, and in every latitude of the western hemisphere. Nor was she less renowned in war. The broom at the masthead swept the ocean of her enemies, and the only guns of a foreign Power whose hostile roar ever penetrated the Tower of London were the guns of the free States of Holland. Louis XIV, the grand monarch of imperial France, when Turenne and Luxembourg and Condé his armies, poured the torrents of his power against her for conquest and subjugation; but they were poured in vain. She fought with the inspiration of freedom, and made her history secure and illustrious as long as a generous heart shall be found to throb in sympathy with the welfare and happiness of a heroic people. But where now is that noble prodigy of liberal institutions? Why does she lift her beautiful head to the heavens no longer? Her glories declined under the burden of unbounded wealth and overflowing prosperity. Her people relaxed the vigilance of their guard over the citadel of their liberties, and slumbered at their posts while unlawful power fortified itself beyond successful attack. Thus she perished ignobly by her own hand, having throughout her whole career defied and held at bay a world in arms. And how still and heavy has been her long repose! No awakening convulsions shake her rigid limbs or disturb her frozen arteries. Once fallen and forever lost, is the mournful epic of her fate. She takes her place in the dreary catalogue furnished by antiquity.

But cross the Channel and take your stand on the soil of England. She too has furnished mankind with a short-lived experiment of republican government. Wrongs and outrages inflicted on the English people, similar in kind, but far less enormous than those which now oppress the citizen of the United States of America, wrought the volcanic eruption of 1640. The best blood of England perished in the conflict between Magna Charta on one side and absolutism on the other. John Hampden bled on the plains of Chalgrove, but the royal Stuart bled on the scaffold. When the strife died away the British constitution was found to be possessed and upheld by those who partook of the sacrament of the Lord's supper with bloody hands, and who enforced the sermon on the mount with fire and sword. They were the ancestors of those who to-day in this land are crucifying liberty afresh, and putting her to open shame. God does not allow Himself to be mocked, and Cromwell and the Commonwealth of England went out together, while a wrathful tempest raged around the dying bed of the great but bloody and tyrannical Protector. The incoming wave, the reaction in the tide of human affairs, bore back the dissolute and worthless Charles II to the home of his ancestors, and Englishmen have never, from that time to this, lifted their hands or their voices in behalf of a republic.

France points to the revolting blotch, the stain of mingled blood and tears, which her wild and mad attempts at freedom have left upon the page of history. We gaze at it but for an instant, and turn away with horror. At the very moment almost that the President of the French Directory declared "that monarchy would never more show its frightful head in France," Bonaparte with his grenadiers entered the palace of St. Cloud, and dispersing with the bayonet the deputies of the people deliberating on the affairs of State, laid the foundation of that vast fabric of despotism which overshadowed all Europe.

Sir, I pause in this train of sorrowful illustrations. I tremble at their contemplation when my mind is brought to embrace the conclusions which flow from them. But shall we shrink back affrighted and appalled because the great lessons of uniform history come to us with a voice of solemn and prophetic warning? Shall the universal experience of the human race bring us no wisdom? Shall we wrap ourselves in a sweet delusion and lie down to pleasant dreams when we know by every chart of navigation that the fatal maelstrom is just at hand? Will the proud and daring people of America close their eyes and ears against the teaching of ages, and wait for fetters and gyves to convince them that their liberties are in danger? Are they to be chained like Prometheus to the rock, while the vulture of despotism preys forever upon their bleeding vitals? Sir, in my hours of seclusion and study I have, to the best of my humble capacity, held up the lamp of the past to the face of the future, and I call God to witness that I would be recreant and faithless to my own conscience if I did not proclaim, as far as my voice will reach, that a danger is this hour upon the American people more deadly than the juices of the hemlock or the bite of the asp. This Government is dying; dying, sir, dying. We are standing around its bed of death, and will soon be wretched mourners at its tomb unless the sovereign and heroic remedy is speedily applied. I will submit the facts in condensed array on which I make this assertion, that a candid public may judge between me and that pestilent class who, failing to answer, resort to slander.

The American Republic was established in order to accomplish avowed and specified purposes. The objects of its creation were left in no uncertainty. Its mission was clear and distinct by the terms of the Constitution. It came into existence "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty" to that and all succeeding generations of American citizens. Who will dare to rise in his place and say that this Government has been administered during the last three years in a mode even tending toward the accomplishment of these grands results? Has the establishment of justice been maintained? The sword has been thrown into the scales of justice, and there is not this hour a court between the two oceans left free to decide the laws as they have uniformly been decided in England and America for the last two hundred years. The very foundations of civilized jurisprudence have been torn away, and the whole edifice is in ruins. The Magna Charta is erased; the habeas corpus is dead; the very soul and spirit of liberty is extinguished in the forum of the judiciary. To this sacred sanctuary, more than to any other department of the Government, the blessings of liberty were intrusted. But has the present Administration made them secure? It is required to do so by the terms of the Constitution. Let each mind give its own answer. Not one right which constitutes the freedom and safety of the citizen but what has been wickedly and wantonly violated. Prisons filled without indictment and without warrant; long and bitter punishment inflicted without trial or conviction; the whole jury system abolished by a stroke of the pen in the hand of the Executive or his subordinates in crime; no witnesses brought to the face of the accused; no counsel permitted to appear in his behalf; his house broken open and his papers searched in the midst of his pallid and terrified wife and children; such are some of the evidences which exist on every hand that our free institutions are hastening to their overthrow. And not content with breaking down all the ancient safeguards of liberty, new and malignant measures of legislation have been continually devised by a slavish Congress by which to more effectually reach and torture and grind the citizen. The most innocent conduct, a harmless word, a simple look has been enacted into guilt. The hired hounds of arbitrary power find conspiracy and crime in the friendly greetings of neighbors on their farms. Speaking of the period of 1795 in England, that great modern philosopher, Henry Thomas Buckle, in his History of Civilization, uses the following language, which I adopt as faithfully descriptive of the conduct of the party now in power, and of the time in which we live:

"Nothing, however, could stop the Government in its headlong career. The ministers, secure of a majority in both Houses of Parliament, were able to carry their measures in defiance of the people, who opposed them by every mode short of actual violence. And as the object of these new laws was to check the spirit of inquiry and prevent reforms which the progress of society rendered indispensable, there were also brought into play other means subservient to the same end. It is no exaggeration to say that for some years England was ruled by a system of absolute terror. The ministers of the day, turning a struggle of party into a war of proscription, filled the prisons with their political opponents, and allowed them when in confinement to be treated with shameful severity. If a man was known to be a reformer he was constantly in danger of being arrested; and if he escaped that, he was watched at every turn, and his private letters were opened as they passed through the post office. In such cases no scruples were allowed. Even the confidence of domestic life was violated. No opponent of Government was safe under his own roof against the tales of caves-droppers and the gossip of servants. Discord was introduced into the bosom of families, and schisms caused between parents and their children. Not only were the most strenuous attempts made to silence the press, but the booksellers were so constantly prosecuted that they did not dare to publish a work if its author were obnoxious to the court. Indeed, whoever opposed the Government was proclaimed an enemy to his country. Political associations and public meetings were strictly forbidden. Every popular leader was in personal danger, and every popular assemblage was dispersed, either by threats or by military execution. That hateful machinery familiar to the worst days of the seventeenth century was put into motion. Spies were paid; witnesses were suborned; juries were packed. The coffee-houses, the inns, and the clubs were filled with emissaries of the Government, who reported the most hasty expressions of common conversation. If by these means no sort of evidence could be collected, there was another resource which was unsparingly used. For, the habeas corpus act being constantly suspended, the Crown had the power of imprisoning without inquiry and without limitation any person offensive to the ministry, but of whose crime no proof was attempted to be brought."

Sir, why are you, why am I out of the vaults of a dungeon, and standing on this floor to-day? Not because we are guilty of no offense; not because the broad shield of the law interposes its protection, but simply because the Executive has not yet seen fit and proper in the exercise of his absolute and unrestrained will to lay us in irons. This is the ultimate climax of despotic power. Each one of the twenty million people within the control of the United States holds his or her tenure to personal liberty—the right to walk the green earth, to breathe the air, and look at the sun—not by virtue of a free Constitution, but dependent upon the clemency and pleasure of one man. May I not be arrested to-night? May not you or any one else to-morrow? Has it not been done in more than a thousand instances, and have not the courts and the laws been powerless to save? While I am now speaking, may not some minion who licks the hand of power, and whom it would honor to call a slave, be preparing notes from which to testify against me before a military commission? Have we in the West forgotten Burnside, and the infamy of his reign in our midst? Will the inhabitants of the western circuit in England ever forget the monster Jeffries and the murder of Alice Lisle? Will some poor, crawling, despised sycophant and tool of executive despotism dare to say that I shall not pronounce the name of Vallandigham? The scandal and stigma of his condemnation and banishment have filled the civilized world; and the lethargic and oblivious waves of a thousand years will not wash away the shame and reproach of that miserable scene from the American name. Some members on the other side of this Chamber have attacked with fierce clamor the great American statesman and the Christian gentleman who suffers his exile in the cause of liberty on a foreign soil. So the basest cur that ever kennelled may bay at the bidding of his master the caged lion in the distance. Protract this iniquity, this crime, as long as you will, however, the judgment of history will at last overwhelm you with an insufferable odium, as certainly as the streams of truth emanate from beneath the great white throne of God. "Establish justice!" "Secure the blessings of liberty!" Oh! bitter mockery. Justice has been dethroned, and the blessings of liberty annihilated. There is not one square mile of free soil in the American Republic. It is slave territory from the Aroostook to the Columbia. Every man in all that vast expanse may be reduced in an instant to hopeless bondage, every home may be broken open and pillaged, every dollar's worth of property may be swept into that yawning and bottomless gulf, the national Treasury; and all under the sanction of the principles and practices daily exemplified by the Administration which now hurls us on to ruin.

But the "domestic tranquillity," has it been insured? When the present party came into power the road to an honorable peace on the basis of the Union was still open. Before the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln his friends and supporters held the issues of life and death, peace and war in their hands in this Capitol. The records of the last session of the Thirty-Sixth Congress are immortal. They cannot perish; and as the woes and calamities of the people thicken and magnify by the frightful war in which we are engaged, they increase in value to posterity more rapidly than the leaves of the sibylline book. The baleful brood of political destructionists, who now unhappily possess the high seats of national authority, did not then want public tranquillity. They invoked the storm which has since rained blood upon the land. They courted the whirlwind which has prostrated the progress of a century in ruins. They danced with a hellish glee around the babbling caldron of civil war, and welcomed with ferocious joy every hurtful mischief which flickered in its lurid and infernal flames. Compromise, which has its origin in the love and mercy of God; which made peace and ratified the treaty on Calvary between Heaven and the revolted and rebellious earth; which is the fundamental basis of all human association, and by which all Governments the world ever knew have been created and upheld; compromise, which fools pronounce a treasonable word, and skillful knaves cover with reproach, because they are enriching themselves at the expense of the national sorrow and blood, was discarded by the North and accepted by the South when offered by Mr. Crittenden. By it domestic tranquillity could have been insured. But an ulterior and destructive spirit ruled the hour and flooded the nation with misery. And since the breaking up of the fountains of the great deep who of this party have labored to tranquillize our disordered affairs? Who has endeavored, in the name of Christ and by the omnipotent power of the principles which He left His Father's throne to proclaim, and for which He drank the wormwood and the gall on the cross, to expel the cruel and ferocious demon of civil war that has howled so fiercely for the last three years among the tombs of our young and heroic dead? Not one, sir; not one. Wise and Christian measures, looking to reconciliation and peace and Union, have been repeatedly spurned by the Executive and this legislative department which he holds in duress.

At no distant day, when the horror of this war can no longer be borne, the various propositions which have been made and rejected in behalf of enlightened negotiation and a constitutional restoration will be gathered up and hurled at those in power as an accusation more appalling, an indictment more damning, than was ever leveled against a murderer upon his trial. Nor can they, in that hour of their fear and calamity at which the righteous world will laugh and mock, hide their guilty heads under the assertion that the South will not treat for peace; yes, peace which shall restore the Union under the Constitution as it was written by the fathers, and as it has been interpreted by the supreme judicial tribunals. Why came that wasted figure, that gifted child of genius, the pure and elevated Stephens, of Georgia, from Richmond on his way to this capital in the midsummer of 1863? Was it a trifling cause that moved him? All the world knows that his judgment and his heart clung fondly and to the last to the old Government, in whose councils he had won so much honor. It is equally well known that he has never embraced the suicidal doctrine of State secession. The right of revolution is the ground upon which he stands. The malignant portion of the southern press, too, such mischievous and damaging prints as the Examiner and Enquirer at Richmond and the Register at Mobile, who continually cripple the interests and friends of humanity in this baleful contest, assailed Mr. Stephens for his attempt at negotiation, which they averred would lead to reunion. Yet, with these things well known, and perhaps much more which now slumbers in the secret drawers of the Executive, this great messenger of peace, this most acceptable mediator between an estranged and misled people, was denied a hearing, turned back in silence, and the festival of death commanded to proceed. The book of time, in all its ample folds, contains no more inhuman or revolting spectacle. Those who love war for the mere sake of war, when the same objects can be better attained by the gentle and holy influences of peace, are monsters of such frightful depravity that the blackest of those murdering ministers "who in their sightless substance wait on nature's mischief" appear as angels of light and benevolence in the comparison.

Sir, I will not here pause to dwell in detail on the usages of civilized nations in conducting civilized warfare. But I challenge history, that "reverend chronicler of the grave," whether in its sacred or profane records, to produce a parallel to the spirit and temper with which the party now in power has conducted the awful struggle in which we are engaged. Commence at the early daybreak of the world, traverse all time, and explore all space, grope your way among the vast hecatombs of all former wars, examine the gory stains of every battle-plain, ransack the archives of kings, cabinets, and councils, and no instance, not one, can be found where a people claiming Christian civilization has waged a war of any kind against a foe in dumb, ferocious silence, without a word, a sign, or a look in behalf of a peaceful solution as long as we have now been engaged in this cruel conflict. "Blessed are the peace-makers" was not spoken for the present administrators of American affairs. They spurn the examples and teachings of all Christian ages and enlightened people. They drink not from the benevolent fountains whose waters were unsealed to gladden and refresh the earth by the divine Nazarene on the Mount of Olives. They have their lips, rather, in a stream whose waves, more putrid than the river of Egypt when smitten by the rod of Moses, taint the air with pestilence and calamity. Nor are they wholly without models in the past. The boundaries of civilization it is true, as I have stated, are barren of any precedents for their conduct, but the dark regions of barbarism furnish here and there a ghastly and horrible example of fury, hate, and revenge, which is now followed by the Executive and his partisan supporters. Demons have occasionally, in the mysterious providence of God, visited the earth in the guise of men, to prey upon the human species from the mere love of slaughter and misery. Alaric, the Gothic monster, never treated with his enemies, never negotiated for a peace. The dying groan of a soldier on the field, the bitter wail of the widow and the choking sob of the orphan at home were equally music in his ear. Attila, the fierce Hun, known to history as "the scourge of God," neither sent nor received commissioners to discuss and allay the causes of war. He painted upon his banners the sword, and the sword alone, and proclaimed that by that sign, and it alone, he would conquer. Genghis Khan and Tamerlane, preserved by the pen of the historian for universal execration, found no pursuit so pleasant as calling for more men, more men, more men for the harvest of death, and, like our present Executive, snuffing with jests and ribaldry the warm taint of blood on every gale. The patriots who surrounded these barbarian chiefs spurned with eager indignation all proffers of mediation, all efforts at compromise, all talk of negotiation, just as do now the patriots who are seated on the west side of this Chamber, and who pay court for contracts at the west end of the avenue. Nor did Hyder Ali, that more modern incarnation of unconditional exterminating war, regard with favor the suggestions of peace, when pausing for a moment like a cloud of wrath on the brow of the mountain he swept down over the plains of the Carnatic, and smote them with blasts of fire, with indiscriminate woe.

Sir, these are your examples. These are they who never said conciliate, but always said crush; who never said harmonize, but who always said destroy; who denounced fraternal affection and embraced the doctrine of subjugation; who never sought to restore peaceful relations with their neighbors, but who always sought to ruin them by confiscation and plunder; whose voice was forever, like the voice of Moloch in hell and the voice of those who now rule this nation, for war, for mere war, and war alone, as a cure for every evil, a remedy for every grievance fancied or real. With what loathing and abhorrence does a Christian world now regard these destroyers of their kind! All countries and every people utter a cry of horror at the mention of their names. No pillar, no monument, no fountain, no grove perpetuates their place in the respect of a single human being that ever lived or died. And yet who will compare the ages in which they enacted their various tragedies to the one in which we live, and call them to such an account as awaits those who in this period of gospel light have fashioned the administration of the American Republic on the principles and practices of unenlightened barbarians?

But I will cease to reason on this point by comparison. I will grasp the naked question which the supporters of this Administration have so persistently clamored into the public ear for the last three wretched years. Is it right in itself to treat with those who are in rebellion, with a view to a restoration of their allegiance, and thus to insure the domestic tranquillity? If we draw an answer from the conduct of this Government in former instances of treasonable resistance to law, that answer is all in favor of negotiation and compromise. Washington set the example in the case of Pennsylvania, and Jackson followed it in the more celebrated case of South Carolina in 1832. In our wars with foreign Powers the same course has uniformly been pursued. And we ourselves were the objects of similar treatment even from the tyrannical ministry of George III in the days of the Revolution. Commissioners from the court of England came to our shores more than once a year during that struggle to treat for a return of the rebellious colonies to the union of the British empire. But I shall not content myself with the enlightened precedents furnished by the history of our own and other countries. Is there no higher standard of moral right to which to appeal? Is the voice of Him who spake as never man spake hushed and stifled by the hoarse cry of passion and rage? Have those pages which blaze with inspiration and which contain all the principles of national as well as individual morality and justice lost their light and power in this unhappy land? Can a Government long survive or hope to escape retributive punishment which blots out the doctrines of Christ in the regulation of its affairs? Shall a sneer, the sneer of the Jacobin and the atheist, deter me from seeking the path of public as well as private duty in the declared record of the great Father of us all? Have Robespierre and Marat come from their dishonored graves to dethrone God and to give us the hideous infidelity of the French Revolution? Sir, I ask you to go with me to the unsullied fountain of eternal truth:

"Moreover, if thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone: if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

State of the Union—Mr. Voorhees.

HO. OF REPS.

"But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established."

"And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church; but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican."

In these brief but comprehensive sentences are embraced the great principles of social harmony, individual charity, and national fraternity. They were written by divinity to convey a lesson of humane philosophy into every department of life and to every succeeding age. They furnish the text for every treaty of peace which nations ever framed to prevent the effusion of blood. They inculcate the duty of not one only, but repeated attempts at reconciliation; and those attempts, too, upon the part of those who have suffered the injury. Under the malignant auspices, however, of the present hour in this afflicted country, what a contrast is presented to these sacred passages! Not only do we refuse to go to our brother who has committed the trespass, but we reject him when he offers to come to us.

Sir, I take my stand on these immortal maxims, and appeal to the native justice of the human heart. I appeal to those instincts of charity and benevolence by which it is allied to the attributes of Deity. The plain people of America, those who with honest hands earn their daily bread, whose wearing apparel is not purple and finelinen, flashing with diamonds and pearls purchased by the blood and tears of millions—to them, in their humble homes, darkened perhaps by the death of the first-born, I make this solemn invocation. Before that pure and unselfish tribunal I lodge my cause in behalf of domestic tranquillity, and tender the Bible as authority for the principles which I declare. By the voice of my own heart, unseparated by gain and unawed by terror, I know what will be the verdict of an incorruptible and free people. But there is another class who preside over the ministrations of this inspired Book, and who mingle with their offerings to God the poison of political prejudices, before whom the cause of humanity, union, and peace need not be presented. That large portion of the clergy of the land who, claiming to be the chosen agents of the merciful Redeemer, fill the cup of his sacrament with rancor and vengeance, hear none of the sweet, angelic tones which plead from every page of His gospels in favor of that individual and national charity which suffereth long and is kind. They teach their flocks no longer to hunger and thirst after righteousness, but to hunger and thirst for the blood of their enemies. They ascend the sacred desk no more to pray that gentle peace like the dews of heaven may descend upon our wounded and distracted country, but to declaim in warlike strains in the face of the Almighty upon the delight which they feel in the infliction of human agony. They have reversed the order of the millennium which the Christian world has looked forward to since the days of the prophets. The one which they hail in fond anticipation is that in which every plowshare shall become a sword, and every pruning-hook a spear; in which conscription, slaughter, and taxation shall go hand in hand; "when the keepers of the house shall tremble, and the strong men shall bow themselves, and the grinders cease because they are few, and those that look out of the windows be darkened, and the doors shall be shut in the streets, when the sound of the grinding is low;" "because man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets."

To these men much of the sorrow which now overshadows our homes is properly attributable. They have ever been, and are to-day, the foremost enemies of domestic tranquillity. Agitation on matters pertaining to civil government has been their element. Sedition against laws which conflict with their ignorant and selfish bigotry has been their favorite calling in all countries and in every age. They have a higher law than the sermon on the mount; and the word of God is made to fit the procrustean bed of their blind and furious prejudices, which they mistake for conscience. Sir, I here proclaim as a fact to which all history attests, that wherever in the tide of time the ministry of the Most High have assumed as a part of their duties the control of affairs of State and the policy of nations, they have appeared as the advocates of despotism, the friends of high prerogative, the defenders of oppression, the allies of tyranny—obstacles in the pathway of progress, enemies to popular rights, and extortioners of the poor and laboring masses. I might dwell long on the evidence which the Old and the New World furnish on this point. That great author and majestic thinker, Buckle, whom I have already quoted, in speaking of the conduct of the political clergy in the reign of James II, says:

"They looked on in silence while the king was amassing the materials with which he hoped to turn a free government into an absolute monarchy. They saw Jeffreys and Kirke torturing their fellow-subjects. They saw the jails crowded with prisoners, and the scaffolds streaming with blood. They were well pleased that some of the best and ablest men in the kingdom should be barbarously persecuted; that Baxter should be thrown into prison, and that Howe should be forced into exile."

I pause but for a moment to point to the history of Puritan Massachusetts as a confirmation of my statement on this side of the ocean. What oppression did a political priesthood fail to approve? What cruelty did they not instigate and sanction in the early days of that famous colony? They scourged, seared, cropped, burned, and gibbeted the bodies of those who were unable to conform their views in all matters, civil and religious, to the reigning fanaticisms, and then consigned their souls to the regions of the lost. Carpenter, in his standard History of Massachusetts, a work warmly partial to that State, says:

"In July, 1656, several Quakers arrived in Massachusetts from Barbadoes, two of whom were women. Fully aware of the contemptuous disregard for existing ordinances indulged in by the more zealous of the sect in England, the magistrates in Boston brought the law against heresy to bear upon the intruders, and ordered their immediate arrest. After their persons had been examined for those marks which were supposed at that period to indicate such as dealt in witchcraft, no satanic signs being discovered, their trunks were rifled and the books found therein ordered to be publicly burned. A brief imprisonment was imposed upon them, but they were finally released and banished the colony. Several others who arrived subsequently were sent back to England by the vessels in which they came. About the same time a law was passed to prevent their introduction into the colony, and imposing the penalty of stripes and coercive labor upon all Quakers that should infringe it."

* * * "Some of the women were whipped, and several men condemned to lose an ear."

* * * "When seized they offered no resistance. Sentenced to be flogged, they yielded with entire satisfaction their backs to the executioner."

Finding that these atrocious measures were not sufficient to crush out the liberty of thought, a law was passed, says the same historian, in 1658, banishing the Quakers from the United Colonies of New England, and forbidding their return under pain of death:

"This sanguinary and unjustifiable enactment was carried by one vote only. Various staunch friends of the Government strongly protested against it, not only as cruel but as liable to invite the persecution it sought to avoid. The result soon proved how well grounded was the fear. Marmaduke, Stephenson, William Robinson, and Mary Dyer courted the danger to which they were exposed and quietly awaited the operation of the law. In September, 1658, they were seized and, after trial, condemned to be hanged. The sentence was carried into effect upon Robinson and Stephenson, but Mary Dyer was reprieved upon the scaffold, and again thrust from the colony. Resolute in seeking a martyr's death, she returned soon after and was publicly executed on Boston Common."

"Oh! the rarity of Christian charity." Will not some New England clergyman of modern orthodoxy shed at least one tear over the scarlet sins of his own ancestors who assisted in the murder of this poor woman on Boston Common, while he is weeping as if his head was a fountain of waters over the landing of the Dutch ship with slaves at Jamestown?

But again, says the same friendly historian:

"It was at the beginning of this year that many persons of piety and good understanding were again led to believe in the great prevalence of witchcraft in the province. Prominent among the most credulous of these was Cotton Mather, son to Rev. Increase Mather, for some time past the agent of Massachusetts in England, and himself a clergyman." * * * "The alarm of witchcraft was again sounded. The ministers fasted and prayed with the distressed father. The villagers of Salem also fasted and prayed; and the fear of demoniacal influences becoming general, a day of fasting and prayer was specially set apart to be kept by the whole colony. The belief in witchcraft being thus solemnly recognized and fostered, it was not long before the delusion spread across the whole breadth of the province. The number of victims so rapidly increased that many of the colonists, perfectly panic-stricken, became the accusers of others, lest they should be brought under suspicion themselves. The execution at Salem village of Mr. Burroughs, a minister of blameless life, was a terrible instance of the power which the delusion exercised over the strongest minds in the community. For fifteen months this strange belief held full possession of the popular faith. During this period out of twenty-eight persons capitially convicted of witchcraft, nineteen had been hanged and one pressed to death."

Sir, let not these remarks and records of faithful history be construed into an attack upon the ministers of our divine religion. I have endeavored rather to portray the evil results which flow from a desecration of that high calling. To my mind there is no vocation on this side of the mysterious river which divides time from eternity so lofty, no career of life so serenely beautiful and bordering so closely upon heaven, as the benevolent pursuits of him who tenders the cup of salvation to the lips of a fallen world. A halo hovers around his head which tells that he walks in the footsteps of his blessed Master. In the presence of such a man I would stand uncovered and do him reverent homage. And there are many such whose pure and noiseless lives pass almost unheeded by the busy, striving world, but around whom the comforting angels of the Lord encamp by night and by day. In their keeping are all the future hopes of the church—the Christian welfare of mankind. The youth of the land should sit at their feet and learn wisdom, and both young and old should rise up and call them blessed. But in this bright category of human excellence, this high galaxy of stars shining with an unearthly splendor, there is no place for such as take charge of churches by order of the War Department, and preach the gospel as commanded by the President of the United States. The vineyards where they labor will never bear the fruits of peace, never smile with domestic tranquillity. Before them I do not plead my cause. From them I expect to hear no voice save the continued and protracted cry of havoc.

But, sir, I will be told by the advocates of force and violence as a remedy, and the sole remedy, for our troubles, that although the South might send commissioners to treat for peace, yet they would accede to no terms save recognition and separation. In support of this view, certain propositions recently offered in the congress at Richmond are cited. To my mind they indicate a far different conclusion. It is true they do not signify to me that the power of the southern people is exhausted; that the rebellion is crushed; that a panic of fear prevails in the southern mind; that a government, whether de facto or de jure, which can maintain an army of half a million of well-armed men in the field, is conquered. I do not see the evidence of all this, as some have professed to do every sixty days since the war began; but I do see in these propositions an earnest desire upon the part of the South to conform to the usages of the civilized world, and to bring this unhappy and disastrous conflict to a close by the power of reason. It is true that certain objects are declared for which they desire to negotiate; but does that fact include final results which may grow out of negotiation when once commenced? What nation at war with another ever opened communication for a treaty of peace by proclaiming in advance the precise terms on which it was to be concluded? Such a course peremptorily excludes the very idea of negotiation. Commissioners would have no discretion, and reason and argument would have no room to act. Such is not, in my judgment, the meaning of this movement in the confederate congress. Sir, what is this contest? What interests does it involve? They are very distinct and simple when divorced from fanaticism. On the part of those who have kept their allegiance, it is a struggle to maintain the boundaries of the Republic, and thus defeat the ruinous doctrine that a State has a right to secede. On the part of those in rebellion, it is an effort, in their estimation, to preserve the integrity of their local laws, their social institutions, the right to control their domestic affairs free from Federal interference. With some, this attempt is made under a claim of the right of secession; others proclaim a revolution, which is the right of all people if grievances sufficient exist as a justification.

But the people of the South are united in the objects at which they aim, and if they could be attained in the Union, and without war, would they not gladly embrace and accept them rather than continue in a state of endless hostility, which is destroying the very interests they seek to profect? Why, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] declared a few days ago on this floor, that if the privates of the opposing armies in the field were permitted to come together in peace, they would speedily remove all our troubles; and yet he spoke and voted in favor of taking from even the wives and children of the southern masses, who, he asserts, are thus willing to return to the Union, the last foot of soil and the last crust of bread by which life is sustained. With such evidence, then, as this, can we justify ourselves before God or man if we fail to respond to the action of the South in favor of negotiation, which promises in advance such happy results? Let all grievances, whether fancied or real, be considered by candid statesmanship. Let there be safe and unrepeatable guarantees adopted against those that are found to be real; and those that are fancied will be easily explained away. Five enlightened commissioners from each section, imbued with the spirit of Christian benevolence, animated by an unselfish love of country and of their fellow-men, meeting by the consent and encouragement of their respective authorities, could, and in my solemn and deliberate judgment would, in ninety days, agree upon terms which would be acceptable to a large majority of the American people, and by which the Union of these States would be more firmly established than ever before, the lives of millions spared, the hard earnings of the laborer left for him to enjoy, peace and tranquillity restored. I would improve the armistice which winter declares to achieve many bloodless and permanent victories in favor of the Union and the Constitution. I would not stop there. I would extend the armistice as long as there was hope of inducing the return of a single State. But suppose negotiation should fail. Then, indeed, would this Administration be armed with an argument in favor of war which it has never yet possessed. This fact is well understood by the Executive and his advisers, but they refuse to negotiate because they have reason to believe that the Union would thus be restored and the war ended. But slavery would not thereby be abolished, and the scheme of building up a despotic, centralized Federal Government would be defeated. The war, therefore, goes on; the young men of the nation are swept into their graves upon the plain of battle, and the old men become slaves to the tax-gatherer, not to restore the Union, but to give a worthless liberty to the black man, and to strike down the legal rights and privileges of the white man.

Sir, upon this question of negotiation, concession, compromise, and Union, I appeal for approval to my own conscience. It sustains me with all the force of a burning conviction of duty. By it I am lifted beyond the reach of partisan malice. I appeal to the people! The voice and humane instincts of honest nature will plead my cause in their hearts. At their hands I fear no evil for the country. They are just, and will appreciate a plain and inherent element of right. I appeal to future years. When candor, reason, and Christianity sit in judgment on this struggle every line which records the history of war or peace in all former ages tells me that their verdict will be in favor of the principles which I advocate. I seize this hour of future triumph by anticipation. That it will come I entertain no more doubt than I do that I breathe the air of life this moment. I appeal, finally, to God before whom I stand, and into whose presence we all hasten to answer for our conduct and our motives. In that awful hour I humbly trust and believe that my feeble efforts to turn aside the devouring edge of the sword; to stay the hand of the great reaper, death; to pause in the horrid work of sending souls to their eternal account without repentance or pardon; to stop bereavement, woe, and tears around every fireside; to brighten the mournful face of the land with the radiance of peace; to reconstruct and restore a fraternal and harmonious Union will meet with the approval of the Father, and go far toward relieving the newly liberated and trembling spirit of the terrors which surround it.

But, Mr. Chairman, what other declared purposes of the Constitution, for the accomplishment of which this Government was established, have been carried out by the policy and administration of the party now in power? Do they promote the general welfare? With the principles of justice everywhere suppressed, the blessing of liberty annihilated throughout all our borders, and the domestic tranquillity utterly destroyed, it is almost needless to inquire what is left to constitute the general welfare. But it is my painful duty on this occasion not only to show that the principles of free government are dying, rapidly dying before our faces, but that the material prosperity, the absolute physical resources of the country are perishing also. The welfare, the strength and glory of a nation are dependent in a vast measure upon the extent of its population and the amount of its wealth. Next to the virtue and intelligence of the people their numbers constitute the power and dignity of a State. The ancient commandment and the blessing delivered to the original founders of the human race were to be fruitful, multiply, and replenish the earth. And one of the richest promises to the patriarchs of old was that their tribes and their descendants should increase until they became as the leaves of the forest and the sands of the sea-shore. Every public ruler who by wise political and social economy has rapidly swelled the population of his country, holds a place in the history as a benefactor of his kind. Every human being is a machine of labor. Each head and each hand is a producer. The busy brain and the active muscle are perpetually adding to the storehouses, the granaries, and the merchant ships of the world. It was a blessing and not a curse, it was in mercy and not in wrath, that man was commanded to eat his bread in the sweat of his face. By obedience to this command the glory of civilization adorns the earth, and commerce penetrates the most distant seas. The fulfillment of this decree redeems the savage face of nature, builds up the great marts of trade, patronizes sciences and letters, erects temples to art and progress, and is a forerunner of the Christian faith. Labor is the fountain of all wealth and of all happiness. Nations and individuals are alike utterly and entirely dependent upon it for their prosperity. And national prosperity is simply the result of individual labor. The humble and obscure toil of the honest plowman, who at nightfall is the source of all the nation's greatness, the foundation of all its vast enterprises, the support of all its boasted revenues; it is the small spring breaking into a rivulet from the hill-side, which, flowing on and mingling with the other waters of its kindred, at last swells into an ocean on whose bosom the destinies of the world are determined. All the great authors who have written on the subject of the wealth of nations have recognized this as a fundamental truth. Adam Smith embraces it in the first sentence of his immortal work. He says:

"Homeward plods his weary way"

"The annual labor of every nation is the fund which originally supplies it with all the necessities and conveniences of life, which it annually consumes, and which consist always either in the immediate produce of that labor, or in what is purchased with that produce from other nations."

Locke, in his equally celebrated treatise on civil government, is still more explicit and clear upon this point. He uses the following language, which covers the whole philosophy of labor:

"'Tis labor, then, which puts the greatest part of the value upon land, without which it would scarcely be worth anything. 'Tis to that we owe the greatest part of all its useful products; for all that the straw, bran, bread of that acre of wheat is more worth than the product of an acre of good land which lies waste is all the effect of labor. For 'tis not merely the plowman's pains, the reaper's and the thrasher's toil and the baker's sweat, it is to be counted into the bread we eat; the labor of those who broke the oxen, who digged and wrought the iron and stones, who felled and framed the timber employed about the plow, mill, oven, or any other utensils, which are a vast number, requisite to this corn, from its being seed to be sown to its being made bread, must all be charged in the account of labor, and received as an effect of that; nature and the earth furnishing only the almost worthless materials as in themselves. 'T would be a strange catalogue of things that industry provided and made use of about every loaf of bread, before it came to our use, if we could trace them: from wood, leather, birch, timber, stone, brick, coals, lime, cloth, dyeing drugs, pitch, tar, masts, ropes, and all materials made use of in the ship that brought away the commodities made use of by any of the workmen, to any part of the work; all which 't would be almost impossible, at least too long, to reckon up."

Sir, aside then from motives of humanity, what shall be said of an administrative policy which is unnecessarily depopulating the nation? Every ensanguined field of strife covered with the noble and once animated forms of American citizens, is an irreparable loss to the true wealth of the country. When the last call for troops which has been made upon the laborers of the land by the Executive shall have been complied with, more than two million men will have gone to the fields of death. In the year 1860, the number of voters in the United States, including all the sections, was four million six hundred and sixty-one thousand one hundred and ninety-three. The States which remained faithful to the Union contained, at the commencement of this war, about three millions. This may fairly be computed as the number of laborers in the loyal States three years ago, for while many who vote are too old to work, yet perhaps an equal number are capable of labor who are too young to vote.

It will thus be seen that two thirds of the laboring population of the country have already been levied upon by this remorseless Administration, and drawn away from the business of production. Figures cannot lie, and the census tables do not deceive. The prosperity of this Government consists in the labor of its people. This is its only capital. In proportion as the population is diminished or diverted from productive pursuits, in the same proportion is the general welfare destroyed. And no nation ever long survived the shock which the abstraction of two thirds of its population inflicted upon every branch and department of industry. A paralysis will seize every healthful function of Government. The sap of life will cease to ascend, and the green tree will wither and die. The fountains will be dried up, and the river will cease to flow. Sir, I am dealing in no imaginary picture. Go to the regions of agriculture, on which all else depends. You will there hear the cry that the laborers are few. One man cannot do the work of three; and two are gone, and but one is left to sow the seed and reap the harvest. I have seen the wife and the mother tilling the soil in my own district, her children following in the furrow, and their father away in the Army. I have seen broad fertile acres in the West lying waste and idle for the want of hands to place them in cultivation. How long can this state of things continue? How long will one third of our usual produce meet the demands of our increased and stupendous expenditures? How long can diminished production and multiplied taxation go hand in hand? How long can you continue to destroy the laborer, and at the same time raise a revenue from the products of labor? The tendency and speedy result of our present career are plain and inevitable. Soon, very soon, the fruits of industry will prove inadequate to meet the annual demands of the national Treasury, and then the land itself, the farm, the homestead, must be exhausted and swept away. Are you ready for this? Are you ready for the land tax upon uncultivated fields, in addition to the tribute which we already pay to fanaticism and corruption? If you are, then eternal war, vast conscriptions, no negotiation, no reunion, no peace, will bring with fearful rapidity the realization of all your hopes.

But in this profligate destruction of human life, and wanton and wicked overthrow of the whole natural system of American labor, how much longer do you expect the toiling millions to endure in silence? When the curtain first rose on the hateful scene of this civil war the country was mocked with a call for seventy-five thousand men, and our greedy ears were saluted from high quarters with the flattering story that the moon would scarcely wax and wane until the Government would again possess its own. You tell me of statesmanship; you tell me of honesty in the present conduct of our disastrous affairs. Sir, not a plan laid down in the beginning but what has failed, and not a promise made by this Administration to the people but what has been broken. The armies of the rebellion still stand with defiant front almost within sight of the Capitol; and the hoarse and terrible demands of a new conscription are now going out over the country, as fatal to the peace and happiness of the people as the croak of the raven to the life of Duncan. Do the few who now riot in the lives and fortunes of the many imagine that they can prolong forever

State of the Union—Mr. Voorhees.

HO. OF REPS.

Four brief but terrible years under the present Administration will have consumed more than three times as much of the wealth, the labor, the taxes of the people as every other Administration of the Government put together, from Washington to James Buchanan! Do you still say, in view of this startling fact, that there is no necessity for a change in our policy and in our rulers in order to save us from utter overthrow? Are you still content that this rate of expenditure shall continue? How long can it continue? By the statistics furnished in the census of 1860, the value of the real and personal property of the entire United States, before war and destruction had assailed it, was $12,084,660,005. Even admitting that it possesses the same value to-day, yet the debt is one third of the whole amount. But every one will acknowledge that an assessment of the value of the property throughout the United States now would not show more than two thirds of its former value. This would be about $8,000,000,000. Of this sum the public debt, in a few months, will be more than one half. Half the grain in the field, half the horses in their stalls, half the cattle in the pastures, half the hogs in the pens, half the land itself, every other acre, will stand mortgaged for the payment of a four years' dreadful experiment in the use of the sword, and the sword alone, in attempting a restoration of the Union. And even now, all over the land, the excisemen, the tax-gatherers, are swarming to enforce the foreclosure of this crushing and relentless mortgage. It is held by creditors who have iron hearts. There will be no grace given; no equity of redemption. Abolitionism is the principal holder; and then, contracts and fraud hold the balance.

But allow me to make an application of this debt to that great State a portion of whose people I represent on this floor. The assessed value of all the real and personal property of the people of Indiana in 1860 was $411,042,424. The proportion of the Federal debt which will attach to that State June 30, 1865, will be $285,980,519. It will therefore be seen that if three fourths of everything which the citizens and property-holders of Indiana possess was put up at auction and sold according to the appraisement of the census report, it would barely suffice to meet the demands which the Federal Government is making upon the wealth and industry of that State. I am aware that all this will fall idly upon the ears of those who are prolonging this war from motives of despotism and unhallowed gain; but I speak to-day for the farmer and the mechanic—for the laborer whose heart is filled with unselfish patriotism, and whose hands are unstained by plunder. I call upon that class to carefully estimate these burdens, for on their weary shoulders they are to be borne.

But again. I will be met here by the fact that the payment of the principal of the public debt will be postponed from one generation to another, and that like the people of England we will only be called upon for its interest. Taking even that unworthy view of the question let us see what will be the inevitable annual demands upon American labor in order to avoid open and acknowledged bankruptcy. The estimate I make on the basis of peace, after this war shall have closed, and the utmost reduction made consistent with our altered condition. I challenge scrutiny into its substantial correctness:

Civil list.....	$8,500,000
Foreign intercourse.....	2,500,000
Interior, pensions, Indians, &c.....	20,000,000
War Department.....	120,000,000
Navy Department.....	25,000,000
Miscellaneous, light-houses, building.....	25,000,000
	201,000,000
Interest on the public debt.....	240,612,785
	$441,612,785

Every one of the above items is put much lower than I candidly believe it will be, but even at these rates we find that each year of the darkened future, the Treasury Department will reach forth the hungry hand of revenue and seize upon the fruits of industry to the extent of $441,612,785. And the payment of this vast sum leaves us as much in debt as before, for it pays not a dollar of the enormous principal. It is simply what must be annually paid to prevent instant repudiation. It constitutes the current expenses by which alone the Government is enabled to live from day to day.

How, then, is this annual sum to be raised by the people? Taxes must be paid out of the earnings of the people, and not by the sale of their original possessions. Otherwise taxation becomes confiscation, and soon the citizen would have neither the means to supply revenue or to support life. If what the laborer earns over and above his own livelihood is not sufficient to meet the claims of the tax-gatherer, then sales commence by which the Government sooner or later will become the sole owner of all the estate of its inhabitants. For annual payments you must have annual earnings. The above annual sum must be paid by a corresponding annual surplus earning in the hands of the people, after allowing them to supply their own wants and necessities.

Now let us turn to an estimate of annual earnings. The State valuations for taxable purposes in 1850 and 1860, according to an estimate made by the financial editor of Hunt's Merchants' Magazine, furnish us the average annual earnings of the following States for that period of ten years, as follows:

California.....	$12,568,741
Connecticut.....	10,566,994
Illinois.....	29,390,472
Indiana.....	30,314,097
Iowa.....	11,221,101
Kansas.....	2,500,000
Maine.....	6,794,300
Massachusetts.....	21,554,452
Michigan.....	10,767,662
Minnesota.....	3,000,000
New Hampshire.....	6,413,284
New Jersey.....	10,688,200
New York.....	72,639,840
Ohio.....	45,869,780
Oregon.....	1,632,545
Pennsylvania.....	57,281,101
Rhode Island.....	4,734,513
Vermont.....	1,308,668
Wisconsin.....	15,426,882

I have not taken into account the border slave States, as their situation is such as to defeat any calculation of their earnings, at least for some years to come. It will be seen, therefore, that the annual amount which from this time forward must be paid into the Federal Treasury exceeds by almost one hundred million dollars the total annual earnings of the nineteen free States during a period of peace and unexampled prosperity. Under the present policy pursued toward the seceded States, a half a century will roll away before they will again assist the wealth of the country. Their whole system of productiveness is to be destroyed. Four millions of annual producers are to become idle and worthless consumers, and a vast bureau is about to be erected by which the Government shall support the negro instead of the negro, as heretofore, assisting to support the Government. Time will show that emancipation is the costliest feature of this war. Cotton, tobacco, rice, sugar, will perish as means of revenue. The blow of the Executive which releases four million hands from profitable labor, imposes the task from which they are set free as producers on a similar number of white laborers. It does more. They are still consumers; they must be fed, and they will not feed themselves. The President unconsciously uttered a philosophic truth when a year ago he said of free negroes, "They eat and nothing else." Nor can the negro be much blamed for accepting this easy life when an insane party tenders it to him, and lays the burden of labor from which he is liberated on the neck of the white man. A totally ruined and impoverished South, her property destroyed and her slaves set free, all simply means the annihilation of so many sources of national revenue, and the consequent enormous increased taxation in the North. Confiscation will not pay the expenses of its own machinery and execution. As a means of replenishing the Treasury it is not to be mentioned, except by madmen. All history bears testimony to the folly of thus attempting the liquidation of a public debt. It must be met and paid by the fruits of the soil produced by labor. And he who reduces the number of laborers North or South, white or black, in the same proportion multiplies the toils and sacrifices of those who yet remain.

Mr. Chairman, I need not pause to dwell upon the mathematical certainty of national and individual bankruptcy and ruin which the foregoing calculations so conclusively demonstrate. The humblest mind in the land will grasp the fatal result upon which we are hastening. But some superficial observer, intending too to further deceive the popular mind, will doubtless point to the surrounding appearances of general prosperity as an answer to this portion of my remarks. Money is flowing in boundless profusion. Unnatural prices are paid for everything. A meretricious splendor hails us upon the streets, at the rout, the assembly, and the theater. The nation seems fattening on blood and carnage. But this high feverish flush which we everywhere behold is not the genial warmth of health. It is the fierce hectic glow of a swift consumption. It is the herald of death, and points to the tomb. What we call money is not money, and the most gorgeous wealth has no value, because it is a prey to the monster debt. Frenchmen, more than a hundred years ago, dreamed of a fabulous fountain of prosperity, and located it in the valley of the Mississippi. The credit of the Mississippi Company became the basis of an illimitable paper currency, and both the king and people of France hailed John Law, its founder, as the deliverer of their kingdom. It was treason to doubt the infallibility of his gigantic scheme of human credulity and folly, as it is now to doubt the wisdom and final success of our own financial Department.

Bancroft, the historian, well portrays our own unhappy situation in describing this great delusion of the French. He says:

"A Government which had almost absolute power of legislation, conspired to give the widest extension to what was called credit. Law might have regulated at his pleasure the interest of money, the value of stocks, and the price of labor and produce. The contest between paper and specie began to rage—the one buoyed up by despotic power, the other appealing to common sense."

"Paper was made the legal tender in all payments. To win the little gold and silver that was hoarded by the humble classes small bills, as low even as ten livres, (a livre is about twenty cents) were put in circulation." "When men are greedy in the wrong, especially when they have embarked their fortunes in their error, they willfully resist light. So it has been with the French people; they remained faithful to the delusion till France was impoverished, public and private credit was subverted, the income of capitalists annihilated, and labor left without employment, while in the midst of the universal wretchedness of the middling class, a few war speculators gloried in their unjust acquisition and enjoyment of immense wealth."

At about the same period a similar frenzy was raging on the other side of the English Channel, and British statesmen fancied they had found the magic alambic by which paper issued upon credit could be made to supply the uses of gold.

The trade of the South sea was to pay the debt of England in twenty-seven years, and Sir John Blunt issued Government bonds on the faith of this fictitious wealth. Avarice and speculation instantly seized like twin furies upon the heart of the whole kingdom. The glittering beams of a false and deceptive prosperity gilded every present scene, and illuminated the future with the radiant smiles of hope. The British Parliament resounded with high eulogiums upon the financial scheme which was so soon to release the hands of English industry from the galling manacles of debt. We are listening from day to day to similar speeches upon a similar subject as they are made on the other side of the Chamber in defense of the Department of the Treasury. Yet woe and disaster followed the experiment of paper credit in England as well as in France; and Smollett, the historian, relates the fate of their projectors, from a study of which the architects of American ruin may accurately determine the destiny which hangs with certainty over their future!

"While at the moment a South-sea director was scarcely safe in the streets from the vengeance of the populace, Law, the projector of the Mississippi bubble in France, was flying for his life from the people whom he had beggared."

Sir, in view of the experience of other nations, in view of reason and of facts, what may the Comptroller of the Treasury himself, catching the mutterings of the fearful rising storm, like the practiced mariner at sea, utter a cry of terrible warning. In a recent address he fully confirms the dark and dismal view which I have here advanced of our financial condition. He says:

"Bear constantly in mind, although the loyal States appear superficially to be in a prosperous condition that such is not the fact. That while the Government is engaged in the suppression of a rebellion of unexampled fierceness and magnitude, and is constantly draining the country of its laboring and producing population, and diverting its mechanical industry from works of permanent value, to the construction of implements of warfare; while cities are crowded and the country is to the same extent depleted, and waste and extravagance prevail as they never before prevailed in the United States, the nation, whatever may be the external indications, is not prospering."

Sir, I take leave of the question of the general welfare. The bitter hour of a people's bloody sweat and agonizing tears will soon be here. The mournful shadows of its funeral pall are already penetrating the once bright and abundant homes of virtuous labor. The spirit of oppression is omnipresent in the land, and like death and famine, none will escape the pangs which it inflicts. Let each eye which now beholds the sun take its last look at scenes of plenty and prosperity. Our fall from bounding wealth and unlimited resources to pinched and shrunken poverty and cowering bankruptcy is as certain and as fatal under our present policy as the fall of Lucifer, the morning star, from heaven. And the exclamation of the laborer as he toils in a hopeless bondage to the public debt may well be as despairing as the anguish of the lost angel:

"Farewell, happy fields,
Where joy forever dwells. Hail horrors; hail Infernal world; and thou, profoundest hell, Receive thy new possessor."

And now, Mr. Chairman, what else remains? What portion of the Constitution can yet be found alive? What principle has been spared, preserved, or protected by the destroyers who rule the nation? Have they provided for the common defense against foreign Powers? The Emperor of France tramples the Monroe doctrine disdainfully under his feet. He overthrows the republic of Mexico, and on its ruins erects an imperial despotism in immediate contact with our borders. A prince of the house of Hapsburg, trained in the courts of Austrian oppression, becomes our closest neighbor. Perhaps it is needless to complain of this near example of one-man power—this European head wearing a crown on North American soil. It will not be long if our present career is unchecked until the terms dictator, king, and emperor will be as familiar in Washington as in the palace of St. Cloud.

But, sir, the saddest question embraced within the scope of my remarks remains to be answered as I draw them to a close. Has the policy pursued for the last three years resulted in the formation of a more perfect Union?

No language that the tongue of man can utter would form so expressive an answer to such a question as a silent survey of the dreadful scene which lies before us. A gulf of blood and tears and all of human agony which the afflicted race of men can know this side of the dread abodes of the damned, divides the suffering and miserable sections of a once fraternal and contented people. Statesmen of Christian faith, imbued with the lofty spirit of Him who gave His blessing to the merciful, could again span this horrid chasm and bind together the torn and bleeding ligaments of the Union. But an evil star is raging in our sky, and under its malign power the legislation of the land appears as the frenzied, murderous, disjoined dreams of a madman in his cell. Such a penal code as now stands in the way of the return of the men, women, and children of the South to their allegiance has no parallel in the annals of the human race. A thousand miles of gibbets with the dangling halter and the ready executioner; universal confiscation of property to the remotest period of an innocent posterity; the absolute extermination of a whole people and the appropriation of the depopulated country to the unsparring demands of a more than Norman conquest; the utter extinction of every vestige of our present form of government by States—all this and infinitely more is contained in the enactments which already stain the records of American legislation. But why need I dwell upon these evidences of disunion? The great leader of the Administration on this floor, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] has deliberately here announced, after all our sacrifices, sorrows, and loss, that the Union of our fathers is dead, and that he who attempts its resurrection is a criminal instead of a patriot. He goes further, and admits all the se-ceded States have ever claimed—their nationality. They have sought in vain in all the four quarters of the earth for recognition. They find it at last at the hands of those who speak for the Administration on this floor.

Sir, I deny this doctrine. I plant myself on the Constitution which recognizes an unbroken Union. I shall stand there in every vicissitude of fortune, and if I fall it will be when the people themselves abandon their own Constitution. By the principles of this mighty instrument, I expect finally a restoration of the Union of the States. Every hour which the party in power prolongs its control of affairs, postpones the auspicious day, but as I behold the future it will assuredly come. Material and indestructible interests unite every section except that which prospers on fanaticism. And I here to-day, in the spirit of one who expects and desires his posterity and theirs to live together in the ancient and honorable friendship of their fathers, warn the southern people not to look forward to separation and independence, but to embrace every opportunity for cooperation with the conservative men of the North, who will aid with their lives, if need be, to secure them all their rights and institutions as free and equal citizens of the United States. If this be done the approaching presidential election will bring peace, Union, and liberty. But if the peaceful popular revolution of the ballot-box fails to produce these results, then darkness will settle upon the face of the deep, and the free institutions of America will exist only on the page of the future historian. Four years more of our present policy will leave the Republic an unshapen mass of ruins, a wreck more melancholy and hopeless than any that strew the pathway of ages. And here in this fair young western world, as in all former times, a despotism will arise from the shattered fragments of self-government, to which each succeeding generation shall pay the extorted tribute of its blood and toil.

MILITARY AND POST ROADS.

SPEECH OF HON. T. T. DAVIS,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 23, 1864.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 307) to declare certain roads military and post roads, and to regulate commerce—

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill before the House proposes to sanction a railroad constructed between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, and which consists of portions of two lines built under the authority of the State of New Jersey.

That State, by its prior legislation, had authorized the construction of another line of railway to which the exclusive right had been given of transporting passengers and freight between the two cities, and it is claimed that the two roads last incorporated have violated the rights of the company first chartered, in consenting, upon the requisition of the War Department, to transport troops and munitions of war en route to Washington, at a time when its own capacity was entirely exhausted. An effort is in consequence now being made in the courts of New Jersey to destroy the offending corporations.

I state this fact in the outset to the House, and hope that it will be borne in mind, for I think that a railroad line ought to be recognized as a legal and lawful structure, when the Government in time of war is compelled, in the absence of other facilities, to resort to it for the purpose of transporting troops and munitions of war for the defense of the national capital.

The line formed by the connection of the Raritan and Delaware Bay and of the Camden and Atlantic City railroads is claimed to create a competing route with the line of the Camden and Amboy railroad between New York and Philadelphia; and though public convenience and the necessities of commerce may demand the opening of this line for thorough business, the courts of New Jersey interpose and declare that under the laws of New Jersey and the charter to the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company no such competition can be permitted.

This bill which declares this competing line a lawful structure, in my judgment, proposes to do no wrong. If we pass it we simply recognize what already exists, and what I believe to be necessary to this country, not only for the emergencies of war, but for the peaceful purposes of commerce. The question is one of power alone, and that is a constitutional question to be decided by the courts of the United States. The parties who ask our action have no remedy in the courts of New Jersey, for the monopoly which controls the other lines controls the courts, controls the Legislature, controls the people, and rightfully, in all probability, hold that they are bound by the legislation of New Jersey. These companies have no prospect of continued being except by the interposition of Congress. If we recognize them their rights can be adjudicated by the Federal courts, and that is all that they desire.

I have another reason for supporting this bill, and it arises from the fact that the Legislature of my own State has sent to its Representatives in this and the other end of the Capitol the joint resolution of the Senate and Assembly instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to use all their power and influence in the promotion of increased facilities for communication by railway between the cities of New York and Washington. When I call to mind that the line owned by the parties who solicit our interposition is as convenient and expeditious, and is able to compete with the old line for business between New York and Philadelphia; when I remember that this may, by appropriate connections, be made a part or link in a more perfect system of railway communication between the commercial and the political capitals of the Republic, I cannot be unmindful of the wishes of my State, and am bound to see if, in the accomplishment of their wishes, I can fairly and judiciously support this measure.

The desire for improved communication between the North and Washington is universally expressed from the deep conviction of its necessity. It comes from men of all classes and all interests, and every man who becomes a passenger over the route becomes a convert to the propriety of the improvement. For more than twenty years I have been interested in the railway system of this country. A large proportion of the little I possess of worldly commodities has been, and is this day, invested in railroad securities and railroad enterprises; and therefore I would not knowingly commit myself to any principle of legislation by which the great system of railroad development and communication could be unjustly affected.

I am a firm believer in the necessity for railway organizations and in their beneficent agency in the prosecution of those great enterprises for the purpose of intercommunication which can be accomplished only by the aggregation of the capital of numerous associates. I am disposed to give to such organizations all proper privileges and all just protection. But, sir, when I consider the grounds which are urged here by honorable gentlemen against the passage of this bill a question arises which seems to me paramount to every personal and private consideration, and which appeals to our conscientious and intelligent judgment, upon the powers with which this Government is clothed by the Constitution. We are told that this Government has no right to intervene, that it has no right to step upon the sacred soil of New Jersey and lay its hand upon a monopoly which under the authority of local law erects a barrier across the highway of the national commerce. They tell us that New Jersey is a supreme and sovereign State, and that, regardless of any power in the Federal Constitution, she may create monopolies with the absolute, undisputed, and exclusive authority to regulate that commerce between New England, New York, the West, and the South, whose natural pathway is across her plains. When I hear such principles of State sovereignty openly asserted and advocated by gentlemen upon this floor, I feel inclined to the support of this bill, regardless of every other consideration whatever.

Sir, if I correctly understand the theory of this Government, if I truly appreciate the vital and paramount power of our Constitution, the Federal Government is absolute and supreme throughout every Territory and State, for every purpose for which a national jurisdiction was conferred by or implied in the Constitution. That sacred instrument gives to Congress, not by inference, not by implication, but by express word, not only the power but the exclusive power of regulating commerce with foreign nations and between the several States.

What is commerce? It is the interchange of property and production between cities and cities, between States and States, between nations and nations. It embraces the transit of persons from foreign countries to this country. It embraces the transit of all persons from any State in this Union to and from and through every other State of the Union. It relates as well to the vessel and its freight as to the rivers, the canals, or the lakes. It relates to all the channels, avenues, instruments, agencies, and incidents of intercommunication. It relates to railroads and to trains, as well as to rivers and steamers. This is the commerce, foreign and domestic, which for the wisest reasons of policy and necessity was left to the exclusive control of the Congress of the United States. We meet the power almost on the threshold of the Constitution; and let me remind this House that the necessity for conferring this power upon the General Government was one early and clearly perceived, and was insisted on before the adoption of the Constitution, and even before the signing of the Articles of Confederation by the New Jersey delegates to the Convention. Yet the New Jersey of to-day resists the exercise of the power.

The gentleman from Maryland, my honorable friend on my left, [Mr. H. WINTER DAVIS,] who addressed the House yesterday, alluded in eloquent and glowing terms to the wisdom and sagacity of the framers of the Constitution. He always speaks well and eloquently, and although I may not say of him, what Johnson said originally of Goldsmith, and another applied to the philosopher, learned, and eloquent Burke, "There is nothing that he does not touch; he touches nothing that he does not beautify," I may say that there is no subject which he considers that he does not illumine by the fire of his intellect, and grace with the classic purity of his diction. Without pretending to recall his precise language, I will simply reproduce the idea that human wisdom never before in the structure of civil government embodied in such brief terms so much of forecast and of wisdom as are exhibited in our Constitution, and that nothing could be more significant of the profound wisdom of its framers than the simple fact that, no matter to what tests the Government of the Constitution has been subjected, no matter through what fiery ordeals it has passed, no matter by what danger of treason and rebellion it has been surrounded, there is still found within it provision for every emergency, and every power essential to its preservation.

It was this spirit of prescience which dictated in such simple and concise terms that "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States."

When the Constitution was adopted, the old States of the Union lay stretched along the shore of the Atlantic, while the now teeming and populous West remained an unbroken and uninhabited wilderness. The fathers of the Constitution with prophetic eye looked into the future and saw far off, along the lakes and beyond the Alleghenies, "the star of empire lead the way." They saw State after State come forth from the shadows of the forest to join their sisters of the East in enlarging the area and increasing the power of the American Republic. It was for this reason that the Constitution gave to Congress the power to effect from its Territories new States, which might be admitted into the Union with all the rights and privileges of original States. And when this vast wilderness should be peopled, when the resources of these new States should be developed, when with their unlimited productions they should seek the avenues of commerce to other States or to the ocean, who should control those avenues, who should direct that commerce? If the control of commercial communication rested with the Atlantic States, the entire West, having no natural channels to the ocean, might be forever excluded from participating in the advantages thus enjoyed by the elder sisters of the Republic, and it was to establish equality of right and of privilege between all that the regulating of commerce was committed to the care of the national Congress.

By way of illustration, Mr. Speaker, let me refer to the physical position of New England, New York, and New Jersey in our national organization. From the southern point of New Jersey, at Cape May, in latitude 39°, we have eight degrees to the northern boundary of Maine, in latitude 47°. From the Canadian boundary there stretches the mountain chain of the Appalachians through New England and New York, broken only by the Hudson at the Highlands, and, passing southerly through northern New Jersey and Pennsylvania, terminates only in Alabama and Georgia. Throughout this almost continental distance but one single line is found practicable for water communication between the Atlantic and the lakes. That, sir, is through my own State, by the Hudson, through the valley of the Mohawk, and through the counties of Madison, Oneida, and other counties, where the northern spurs of the Appalachians sink into the plains. It was on this line, thus marked out by the finger of nature as the great highway of commerce between the valley of the Mississippi and the Atlantic, that the genius of Clinton constructed that vast work of internal improvement which has conferred upon my State her imperial name.

Now, sir, suppose that New York and New Jersey alone, thus virtually occupying the eight degrees of latitude from Cape May to the Canada line, thus holding the only possible water communication with the great West so long as the mountain ranges rear their crests toward heaven, had, under the pretense of sovereign right, authorized a corporation to construct the Erie canal, and for a consideration in hand paid, and in consideration of tolls and taxes to be paid upon every luckless passenger and every pound of freight transported or to be transported along and upon the canal, had given to such corporation for one hundred years an exclusive right to carry freight and passengers thereon from the Hudson to Lake Erie, and had moreover pledged their sovereignty to permit no other mode of transportation across said States which might or should compete with said canal in its business—no matter what improved means of transportation might be introduced; no matter what new avenues capital might be willing to open; no matter what increased speed and facilities might be secured by the invention of the locomotive and the railway—I think we should be forced to the conclusion that New York and New Jersey were in some slight degree exercising those very powers in the regulation of commerce which the Constitution declares shall be vested in Congress. If the argument is said to be weakened by the combination of two States in the proposition, it may be simplified by supposing that New Jersey, in her jurisdiction, extended over the territory of New York, and had alone granted a charter to the Delaware and Raritan Canal Company and the Camden and Amboy corporation to construct the improvement.

Sir, such is neither the policy nor the spirit of our institutions. The policy of this Government is to foster commerce by opening up to it increased facilities of intercommunication. That policy controls the governments of all those States where enterprise seeks the development of physical resources. Monopolies are among the things that were. Old restrictions and exclusive powers have been swept away by the power of public sentiment controlling legislative action in the enactment of general laws for internal improvements.

In Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin, and almost everywhere in the free States, the commerce of the country and the creation of new avenues for its convenience have been thrown open to free and unrestricted competition.

Sir, the State of New York, in her great canal, connecting the waters of the ocean with the magnificent system of Mediterranean seas, unrivaled on the globe in extent and beauty, held the key to the portals of the great West. In addition to $8,000,000 which were originally expended in the construction of her canal, she enlarged the structure at a cost of nearly twenty millions. To sustain this work she imposed no duties on the stranger which she did not impose on the citizen; and yet, when the railway and the engine came, as the gift of genius to civilization, New York, of her own free will, and while special charters were yet required, authorized the construction of railroad lines, side by side, from Albany to Lake Erie, and on their completion permitted them to transport passengers and freight, through or local, without tax or duty, and in direct competition with her own improvement. Sir, this was unanimous. No cry of exclusion or monopoly was heard at home or abroad. A new line of communication offered new facilities to commerce which commerce did not fail to improve. The lake marine increased with the demand for its employment, and still the increasing productions of the West demand new avenues. The New York and Erie railway opens a third, and that again is crowded to its utmost capacity. Production presses upon the facilities for transportation, and that which cannot be carried over the most expeditious and convenient avenues is forced to the mountain passage of the Pennsylvania Central.

What, sir, is the result of this free competition? In 1862 the revenues of the Erie canal were $4,000,000, while the income of the New York Central and Erie was about ten million dollars each; and a singular feature in the history of this immense and unfettered commerce is that even wheat and flour were transported from Chicago to New York at the same price per bushel or barrel by the lakes and canal from Buffalo or Oswego, by the lake, the New York Central and the Hudson, by the lakes and the New York and Erie, and by rail exclusively over the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago and the Pennsylvania Central. Where, sir, would the West have been in its development and growth if New York, hugging the delusive phantom of corporate monopolies, had intrusted her destinies to the canal and the tow-path? Let the monopolists of New Jersey, if they would benefit the State and the country, imitate the liberality of New York and restore their State to freedom of commerce and of opinion and to the respect of the world.

Let me for one moment suppose that, instead of throwing the construction of commercial avenues open to free competition, the State of New York had authorized across it only a railroad, under stipulations of monopoly and protection like those granted to the Delaware and Raritan Canal and the Camden and Amboy Railroad Companies, what would our western friends have said when finding no way of reaching the East through New York save on one route, upon a single track, and under the direction and control of a monopoly careless of their comfort because they could not go elsewhere? What would our friends from the golden West, from California, true and faithful to the Union from the beginning, have said, if in every State, from Nevada to Maryland, they had found monopolies established and protected by law, with a right to impose a tax upon passengers for the benefit of the State simply because they were not so far dishonored as to be citizens?

In my deliberate judgment, sir, the principle claimed by the opponents of this bill is one that is constitutionally unsound, practically insufferable and unsafe, and not to be recognized by those who claim for the Government that supremacy in matters of general and national concernment which is vested in it by the necessities of its being, and by the express or implied language of the Constitution. The recognition of that principle concedes that the regulation of commerce is in the States, exclusively, and not in the Federal Government.

I do not pretend nor claim that under the Constitution the Federal Government has in all things absolute power. It is a Government of limited powers, but whenever power is conferred by word or by necessary implication, which is essential to a national Government, and the exercise or reservation of which by the States would be incompatible or inconsistent with the duties and obligations devolved upon the Federal organization, then and there I hold the Federal Government to be as supreme and absolute as if no State lines existed between the oceans, and no State governments exercised political authority. Now, when Congress is charged with the power to regulate commerce, its failure to fulfill its entire functions is no abandonment or extinguishment of the power. The functions may be exercised at will, and in subordination to expediency, as the power to establish post offices and post roads, or to declare war, or to create a navy. The power lies dormant, yet neither dead, nor shorn of its full vigor. Congress has therefore permitted to the States, and very properly, too, the control of the domestic commerce of the country, and the creation of its avenues, subject only to the interference of Congress whenever the general good or the public and national necessities demand such interference.

The forbearance of the Government is urged as evidence of its want of original authority. It is even said that the decisions of the courts have been adverse to the exercise of such power by Congress; and the honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] has here criticised some of the cases cited in the report of the committee, and has also read largely from the opinions of the chancellor of New Jersey to sustain his position. I cannot exhaust the brief hour allowed me for discussion by any professional criticisms upon judicial opinions; but I undertake to say the adjudications of our Federal courts expressly recognize the existence in Congress of the power claimed by the committee in their report, that this power relates to the vehicle of transportation as well as to the thing transported, to persons as well as to property, and to every incident of commerce between foreign Powers and the States, or between one State and any other State. I maintain, moreover, that the jurisdiction of Congress is supreme and exclusive over the entire subject and all its incidents; that if the power be granted, the selection of the means and agencies essential to the full and perfect execution of the power is in Congress, and nowhere else; and that whatever judgment it may exercise in the employment of the means, the means selected in its discretion are lawful, if the end be lawful and the means be adapted to the end.

In support of these general propositions I will present, without comment and without special order of arrangement, the following authorities.

In Martin vs. Hunter's lessees, 1 Wheaton, 324, the court say:

"The Constitution of the United States was ordained and established not by the United States in their sovereign capacities, but, as the preamble declares, by the people of the United States. It was competent for the people to invest the national Government with all the powers which they might think proper and necessary, to extend or limit those powers at their pleasure, and to give to them a paramount or supreme authority. The people had a right to prohibit to the States the exercise of any powers which were in their judgment incompatible with the objects of the general compact, to make the powers of the State governments in given cases subordinate to those of the nation, or to reserve to themselves those sovereign attributes which they might not choose to delegate to others."

In McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, 4 Wheaton, 316, the court say:

"The Government of the Union is a Government of the people. It emanates from them, its powers are granted by them, are to be directly on them and for their benefit. It is supreme within the sphere of its action. It is authorized to select the means to execute any power granted. If the end be legitimate, and within the scope of the Constitution, all the means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, and which are not prohibited, may be constitutionally employed to carry it into effect."

That the regulation of commerce is by the Constitution committed to Congress no one can dispute, and on the regulation of commerce the courts thus speak of the power of Congress. In 14 Peters, page 570, their language is:

"All the powers which relate to our commerce are conferred to the General Government."

"When an authority is granted to the Union to which a similar authority in the States would be absolutely and totally contradictory and repugnant, then the authority to the Federal Government is necessarily exclusive."

In Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, page 196, Chief Justice Marshall, in speaking of the power of Congress to regulate commerce, says:

"It is the power to regulate, that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce shall be regulated. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than those prescribed in the Constitution. The power over commerce is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single Government having in its constitution the same restrictions."

References might be made without limit, asserting the power for which we contend.

I have already alluded, Mr. Speaker, to the marvelous brevity of expression in the Constitution. In a few printed paragraphs it becomes the organic law of a vast empire and of many generations. We find in it these words among the enumerated powers of Congress: "to establish post offices and post roads." There the grant ceases; there is not a letter beyond. The establishment of post offices and post roads by no means implies of necessity that after designating post offices and the routes over which the mails might be carried, anything else must or should be done. But yet under the implied authority derived from these few words a thousand locomotives to-day traverse the States over the iron pathway, bearing the intelligence of commerce and the regards of friendship. The courier posts his dangerous way across the western plains, and every State and county and town is netted over by lines of mail transportation. Splendid structures in our great cities, and the magnificent edifice at the capital, dedicated to the postal system of the country, indicate the liberal construction demanded by the public of constitutional terms. Under this same power Congress has stretched its arm over the ocean; and from New York and Philadelphia lines of steamships running to the eastern continent, and to our own western shores, aided and subsidized by the Government, have been made its agents for a postal system outside of the country and outside of the letter of the Constitution. Yet, sir, it is claimed on the other side of this House that we have no powers under the Constitution save those expressly delegated by its terms.

I may add also that this power of regulating commerce has often been exercised in the creation or improvement of its internal channels, as in the Cumberland road and the Louisville canal. It has been exercised in the erection of light-houses on the ocean, and on those lakes lying in the heart of the continent, whose commerce, half told, far exceeds the foreign commerce of New York.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, we have the power to pass this bill. I now ask, granting the power, will its exercise in this case be just or expedient? I hold that wherever an exclusive right is given, connected with the performance of an act contributing to the public interest and convenience, like the grant to a railroad or ferry company, it is a grant upon condition that the company enjoying the right shall fully and at all times perform the duties growing out of the new relations to the public, so that the public, for whom the State is but the trustee, shall not be prejudiced in the premises. A charter authorizing the erection of a bridge and the exclusive enjoyment of it for the crossing of passengers for a given distance, demands the construction of the bridge in reasonable time and its permanent maintenance, or the exclusive right ceases.

If reports are true, the railroad through New Jersey has failed, utterly failed, to meet the demands of the public. It has asserted principles and adopted practices in respect to the transportation of freight and passengers which, in my judgment, are in conflict with the laws and Constitution of the United States. Those who are not residents of the State and who are transported across it are compelled to pay tolls to the State, while residents of the State passing from point to point on the line are exempt from payment. And the same discrimination is made between its through and its local freights.

Mr. STARR. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to correct his statement?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. STARR. I understand the gentleman to say that citizens of New Jersey have not to pay the same toll for traveling on the railroad as citizens of other States have to pay on crossing the State of New Jersey. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. The tax of ten cents is paid upon all persons carried on the road of the company.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a letter from the attorney general of New Jersey, in which he gave an opinion in regard to the obligation of this company to impose this tax on the citizens of New Jersey. He says that unless the citizen pass across the State from New York to Philadelphia, the company is under no obligation to report him for the payment of the tax. I am told that the company does not report the passenger nor pay the tax in such case.

Mr. STARR. The position now taken by the gentleman from New York differs from his former one. He said that the citizens of other States were taxed for crossing the State, while the citizens of New Jersey were not taxed. Now he says that the attorney general held that the joint companies were not bound to report those citizens carried between the banks of the Delaware and the Raritan rivers.

This, sir, is a different issue; and although the attorney general may have so decided, yet the joint companies, in point of fact, do report them and pay the tax upon such transportation.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Sir, I have no desire to do injustice to this company. I have no doubt that the directors are intelligent, sagacious, and able men. I do not question their standing and respectability; but I do know that whenever power is conferred upon any corporation, that power will be exercised if it be for the benefit of the corporation to do so. I doubt much whether a critical examination of the books of the company will not show that the taxes have been paid by persons outside, and not by residents of New Jersey.

But, sir, the gentleman's argument concedes the fact and says that the companies pay their taxes in such cases of their own volition and not by legal compulsion. My complaint is of the law.

Again, I say that every citizen outside of New Jersey suffers an imposition in another respect, which I will show by a reference to the reports of the company. I will take the report of 1848, from which it appears that in the month of May, 1848, 34,924 $\frac{1}{2}$ way passengers were transported 841,604 miles, at the average charge per mile of one cent seven and a half mills; and that 22,866 $\frac{1}{2}$ passengers were carried, through passengers, at the average charge of three cents five and a half mills. I ask the members of this House whether there is here any discrimination against the non-residents of New Jersey.

Mr. Speaker, I do not expect that any gentleman upon this floor representing any district of that State will rise to the support of this bill, for I have already stated that the Camden and Amboy monopoly controls the State of New Jersey. It controls the courts. It designates who shall hold the political power of the State, who shall sit in its halls of legislation, and sometimes, at least, it declares who on the floor of this House shall represent the sovereignty of Camden and Amboy. The Legislature is the executor of its sovereign will, and dares to pass no act in opposition to its dictates. Any improvident enactment might be repealed by a simple resolution of its board of directors.

One of the honorable gentlemen from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] who addressed the House alludes with great unction to the decisions of the supreme court of the State as decisive of the proposition that Congress has no right to interfere with exclusive powers granted to corporations of New Jersey for purposes of internal improvement.

I propose that this House shall pass this bill, which will enable the question of authority to be passed upon by the Federal courts, and then an appeal may be taken from such decision to the court of last resort, the supreme court of New Jersey!

The gentleman from New Jersey who addressed us yesterday on this bill [Mr. ROGERS] stated that this exclusive power was contained in the original act, and that thus a contract was created which could not be impaired. I beg to correct the gentleman. The original act was a simple charter, containing no exclusive rights whatever, and imposing no restrictions upon the power of the Legislature.

The next year after the passage of the act, and on the 4th of February, 1831, the Legislature, from pecuniary and possibly from wise considerations, enacted that the Camden and Amboy Railroad and Transportation Company might transfer to the State $100,000 of its stock without payment, and on which the company were to pay the same dividends as on other stock. The Camden and Amboy Railroad and the Delaware and Raritan Canal Company were soon after consolidated by authority of a statute, and on the 15th day of February,

38TH CONG...1ST SESS.

Republican Governments in Certain States—Mr. Davis.

HO. OF REPS.

1832, the State authorized the joint companies to transfer another $100,000 of their joint stock to the State, on the terms of the act of 1831.

Now, here in these acts we trace the gradual surrender of the dignity and independence of the State.

The first act of 1831 gave to the Camden and Amboy railroad protection against competition only during the pleasure of the State. The State reserved the right of creating a rival line, but in that event the stock given to the State was to be retransferred to the company.

The act of 1832 did contain a provision that it should not be lawful, during the continuance of the charter, to construct any other railroads in the State which should be used, or intended to be used, for the transportation of passengers and merchandise between the cities of New York and Philadelphia.

It is under this provision that the monopoly exists and asserts its right to control and regulate the commerce of a dozen States. Now, sir, for this exclusive power granted, the State has received in the taxes levied upon the through commerce of other States, inclusive of dividend upon its stock, the vast aggregate of $2,615,260 56 up to the year 1862, the amount increasing from year to year, and amounting in 1862 to $188,464 57. The entire civil list of the State and a large sum beyond is paid by these taxes upon the commerce of her neighbors. Thus this monopoly has realized an immense income from its exclusive privileges.

Thus I maintain that there exists within the State of New Jersey, under the local law of that State, an interference with and a restriction upon the commerce of the country unauthorized by the Federal Constitution, and which the Federal Government has the constitutional power to remove.

The honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] states that the improvements made by the joint companies have cost $13,000,000, and that they now owe $8,000,000 upon the bonds outstanding on account of such improvements. Does he suppose that there is no one here who understands the history of this corporation and dares to speak of what he knows? Let me tell you that these bonds have not been issued for construction, but to a great extent have been divided among the stockholders of the company, leaving a nominal corporate debt outstanding as a shield against public scrutiny into its income. The State of New Jersey holds, according to the last report of the company, $81,000 of these bonds as dividends upon the two thousand shares, or $200,000 stock of the corporations, amounting to more than forty per cent., and the same dividend was made upon the residue of the $3,000,000 of their joint capital.

This monopoly is not confined in its power to the State of New Jersey. Passing beyond the limits of the State to which it owes its being, it plants its foot upon the soil of Pennsylvania and becomes the purchaser of the Trenton and Philadelphia railroad, at a cost of about $1,000,000, and pays for it in its bonds, which are now presented as a part of the indebtedness for the original cost of the New Jersey roads. Besides this, it appears by its own reports that it has bought a controlling interest in other roads in New Jersey to the construction of which its assent has been given, as feeders to its own line for local business. It is a dangerous monopoly even when restricted within the limits of legitimate power; but when it shall confine itself to its appropriate functions, and fairly consult the interests of the public and the country, I will refuse to lay the weight of a finger upon it, but will faithfully lend whatever influence I possess to its full and perfect protection.

But I cannot as a member of this House, or as a citizen of this country, support any monopoly which in contravention of the power of Congress stands in the pathway of commerce between the East and the West, excluding half the States of the Union from their rightful participation in free and unrestricted and equal intercourse.

I do not know what the fate of this bill may be. I do not know what parties are interested in its passage, as the owners or creditors of the line sought to be protected. So far as I know, there is no man connected with it in any wise to whom I am under the slightest obligation. I have no interest in it, directly or indirectly, present or prospective, of any nature or kind whatever, and what I say here I speak from the control of principle and the conviction of duty.

The views I have expressed in respect to the dangers of monopoly are fully shared in, as I find, by the present or former officers of the Camden and Amboy railroad.

In 1846 an address was published by the directors of the company to the people of New Jersey. It appears from the paper which I hold in my hand that a proposition had been under discussion for the surrender of the exclusive privileges enjoyed, and the directors speak of what they regard as the wisdom of the State in refusing to permit the construction of rival and competing lines which might become weak and powerless through competition. In such case, says the address, "one company, more powerful than the rest, indirectly would become the owner of them all, and thus establish a gigantic, irresponsible, and hydra-headed monopoly; neither the interest of the State nor public convenience and safety would be subserved by such a system." We have, sir, now and here, the very monopoly whose gigantic power and hydra heads were regarded with so much apprehension. This monopoly exists in full power in the State of New Jersey; and the simple question before us is whether we have, and if we have whether we will exercise, the power of interference.

Sir, were I a citizen of New Jersey I should oppose the monopoly on another ground. It prevents the development of the physical resources of the State. Let me say to the Representatives of New Jersey that their State is a lamentable instance of the proof of this proposition. By glancing at the census of 1850 and 1860 I find that the three counties lying nearest to the city of New York—Union, Essex, and Hudson—in that decade increased their population 88,541, while the entire increase of the remaining eighteen counties was only 93,935, and that increase was almost entirely in those few counties which had been penetrated by those local lines of railway which either the interest or the magnanimity of the great monopoly permitted to exist. Thus we see that three single counties, open to improvement and accessible to intercourse, in a single decade keep even pace with all the residue of the State. Has New Jersey considered the immense enhancement in the value of lands accessible to railways, and thus open to the markets of the metropolis?

In my judgment there is no sound principle on which this monopoly should be endured, either under State or congressional legislation. It is entirely opposed to the theory that monopolies are grants upon condition. The privilege granted was by implication, if not in terms, that the corporation should furnish all the facilities which an ever-increasing commerce demands. To build a road alone could not be held the evidence of a right to exclude commerce if the road might not be operated. It must be operated and equipped with all the instruments and means to subserve the purposes of its creation, and if it fail in the fulfillment of its duties its exclusive right is forfeited to public policy and public interest. It becomes a public necessity, and no Government can divest itself either of the power or the duty of providing for the vital requirements of the people. Whenever such an emergency arises the monopoly should cease.

REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENTS IN CERTAIN STATES.

SPEECH OF HON. H. WINTER DAVIS,
OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 22, 1864.

On the bill (H. R. No. 244) guarantying to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, said:

Mr. Speaker, the bill which I am directed by the committee on the rebellious States to report is one which provides for the restoration of civil government in States whose governments have been overthrown. It prescribes such conditions as will secure not merely civil government to the people of the rebellious States, but will also secure to the people of the United States permanent peace after the suppression of the rebellion. The bill challenges the support of all who consider slavery the cause of the rebellion, and that in it the embers of rebellion will always smolder; of those who think that freedom and permanent peace are inseparable, and who are determined, so far as their constitutional authority will allow them, to secure these fruits by adequate legislation. The vote of gentlemen upon this measure will be regarded by the country with no ordinary interest. Their vote will be taken to express their opinion on the necessity of ending slavery with the rebellion, and their willingness to assume the responsibility of adopting the legislative measures without which that result cannot be assured, and may wholly fail of accomplishment. Their vote will be held to show whether they think the measure now proposed, or any which may be moved as a substitute, is an adequate and proper measure to accomplish that purpose. It is entitled to the support of all gentlemen upon this side of the House, whatever their views may be of the nature of the rebellion, and the relation in which it has placed the people and States in rebellion toward the United States; not less of those who think that the rebellion has placed the citizens of the rebel States beyond the protection of the Constitution, and that Congress, therefore, has supreme power over them as conquered enemies, than of that other class who think that they have not ceased to be citizens and States of the United States, though incapable of exercising political privileges under the Constitution, but that Congress is charged with a high political power by the Constitution to guaranty republican governments in the States, and that this is the proper time and the proper mode of exercising it. It is also entitled to the favorable consideration of gentlemen upon the other side of the House who honestly and deliberately express their judgment that slavery is dead. To them it puts the question whether it is not advisable to bury it out of sight that its ghost may no longer stalk abroad to frighten us from our propriety. It does not address itself to that class of gentlemen upon the other side of the House, if there be any, nor to that class of the people of the country who look for political alliance to the men who head the rebellion in the South, and say to them, let us

"Once more
Erect the standard there of ancient night;
Yours be the advantage all, mine the revenge."

It purports, sir, not to exercise a revolutionary authority, but to be an execution of the Constitution of the United States, of the fourth section of the fourth article of that Constitution, which not merely confers the power upon Congress, but imposes upon Congress the duty of guarantying to every State in this Union a republican form of government. That clause vests in the Congress of the United States a plenary, supreme, unlimited political jurisdiction, paramount over courts, subject only to the judgment of the people of the United States, embracing within its scope every legislative measure necessary and proper to make it effectual; and what is necessary and proper the Constitution refers in the first place to our judgment, subject to no revision but that of the people. It recognizes no other tribunal. It recognizes the judgment of no court. It refers to no authority except the judgment and will of the majority of Congress, and of the people on that judgment, if any appeal from it. It is one of that class of plenary powers of a political character conferred on Congress by the Constitution, such as the authority to admit new States into the Union, the authority to make rules and regulations for the government of the Territories of the United States. With reference to that class of cases, the Supreme Court, renouncing all right to judge on political questions, has said that these sections vested in the Congress of the United States plenary power over the subject-matters mentioned, subject only to the limitations contained in those sections. In the section to which I refer there is, and almost from the very nature of the case there can be, no limitation. It is intended to meet all the emergencies of the national life. It is intended to apply to events which human imagination could scarcely have pictured. And yet the great wisdom of the framers of the Constitution has in no particular been rendered more remarkably apparent—although their imagination could scarcely have reached the belief in the possibility of events that are to us familiar as household words—than in their having laid by, in the arsenal of the Constitution, the weapons to deal with this great danger.

What is the nature of this case with which we have to deal—the evil we must remedy, the danger we must avert? In other words, what is that monster of political wrong which is called secession? It is not, Mr. Speaker, domestic violence, within the meaning of that clause of the Constitution, for the violence was the act of the people of the States through their government, and was the offspring of their free and unforced will. It is not invasion, in the meaning of the Constitution, for no State has been invaded against the will of the government of the State by any power except the United States marching to overthrow the usurpers of its territory. It is, therefore, the act of the people of the States, carrying with it all the consequences of such an act. And therefore it must be either a legal revolution which makes them independent, and makes of the United States a foreign country, or it is a usurpation against the authority of the United States, the erection of governments which do not recognize the Constitution of the United States, which the Constitution does not recognize, and, therefore, not republican governments of the States in rebellion. The latter is the view which all parties take of it. I do not understand that any gentleman on the other side of the House says that any rebel government which does not recognize the Constitution of the United States, and which is not recognized by Congress, is a State government within the meaning of the Constitution. Still less can it be said that there is a State government, republican or un-republican, in the State of Tennessee, where there is no government of any kind, no civil authority, no organized form of administration except that represented by the flag of the United States, obeying the will and under the orders of the military officer in command. It is the language of the President of the United States in every proclamation, of Congress in every law on the statute-book, of both Houses in their forms of proceeding, and of the courts of the United States in their administration of the law. It is the result of every principle of law, of every suggestion of political philosophy, that there can be no republican government within the limits of the United States that does not recognize, but does repudiate, the Constitution, and which the President and the Congress of the United States do not, on their part, recognize. Those that are here represented are the only governments existing within the limits of the United States. Those that are not here represented are not governments of the States, republican under the Constitution. And if they be not, then they are military usurpations, inaugurated as the permanent governments of the States, contrary to the supreme law of the land, arrayed in arms against the Government of the United States; and it is the duty, the first and highest duty, of the Government to suppress and expel them. Congress must either expel or recognize and support them. If it do not guaranty them it is bound to expel them; and they who are not ready to suppress them are bound to recognize them.

The Supreme Court of the United States in declining jurisdiction of political questions such as these, in the famous Rhode Island cases, declared, by the mouth of Chief Justice Taney, in the Presidency of John Tyler, during the southern domination in support of the acts of John Tyler; that a military government, established as the permanent government of a State, is not a republican government in the meaning of the Constitution, and that it is the duty of Congress to suppress it. That duty Congress is now executing by its armies. He further said in that case that it is the exclusive prerogative of Congress—of Congress, and not of the President—to determine what is and what is not the established government of the State; and to come to that conclusion it must judge of what is and what is not a republican government, and its judgment is conclusive on the Supreme Court, which cannot judge of the fact for itself, but accepts the fact declared by the political department of the Government.

We are now engaged in suppressing a military usurpation of the authority of the State government. When that shall have been accomplished there will be no form of State authority in existence which Congress can recognize. Our success will be the overthrow of all semblance of government in the rebel States. The Government of the United States is then, in fact, the only Government existing in those States, and it is there charged to guaranty them republican governments.

What jurisdiction does the duty of guarantying a republican government confer, under such circumstances, upon Congress? What right does it give? What laws may it pass? What objects may it accomplish? What conditions may it insist upon, and what judgment may it exercise in determining what it will do? The duty of guarantying carries with it the right to pass all laws necessary and proper to guaranty. The duty of guarantying means the duty to accomplish the result. It means that the republican government shall exist. It means that every opposition to republican government shall be put down. It means that everything inconsistent with the permanent continuance of republican government shall be weeded out. It places in the hands of Congress the right to say what is and what is not, with all the light of experience and all the lessons of the past, inconsistent, in its judgment, with the permanent continuance of republican government; and if, in its judgment, any form of policy is radically and inherently inconsistent with the permanent and enduring peace of the country, with the permanent supremacy of republican government, and it have the manliness to say so, there is no power, judicial or executive, in the United States that can even question this judgment but the PEOPLE; and they can do it only by sending other Representatives here to undo our work. The very language of the Constitution and the necessary logic of the case involve that consequence. The denial of the right of secession means that all the territory of the United States shall remain under the jurisdiction of the Constitution. If there can be no State government which does not recognize the Constitution, and which the authorities of the United States do not recognize, then there are these alternatives, and these only. The rebel States must be governed by Congress till they submit and form a State government under the Constitution; or Congress must recognize State governments which do not recognize either Congress or the Constitution of the United States; or there must be an entire absence of all government in the rebel States; and that is anarchy. To recognize a government which does not recognize the Constitution is absurd, for a government is not a constitution; and the recognition of a State government means the acknowledgment of men as Governors and legislators and judges actually invested with power to make laws, to judge of crimes, to convict the citizens of other States, to demand the surrender of fugitives from justice, to arm and command the militia, to require the United States to repress all opposition to its authority, and to protect it from invasion—against our own armies; whose Senators and Representatives are entitled to seats in Congress, and whose electoral votes must be counted in the election of the President of a Government which they disown and defy! To accept the alternative of anarchy as the constitutional condition of a State is to assert the failure of the Constitution and the end of republican government. Until, therefore, Congress recognize a State government, organized under its auspices, there is no government in the rebel States except the authority of Congress. In the absence of all State government, the duty is imposed on Congress to provide by law to keep the peace, to administer justice, to watch over the transmission of decedents' estates, to sanction marriages; in a word, to administer civil government until the people shall, under its guidance, submit to the Constitution of the United States, and, under the laws which it shall impose, and on the conditions Congress may require, reorganize a republican government for themselves, and Congress shall recognize that government.

These, therefore, are the things which are involved in the duty of Congress to guaranty a republican government to the States. But we have not yet suppressed the insurrection. We are still engaged in removing armed rebellion. Is it yet time to reorganize the State governments, or is there not an intermediate period in which sound legislative wisdom requires that the authority of Congress should take possession of and temporarily control the States now in rebellion until peace shall be restored and republican government can be established deliberately, undisturbed by the sound or fear of arms, and under the guidance of law?

What is the condition of the rebellion at this time? I do not know that I express the opinions of gentlemen in this House, but, in my judgment,

"Doubtful it stands;

As two spent swimmers, that do cling together,
And choke their art."

Our arms have advanced deep into the regions of the rebellion; we have occupied a vast area wrested from its power; but to this day we have not expelled the rebels from any State they ever held.

There is no State some portion of whose territory is not pressed by rebels in arms whom we have not expelled or whom we cannot expel. There is no portion of the rebel States where peace has been so far restored that our military power can be withdrawn for a moment without instant insurrection. There is no rebel State held now by the United States enough of whose population adheres to the Union to be intrusted with the government of the State. One tenth cannot control nine tenths. Five tenths are nowhere willing to undertake the control of the other five tenths. Nowhere does such a proportion exist willing to do so, or if willing to do so, who can safely be trusted with the great powers of a State government, carrying with it the right of taxation, the existence of courts, the appointment of officers, the command of the militia, and besides the supremacy of the internal concerns of the State, the right to participate in the Government of the United States by Representatives, Senators, and electors, appointed by their uncontrolled dictation. In West Virginia that authority exists, and has been recognized. In no other State—the only one in respect to which a doubt can exist is Tennessee—in no other State is there such a portion of territory held, or any such portion of population under our control, or any such portion of it which is in our control inspired by such sentiments toward the Government of the United States, so free from fear of the returning wave of rebel invasion, so assured of the continued supremacy of the United States, that we ought to be willing to intrust them with this power. You can get a handful of men in the several States who would be glad to take the offices if protected by the troops of the United States, but you have nowhere a body of independent, loyal partisans of the United States, ready to meet the rebels in arms, ready to die for the Republic, who claim the Constitution as their birthright, count all other privileges light in comparison, and resolved at every hazard to maintain it.

The loyal masses of the South, of which we hear so much, what was their temper at the outbreak of the rebellion? what is their temper now? They did not want rebellion; they voted against secession; they acquiesced in the vote which decreed it; they went with their State; they were content to accept what they did not prefer but were unwilling to resist; they preferred Union with peace, but when Union and peace could not exist together, they yielded up the Union rather than make war to maintain it; and when the question was Union and war for it or disunion and war for it, they preferred war against the United States to war against the South. Whether it was that the doctrines of secession had ground themselves into the minds of men and become unconsciously the foundations upon which their thoughts rested; or that they thought the interests of slavery must necessarily be sacrificed in the event of a war and they were not willing to sacrifice it; or that the long strife on the negro question had deadened their national feeling; or that they had ceased to regard the people of the free States as fellow-citizens, and the horror of joining them against their southern brethren oppressed them like a nightmare; or the fear of making war at their own doors, and the drawing of the sword against their own friends and neighbors, or a conviction that the United States was no longer a power but a mere semblance of authority—a roi fainéant, whose mayors of the palace were merely clothing the reality of power long wielded with the forms of sovereignty—whether each or all of these were the motive, the fact is that after they voted against secession they acquiesced in the judgment of their friends and fellow-citizens. It is the most astounding spectacle in history that in the southern States, with more than half of the population opposed to it, a great revolution was effected against their wishes and against their votes, without a battle, a riot, or a protest in behalf of the beneficent Government of their fathers—a revolution whose opponents hastened to lead it, without a martyr to the cause they deserted except the nameless heroes of the mountains of Tennessee, or a confessor of the faith they had avowed save the illustrious Pettigru of South Carolina!

Doubtful of the issues of the war, exhausted by bloodshed, anxious for peace—peace and independence—there are some who will accept peace and Union, but they are not men who will draw the sword for the United States, and they would be equally content with peace and independence. When the overthrow of the rebellion is an accomplished fact they will acquiesce; when there shall be neither hope nor fear of rebel supremacy they will submit to what we judge to be necessary for their good and for ours if we will peremptorily declare the conditions necessary to secure republican government. But it is the veriest child's dream to suppose that so long as this war lasts, so long as its flames blaze over the southern country, any large portion of the southern population is willing to cast in its lot with the United States for good or evil, and assume now the responsibility that they declined at the beginning, of standing with us for better for worse, in ruin or in triumph.

There is no fact that we have learned from any one who has been in the South and has come up from the darkness of that bottomless pit which indicates such repentance. There is no fact that any one has stated on authority at all reliable that any respectable proportion of the people of the southern States now in rebellion are willing to accept any terms that even our opponents on the other side of the House are willing to offer them.

It has been repeatedly asserted—Governor Seymour, of New York, in his message asserted—that peace could be had upon any reasonable terms. That was his guess; it was his wish; it was his fond, vain hope. In fact there is no ground for such hope, and to-day no man can stand before the American people and say that there is the least reason to suppose that any public man in the South has declared himself willing to consider peace on any conditions but that of independence.

What, then, are we to do with the population in these States? To make "confusion worse confounded" by erecting by the side of the hostile State government a new State government on the shifting sands of that whirlpool, to be supported by us while we are there and to turn its power against us when we are driven out? That would be to erect a new throne where

"Chaos empire sits,
And by decision more embroils the fray
By which he reigns."

In my judgment it is not safe to confide the vast authority of State governments to the doubtful loyalty of the rebel States until armed rebellion shall have been trampled into the dust, until every armed rebel shall have vanished from the State, until there shall be in the South no hope of independence and no fear of subjection, until the United States is bearded by no military power and the laws can be executed by courts and sheriffs without the ever-present menace of military authority. Until we have reached that point this bill proposes that the President shall appoint a civil Governor to administer the government under the laws of the United States and the laws in force in the States respectively at the outbreak of the rebellion, subject, of course, to the necessities of military occupation.

It is the policy of an ancient soldier that I adopt:

"Trust none;
For oaths are straws, men's faiths are wafer-cakes,
And hold-fast is the only dog, my duck;
Therefore caveo be thy counselor."

When military opposition shall have been suppressed, not merely paralyzed, driven into a corner, pushed back, but gone, the horrid vision of civil war vanished from the South, then call upon the people to reorganize in their own way, subject to the conditions that we think essential to our permanent peace and to prevent the revival hereafter of the rebellion, a republican government in the form that the people of the United States can agree to.

Now, for that purpose there are three modes indicated. One is to remove the cause of the war by an alteration of the Constitution of the United States prohibiting slavery everywhere within its limits. That, sir, goes to the root of the matter, and should consecrate the nation's triumph. But there are thirty-four States—three fourths of them would be twenty-six. I believe there are twenty-five States represented in this Congress; so that we on that basis cannot change the Constitution. It is therefore a condition precedent in that view of the case that more States shall have governments organized within them. If it be assumed that the basis of calculation shall be three fourths of the States now represented in Congress I agree to that construction of the Constitution, which I understand to be that of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and not without countenance in high judicial quarters. I think it was never contemplated that the supreme political power should pass away from the Government of the United States. But that view will probably encounter as much doubt as the bill before the House, besides involving serious delay; and under any circumstances, even upon that basis, it will be difficult to find three fourths of the States, with New Jersey, or Kentucky, or Maryland, Delaware, or other States that might be mentioned, opposed to it under existing auspices, to adopt such a clause of the Constitution after we shall have agreed to it. If adopted it still leaves the whole field of the civil administration of the States prior to the recognition of State governments, all laws necessary to the ascertainment of the will of the people, and all restrictions on the return to power of the leaders of the rebellion, wholly unprovided for.

The amendment of the Constitution meets my hearty approval; but it is not a remedy for the evils we must deal with.

The next plan is that inaugurated by the President of the United States in the proclamation of the 8th December, called the amnesty proclamation. That proposes no guardianship of the United States over the reorganization of the governments, no law to prescribe who shall vote, no civil functionaries to see that the law is faithfully executed, no supervising authority to control and judge of the election. But if, in any manner, by the toleration of martial law lately proclaimed the fundamental law, under the dictation of any military authority, or under the prescriptions of a provost marshal, something in the form of a government shall be presented, represented to rest on the votes of one tenth of the population, the President will recognize that, provided it does not contravene the proclamation of freedom and the laws of Congress; and, to secure that, an oath is exacted.

Now you will observe that there is no guarantee of law to watch over the organization of that government. It may combine all the population of a State; it may combine one tenth only; or ten governments may come competing for recognition at the door of the Executive mansion. The Executive authority is pledged; Congress is not pledged. It may be recognized by the military power and may not be recognized by the civil power, so that it would have a doubtful existence, half civil and half military, neither a temporary government by law of Congress, nor a State government, something its unknown to the Constitution as the rebel government that refuses to recognize it.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us regard its operation on a great fundamental measure, the existence of slavery, the condition of future peace. How does it accomplish the final removal of slavery? How does it accomplish the reorganization of the government on the basis of universal freedom? The only prescription is that the government shall not contravene the provisions of that proclamation. Sir, if that proclamation be valid, then we are relieved from all trouble on that score. But if that proclamation be not valid, then the oath to support it is without legal sanction, for the President can ask no man to bind himself by an oath to support an unfounded proclamation or an unconstitutional law, even for a moment, still less till it shall have been declared void by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is the paramount right of every American citizen to judge for himself, on his own responsibility, of his constitutional rights; and an oath does not bind him to submit to that which is illegal. If, therefore, he shall have taken the oath, he can, in good conscience as well as in good law, disregard it the next moment. So that, in point of fact, the law leaves us where the proclamation does. It adds nothing to its legality, nothing to its force.

But what is the proclamation which the new governments must not contravene? That certain negroes shall be free, and that certain other negroes shall remain slaves. The proclamation therefore recognizes the existence of slavery. It does just exactly what all the constitutions of the rebel States prior to the rebellion did. It recognizes the existence of slavery, and they recognize the existence of slavery; and, therefore, the old constitutions might be restored to-morrow without contravening the proclamation of freedom. Those constitutions do not say that the President shall not have the right, in the exercise of his military authority, to emancipate slaves within the States. They say nothing of the kind. They do not even establish slavery. There is not a constitution in all the rebel States that formally declares slavery to be the supreme law of the land. They merely recognize it just as the proclamation recognizes its existence in parts of Virginia and in parts of Louisiana. So that the one tenth of the population at whose hands the President proposes to accept and guaranty a State government can elect officers under the old constitution of their State in exactly the same terms and with exactly the same powers existing at the time of the rebellion, and may under his proclamation demand a recognition. No man will say that there is one word in their laws that contravenes what purports to be a paramount, not a subordinate order. So soon as the State government is recognized the operation of the proclamation becomes merely a judicial question. The right of a negro to his freedom is a legal right divesting a right of property, and is to be enforced in the courts; and then the question is what the courts will say about the proclamation. Is it valid or invalid? Does it of itself confer a legal right to freedom on negroes who were slaves? Is it within the authority of the Executive? These are the only questions open under such a government; and how local State courts created by the southern people will decide such a question no one can doubt; for it is quite certain that the great mass of that population is devoted to the system of slave labor; and though if the question be whether they will give up slavery as the condition precedent to the restoration of a State government, they will abandon it; yet if it be whether they prefer to maintain or abolish slavery, there is not the least doubt that their voice would be almost unanimous for its maintenance. If they have the decision we know what it will be already. It is therefore under the scheme of the President merely a judicial question; to be adjudged by judicial rules, and to be determined by the courts. It is a question whether each individual negro be free. It is a question whether the master has the right of seizure, or the negro can control himself. It is to be determined by the writ of habeas corpus. It is a question of personal right, not a question of political jurisdiction. Its fate in the State courts is certain. Its fate in the courts of the United States under existing laws is scarcely doubtful.

I do not desire to argue the legality of the proclamation of freedom. I think it safer to make it law. But I wish to admonish gentlemen who rely on Dunmore's proclamation for the right of a military commander to free slaves in a civil war, that no slave is known ever to have claimed his freedom under it, though, if valid, there must have been many persons so entitled, and the courts of Virginia and of the United States were all open to them for its enforcement and their protection. When they cite the opinions of John Quincy Adams it must be remembered that he is on both sides of the question. He wrote instructions to our minister denying the right to emancipate and claiming compensation of England for slaves carried off in the last war, and insisted upon the question being decided by the Emperor of Russia. And it is further a material consideration that under that claim by authority of the United States and in the name of that predecessor of Abraham Lincoln, England paid divers pounds sterling to the citizens of the United States for negroes she took, as he alleged, in contravention of the laws of war. If the proclamation free a slave it diverts a right sanctioned by a law which he cannot repeal; and if it be not repealed, it would seem to protect the right it confers. Under the act of 1862 the President is authorized to use the negro population for the suppression of the rebellion; while the rebellion lasts his proclamation in law exempts the slave from the duty of obeying his master, but after the rebellion is extinguished the master's rights are in his own hands, subject only to the opinion of the courts on the legal effect of the proclamation, without a single precedent to sanction it, and opposed by the solemn assertions of our Government against the principle worked to authorize it. Gentlemen are less prudent or less in earnest than I am, if they will risk the great issues involved in this question on such authorities before the courts of justice.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Military Interference with Elections—Mr. Howard.

By the bill we propose to preclude the judicial question by the solution of a political question. How so? By the paramount power of Congress to reorganize governments in those States, to impose such conditions as it thinks necessary to secure the permanence of republican government, to refuse to recognize any governments there which do not prohibit slavery forever. Ay, gentlemen take the responsibility to say, in the face of those who clamor for speedy recognition of governments tolerating slavery, that the safety of the people of the United States is the supreme law; that their will is the supreme rule of law, and that we are authorized to pronounce their will on this subject. Take the responsibility to say that we will revise the judgments of our ancestors; that we have experience written in blood which they had not; that we find now, what they darkly doubted, that slavery is really, radically inconsistent with the permanence of republican governments; and that being charged by the supreme law of the land on our conscience and judgment to guaranty, that is, to continue, maintain, and enforce, if it exist, to institute and restore when overthrown, republican governments throughout the broad limits of the Republic, we will weed out every element of their policy which we think incompatible with its permanence and endurance. The purpose of the bill is to preclude the judicial question of the validity and effect of the President's proclamation by the decision of the political authority in reorganizing the State governments. It makes the rule of decision the provisions of the State constitution, which, when recognized by Congress, can be questioned in no court; and it adds to the authority of the proclamation the sanction of Congress. If gentlemen say that the Constitution does not bear that construction, we will go before the people of the United States on that question, and by their judgment we will abide.

Gentlemen must deny the jurisdiction of Congress over the States where there are no recognized governments, or place a bound or limit to the discretion of Congress. Until gentlemen find such a limit to the discretion of Congress under the paramount duty imposed, not conferred, upon Congress to guaranty republican governments, until gentlemen draw their line of demarcation and show that Congress has not the jurisdiction to remove what it thinks incompatible with the permanence of republican governments, I shall rest the argument where it is now. When they shall have attempted to lay down their line of demarcation, I will be ready to meet them with such opinions of the founders of the Government and those who in their footsteps have most wisely expounded its provisions as I may be able to find.

And if the sentiments of State pride and State rights be touched by the assertion of this wide discretion, which men may deny but cannot expunge, I would admonish those who dislike it that it is a jurisdiction which nothing but the dereliction of the States can wake into activity; and they who wish to exclude it from their limits have only not to give occasion for its exercise by renouncing obedience to the Constitution and pulling down their own State governments. But now the jurisdiction has attached in all the rebel States. Until Congress has assented, there is no State government in any rebel State, and none will be recognized except such as recognize the power of the United States. So that we come down to this: whether we—and when I say we I mean we upon this side of the House who are firmly, thoroughly, and honestly convinced that the time has come not merely to strike the arms from the hands of the rebels but to strike the fetters from the arms of the slaves, and remove that domineering and cohesive power without which we could have had no rebellion, and which now is its animating spirit, and which will die when it dies—whether we will exert the power which the Constitution confers upon us, and whether in our judgment—not in the judgment of our enemies—who have a majority in this House and a majority in the Senate; in our judgment, who now represent a majority of the people of the United States; in our judgment, who now support the Executive in this great war, whether in our judgment it is not time to assert that authority.

And if it be time, then all I ask in conclusion is, that gentlemen will go and read that great argument of Daniel Webster in the Rhode Island case before the Supreme Court of the United States, where he met this semi-revolutionary attempt to count heads and call that the people, and maintained—and so the Supreme Court judged when it refused to take jurisdiction of the question—that the great political law of America is that every change of government shall be conducted under the supervising authority of some existing legislative body throwing the protection of law around the polls, defining the rights of voters, protecting them in the exercise of the elective franchise, guarding against fraud, repelling violence, and appointing arbiters to pronounce the result and declare the persons chosen by the people. And he says, greatly to the honor of the American people, it would take him to the going down of the sun to enumerate the instances in which almost every constitution in the United States has been changed without one ever having been changed by a revolutionary process, not under the ægis of law, not guided by a preëxisting political authority. He maintained it to be the great fundamental principle of the American Government that legislation shall guide every political change, and that it assumes that somewhere within the United States there is always a permanent, organized legal authority which shall guide the tottering footsteps of those who seek to restore governments which are disorganized and broken down.

This bill is an effort to inaugurate in this great emergency, and to apply to the benefit of ourselves and our posterity this great principle of American political law which was expounded by the first greatest expounder of the Constitution.

Military Interference with Elections.

SPEECH OF HON. J. M. HOWARD,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

March 23 and 24, 1864.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 37) to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, from interfering in elections in the States.

Mr. HOWARD said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The bill now under consideration bears the following title: "A bill to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, from interfering in elections in the States." It is, sir, an extraordinary bill, and has been attempted to be supported by an extraordinary speech. The bill is extraordinary, not only in respect to the time in which it is presented for consideration by Congress, but for the unconstitutional results at which it aims; and still more extraordinary for the strange military results it contemplates.

The bill in its first section declares that no officer of the United States, in the military or naval service of the Government, shall "have under his authority or control any troops or armed men within one mile of the place where any general or special election is held, in any State of the United States of America." Did the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL,] who introduced it, contemplate the possible effect which might follow the enactment of such a clause? Did he foresee that it might so happen in the operation and execution of such a provision, that a rebel army in full battle array might be within the circle of one mile around a poll at which a general or special election might be held, in some one of the States—for example, Kentucky—and that the effect of the law of which he was the proposer would be to prohibit, absolutely, any attack being made upon that rebel force within the magic line extending upon a radius of one mile around the poll? Is it possible that he intended to paralyze the arm of the Government, and to forbid the armies of the United States from giving battle to the enemy if the enemy happened to be posted within this magic circle? He alone can answer the question; but that such would be the effect of this clause is apparent to all. Sir, if it were a law, the poll would not only become the sanctuary for traitorous voters, but the sanctuary of a rebel force, and we should present to the world the singular spectacle of a hostile armed force upon our own soil, within our own jurisdiction, and a law of the United States prohibiting the Army of the United States in any way to attack that force, because, forsooth, it happened to be within that circle. Sir, it is impossible that any such act of fatuity and madness can ever pass the Congress of the United States, whatever may have been its intention and whatever its origin. In this respect it would be an act to disarm the Government and to lay it prostrate and helpless at the feet of its foes. Certainly, sir, no friend of the Government could for a moment entertain a scheme so wild, so suicidal.

The bill proceeds, and declares that "it shall not be lawful for any officer of the Army or Navy of the United States to prescribe or fix, or attempt to prescribe or fix, by proclamation, order, or otherwise, the qualifications of voters in any State of the United States of America, or in any manner to interfere with the freedom of any election in any State, or with the exercise of the free right of suffrage in any State of the United States;" and it punishes all violations of this clause by a fine not less than $200, and not exceeding $20,000, and imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than two years nor more than twenty years, and forever disqualifies the party guilty of such violation from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States.

Now, sir, it will not be denied that this is a novel measure. There has not been, in the legislative history of the Government, from its foundation down to the time of the introduction of this bill, so far as I have been able to ascertain, any precedent for such a measure as this. No member of Congress, during the troublous times which succeeded the close of the revolutionary war, ever took upon himself to propose so singular a measure. We have passed through rebellions since the organization of the Government, and no such measure has been suggested. We passed through a bloody and terrible war with Great Britain, commencing in 1812 and closing at the close of 1814; a war which produced a strife of parties within the United States almost as bitter as that which now prevails; a war in which a large portion of the people were denounced by their political adversaries as disloyal to the Government, and still no precedent of this kind was ever set in Congress. Congress was never called upon to pass an act so anomalous, so unconstitutional; for, as I shall show directly, this bill, so far at least as it relates to elections held within the States for State officers, is entirely without any warrant in the Constitution of the United States.

Military Interference with Elections—Mr. Howard.

But, sir, this measure is brought forward at an unpropitious time, at a time when the country is engaged in war, a civil war, a struggle against an immense armed rebellion which calls for the exertion of all the faculties, all the power of the Government, all its means, and for the exercise of every patriotic quality which belongs to American freemen; a civil war, sir, of vast proportions, one in which it is the duty of every man, where ever he may reside, in some manner to participate for the purpose of upholding and maintaining the Government of his country. I say, sir, it is a civil war; it is not a mere local revolt, or a local insurrection. In the strictest sense of the law of nations it is a civil war, it has been so adjudged to be by the Supreme Court of the United States. Let me read from Vattel what he considers to be a civil war, and what are the rights and duties growing out of it. He remarks:

"A civil war breaks the bands of society and government, or, at least, suspends their force and effect; it produces in the nation two independent parties, who consider each other as enemies, and acknowledge no common judge. Those two parties, therefore, must necessarily be considered as themselves constituting, at least for a time, two separate bodies, two distinct societies. Though one of the parties may have been to blame in breaking the unity of the State and resisting the lawful authority, they are not the less divided in fact."

And again:

"This being the case, it is very evident that the common laws of war—those maxims of humanity, moderation, and honor which we have already detailed in the course of this work—ought to be observed by both parties in every civil war. For the same reasons which render the observance of those maxims a matter of obligation between State and State, it becomes equally and even more necessary in the unhappy circumstance of two incensed parties lacerating their common country."

The state of things now existing in the United States is one to which this definition of this learned author particularly applies. It is, sir, a war involving in it all the rights of belligerents, so far as the Government of the United States is concerned, and many of the duties of belligerents. It is not a foreign war; it is a war in which citizens of the same common country are engaged upon each side; but there exists between the two classes of citizens by no means the same obvious territorial distinction which exists between the subjects of two belligerent Governments which are, in law, foreign to each other and independent. There must be more or less intermingling of the belligerent citizens upon the one side and the other. The two Governments being, in respect to each other, not foreign and independent, but their citizens being citizens of the same common Government, and in law subject to the same authority, there cannot be drawn between them that exact line of distinction which exists between the subjects of two belligerent foreign Governments at war with one another; and hence there will be in the minds of many a certain degree of hesitation, doubt, and uncertainty as to the belligerent rights of these two parties engaged in the war, so far as their subjects are concerned; yet there is, because there must be somewhere, a test, recognized by the law of war, which is to determine the treatment that one party may exercise toward the subjects of the other, and by which one party may be known from the other. It is that line of demarkation which divides the loyal from the disloyal. It is the test and touchstone by which the heart of every citizen is to be tried, and by which it is to be determined whether he is in favor of the old Government or whether he is opposed to it. All those who in their hearts are friendly to the old Government, who are willing to support and uphold it, are loyal—they have the rights of loyal belligerents; while all those who in their hearts are opposed to the old Government, or even indifferent to its preservation, who are willing to destroy and overthrow it, or to see it destroyed or overthrown, and especially those who directly or indirectly give actual aid and comfort to the rebellion, are disloyal, and are to be treated as enemies. I know of no other rule by which a distinction can be established between the two classes, loyal and disloyal.

In the midst of this clash of arms, while the whole hemisphere is lighted up by the lurid flames of war, extending from the Atlantic ocean far west to the Rocky mountains, while every loyal man is filled with anxiety for the final result of the contest, while along this frontier, marked by a line of bristling bayonets for more than fifteen hundred miles, the war is waging with fury, and the line itself constantly fluctuating, the Senator from Kentucky brings forward a bill prohibiting the military authorities, in any case, in any manner, to interfere with what he calls the freedom of election in the States, severely punishing military men for fighting battles, in certain cases, as well as for preventing the enemy himself from participating in State elections!

That honorable Senator will admit that for a measure so novel in its provisions, so extraordinary in the results which it aims to accomplish, there should be evidence of some great and intolerable evil which may be cured by such a measure. It is not sufficient that there may be a few trifling instances of wrong and misuse of military power; the evil should be so enormous as to address itself to the conscience of every member of the Senate, and the evidence of it so clear and overwhelming as to leave no doubt or hesitation in the mind. I shall show, I think, before I conclude my remarks, that there is no such evil; and that if there be any evil of even considerable magnitude, the evidence of its existence has not been presented to us by the honorable Senator from Kentucky or any other member in such form as to deserve our serious attention.

And, sir, in limine, I have to say in respect to this bill, that it contains a provision which, in my judgment, is utterly unsupported by any clause of the Constitution of the United States, and is as clearly obnoxious to the objection of unconstitutionality as any bill which has ever been presented to the Senate. I admit that, if Congress were so unwise, it might, by a statute, direct the Commander-in-Chief of the armies not to employ the troops of the United States within any given place, whether that place be within a mile of a poll or elsewhere, because I hold that the war-making, war-conducting power, in all its varying forms and phases, is lodged in Congress, and that they have a right, if they choose to do so, at all times to direct the movements of the Army; to declare what expeditions shall be sent out and for what purpose; to declare where the Army shall march, where the Navy shall operate, and to do anything and everything in reference to the management of the Army and the Navy in the conduct of a war. This is within their power under the Constitution. I yield that point. If Congress were so unwise as to undertake, by special legislation, to strip the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States of the implied authority which belongs to him as such, they have an undoubted right to do so, leaving him only his rank of Commander-in-Chief. But, sir, when the Senator from Kentucky asks me to give my vote for a law which assumes to place in the hands of the Federal authorities the right and the power to enforce in a time of peace as well as war, as this bill does, the laws of the States respecting elections, or anything else solely pertaining to the States, I have to say to him he proposes an absurdity, and asks me to do a thing impossible to be done.

What is a State election, sir; and to what does it owe its existence? Simply and purely to the constitution or statutes of the State where it is held. The power of the State goes not only to the extent of defining the qualifications of a voter at a State election, but to that of regulating the times, the manner, and the places of holding such elections, and Congress has no power whatever over this subject except that it may, whenever it shall see fit, alter the State regulations in reference to the times, manner, and places of electing Representatives to Congress. But no power is given to Congress in any case whatever to change the qualifications which a State may see fit to require of its own voters. That is a power which is reserved to the States expressly, and with which Congress has nothing to do.

The State having this original power to prescribe the qualifications of its own voters, both in elections of the officers of the State and in the elections of members of the House of Representatives, I beg to know from what provision of the Constitution it is that the Senator from Kentucky derives the power of employing the courts or other authorities of the United States to punish persons who may violate a State law regulating elections or defining the qualifications of State voters? Whence does he derive the power to punish by Federal sentences in Federal courts violations of a law which it is competent for a State and a State only to enact?

Sir, it is sufficient only to state the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky to discover its complete absurdity. Such a provision of an act of Congress would be simply void, for the reason that there is no power under the Constitution of the United States authorizing it. And yet a Senator who has made louder complaints than any other in this body of a persistent and continued violation of the Constitution of the United States; a Senator whose voice is loud and vehement and bitter in his denunciations of repeated infringements of the Constitution by the votes of this body; who sees, or affects to see, the whole fabric of the Government going to wreck like an old raft passing over a cataract; a gentleman, of all others in this body, setting himself up to be the expounder and defender and vindicator of the Constitution, so far loses his own judgment, so far indulges in legislative experiments, as to ask Congress to interfere and punish every person in the military or naval service of the United States who shall violate a State law regulating State elections! Congress has no more power to punish a person for such an act than to punish him for interfering with any other State law; for instance, the law relating to the descent of estates, the distribution of property, the appointment of guardians, or any other act peculiarly within the province of State legislation.

Will the Senator tell me in reply that Congress have a right to inflict this punishment upon a man because he is in the military or naval service of the United States? Is this the ground upon which he rests his argument? Is the simple fact of such a relation of the party to the United States the fact which gives Congress additional power to execute State laws or punish persons who violate laws which are not Federal but State laws? No, sir. Such a proposition is not capable of argument. Men are placed in the military service of the United States for the purpose of acting in that capacity; and the power of Congress in such cases only goes to the extent of controlling and regulating their conduct according to the code of war; and there it stops. It cannot be pretended that because a man is a soldier in the Army and goes home and commits a murder in the State to which he belongs Congress therefore may declare by a law that he shall be tried and punished for the murder in a Federal court. The crime in such a case is committed against the peace and dignity of the State, not against the peace and dignity of the United States; and although if committed by him while in actual service and in the ranks he might be punished by court-martial, yet the offense would be against the code of war and not the laws of the State.

Let us then, sir, hear something less, if the Senator pleases, of these continued, bitter denunciations against the majority of this body for violations of the Constitution. For one, sir, I say to that Senator, I do not acknowledge him as a safe teacher. "Non tunc auxilio, nec defensoribus istis:" Give us no such aid, no such defenders.

The bill then, sir, so far as it undertakes to punish persons employed in the Army and the Navy for interfering with State elections—I mean the election of State magistrates and State officers—is utterly void and utterly impracticable. What right have we to say to a soldier in the service of the United States in time of peace—for I intend to confine this exclusive power of the States to a period of peace—who goes to a poll in Kentucky and assumes to prescribe to the voters of that State some qualification forbidden or not recognized by the laws of Kentucky, "You are committing an infraction of a law of the United States?" What right have we, in other words, to punish him for an offense which in its nature and essence is solely an offense against Kentucky? None whatever, sir.

Certainly, Mr. President, I could not have anticipated that a doctrine such as this could have proceeded from a gentleman affecting to be so tenacious of State rights, so preëminent for his attachment to what he regards as the reserved rights of the States, and who asserts so loudly, so emphatically, and so habitually, upon this floor, that Congress is daily guilty of the crime of violating them.

Sir, what may be the real purposes of this bill I shall not undertake to say; but it may aid us somewhat to form a judgment touching those purposes to refer to the principles which lie beneath it; to refer to the origin and fountain of the measure; and at the expense of some little weariness on the part of the Senate, I must take the liberty of reading a few passages relating to the honorable Senator who has introduced it. This will, perhaps, assist us in divining the great object which lies beneath it.

It will be remembered, sir, that only about two years ago the colleague of the honorable Senator rose in his place in this Chamber and offered a resolution asking the Senate to expel the Senator from this body for disloyalty; a fact which neither this body nor the country will hastily forget. It may aid us, as I said before, in our estimate of the purposes, the animus, of the measure, to refer to the declarations not only of the Senator from Kentucky, who is its author, but to those of his colleague. In introducing the resolution of expulsion against the author of the bill, Mr. DAVIS—I am obliged to call his name for distinction's sake—in the preamble of that resolution, recited the following facts:

"Whereas LAZARUS W. POWELL, a Senator from the State of Kentucky, after eleven States had published their ordinances of secession, by which to sever themselves from the Government of the United States, had formed a confederation and provisional government, and made war upon the United States, did, on the 20th day of June last, at the city of Henderson, in the State of Kentucky, attend a large southern State rights convention, over which he was called to and did preside; and, on taking his seat as president thereof, made a speech, in which he stated the object of said convention, and then appointed a committee, which reported to said convention a long series of resolutions that were unanimously adopted by it. Among those resolutions are the following:

"2. That the war being now waged by the Federal Administration against the southern States is in violation of the Constitution and laws, and has already been attended with such stupendous usurpations as to amaze the world, and endanger every safeguard of constitutional liberty."

"That the recall of the invading armies, and the recognition of the separate independence of the confederate States, is the true policy to restore peace and preserve the relations of fraternal love and amity between the States."

"6. That we heartily approve the refusal of Governor Magoffin to furnish Kentucky troops to subjugate the South; and we cordially indorse his recent proclamation defining the position of Kentucky, in accordance with the sentiment of her people, and forbidding the invasion of Kentucky by Federal or confederate troops."

"7. That although Kentucky has determined that her proper position at present is that of strict neutrality between the belligerent sections, yet, if either of them invade her soil against her will, she ought to resist and repel it by necessary force."

"The closing speech of this convention was made by Senator POWELL, and the resolutions passed by it, and a summary statement of its proceedings, were signed by him as its president."

"On the 10th of September last, while the Legislature of Kentucky was in session in the town of Frankfort, and after her territory had been invaded at two distant points by the confederate armies, and while Humphrey Marshall was employed in organizing and drilling an armed body of rebels in the contiguous county of Owen, a large southern State rights convention assembled and held its sessions in Frankfort, for the apparent purpose of overawing the Legislature, controlling its deliberations, and deterring it from passing measures to support the Union and the Government of the United States. LAZARUS W. POWELL was a delegate to that convention from the county of Henderson, and was appointed on its committee of resolutions. Among other resolutions, that committee reported these:

"Resolved, That every material interest of Kentucky, as well as the highest dictates of patriotism, demand that peace should be maintained within her borders, and this convention solemnly pledges the honor of its members to do all in their power to promote this end."

"2. That it is the deliberate sense of this convention and it is believed of an overwhelming majority of the people of Kentucky, that the best and perhaps the only mode of effecting this great object is by adhering strictly, rigidly, and impartially to her chosen and oft-declared position of neutrality during the existence of the deplorable war now raging between the sections; taking sides neither with the Government nor with the seceding States, and declaring her soil must be preserved inviolate from the armed occupation of either."

"3. That we consider it incompatible with the neutrality avowed by Kentucky to vote money for the prosecution of the civil war, or to tax the people of the State, or augment its debt for a purpose so unwise, and for a cause so hopeless as the military subjugation of the confederate States."

As to this Frankfort convention, Mr. DAVIS, in his speech on that occasion, remarked:

"This was a convention of most intense secessionists, and was attended by John C. Breckinridge and many of the leaders of that party from generally over the State. William Preston and R. W. Woolley, Esqs., made speeches to it fraught with the rankest treason, and denouncing the fiercest war against the United States. Its resolutions were unanimously adopted, and its business closed with the following one offered by Senator POWELL:

"Resolved, That Colonel William Preston, George W. Johnson, Esqs., General Lucius Desha, Captain Richard Hawes, and Thomas P. Porter, Esq., be, and they are hereby, appointed a committee of organization, in order to carry out the purposes of this convention; and full powers are conferred upon them for that object."

"Those men were thus commissioned in the cause of conspiracy, treason, and rebellion. By the warrant given them, on the motion of Senator POWELL, they went forth and organized, or advised and assisted in the organization of armed bands of traitors, and soon thereafter led them into the confederate camps, where they are yet struggling to consummate the disruption of the Union and the overthrow of the Constitution and laws of the United States. From the beginning of this great rebellion to the present time Senator POWELL has neither done nor said anything in Congress or out of Congress to strengthen or sustain the United States in this mighty struggle for national life."

No, sir; he had done nothing, he had said nothing to encourage the prosecution of this just and holy war to maintain and uphold the authority of his country. I am not aware, sir, that from the time this resolution of expulsion was presented down to the present moment the honorable Senator from Kentucky has here or elsewhere done an act, or given a vote, or said a word to promote the prosecution of this just war against those who would pull down the temple of liberty as established by our fathers.

The Senator's colleague, in the course of his speech on that resolution, speaking of the principles of the Senator to whom I am now alluding, said:

"They were as well known to me before I left the State of Kentucky to come to this city to take my seat as a representative in the Senate from that State, as they are at this day. With this full knowledge upon the part of my constituency and of myself, they have no more united or earnest desire than that my colleague should be removed from his seat."

Again, in the course of the same speech, the same Senator [Mr. DAVIS] said:

"Mr. President, it was a dreadful, and for a long time a doubtful, struggle in that State which party would prevail and control its destiny. The popular mind of the State of Kentucky had to be educated against all their sympathies, all their interests, all their business connections, and against the feelings and sympathies of their brethren in the South, before they could be induced to take position in favor of the Union and of their Government against them."

Again, this is the further testimony of the colleague of the Senator who produced this bill:

"Mr. President, what was the duty of my colleague at that time, that eventful and doubtful time? His position, his principles, his moral power as an ex-Governor of the State of Kentucky and as a Senator representing that State in the Senate of the United States, were all thrown against the Government of the Union and in favor of the rebellion and of the secessionists. I challenge him to produce a single act of his, public or private, from that time to the present, that ever evinced the least interest in or sympathy for his own Government, or the smallest purpose to support and uphold that Government according to the obligation of his constitutional oath. I challenge him to produce a single act, public or private, of his, the tendency of which was not to strengthen the rebellion, to give it complete and final success, to disrupt this Union, and to overthrow the Constitution of the United States."

The same Senator, quoting from a former speech of the author of the bill, furnishes us the following precious declaration:

"I say now that I am for enforcing the laws in all the States that are within the Union; but I am opposed to making war on States that are without the Union. I am opposed to coercing seceded States. That I have declared in this Chamber on more occasions than one, heretofore. I am utterly and entirely opposed to coercion. I have distinctly and explicitly declared that I believed that war on the seceding States would put an end to all hope of any reconstruction of the Union, and hold that no true lover of the Union can be in favor of coercion. I hold that we have no right under the Constitution to make war upon those States."—Congressional Globe and Appendix, 1860-61, part 2, page 1370.

Such, sir, were at that time, and I presume still remain, the political sentiments and predilections of the honorable Senator from Kentucky; holding it to be unconstitutional for the Government of the United States to wage war for the purpose of putting down the rebellion and restoring the Government and the authority of the Constitution. That question has been so often discussed that any observations on my part would be entirely supererogatory, and I dismiss it with the single remark that to my mind it is incredible that any man affecting to be friendly in any possible sense to the Government of the United States, can maintain the doctrine that under the Constitution the Government is entirely powerless to defend its own existence, utterly impotent to wield the sword of self-defense, leaving it a prey to every insurgent, every schemer who may see fit anywhere within or without the limits of the United States to make a foray upon it and to overthrow it. What an amazing absurdity, that a Government may make laws for its own citizens, own vast domains, and hold international relations with the sovereign Powers of the earth, and yet have no rightful authority to enforce its laws, dispose of its domains, or keep its engagements with other nations if resisted by rebellious communities under the name of States!

But, sir, I have not yet finished with the development of the principles of the Senator from Kentucky. I next call as a witness on that subject the Senator himself, in order that there may be no doubt or question as to his principles. In his speech, in reply to that of his colleague asking for his expulsion, the Senator used the following language:

"I distinctly avow here that I was in earnest and acted honestly in this whole matter of neutrality; and I had but one object, but one purpose, and that was to keep the war out of the borders of Kentucky, and to allow Kentucky, who had nothing to do with bringing on this war, who had been opposed to it, to stand as peace-maker between the belligerents with the single view of preserving the Union."

What, sir, Kentucky had nothing to do with bringing on this war! Who was the Vice President of the United States when the war broke out, occupying that chair which you, sir, now occupy? It was a distinguished citizen of the Senator's own State, "Old Kentucky." I hope and trust she has no other specimen of that kind of loyalty. I trust that the future of Kentucky will be free from the honor, if it was ever an honor, of producing a John C. Breckinridge, once Vice President of the United States!

I do not say that Kentucky as a community was particularly instrumental in bringing on the rebellion; but I say this, because I can say it with perfect historical truth, that there were few places, even within the States which afterwards absolutely seceded from the United States, in which the spirit of secession and rebellion was more virulent and rampant than in Kentucky; and it cannot be said with any truth that Kentucky took no part in bringing on this war, if it can be said with any truth that South Carolina, where the first shot was fired, took a part in bringing it on.

Again, the Senator from Kentucky, in the course of that speech, speaking of the President's call for seventy-five thousand troops to defend the capital at the first outbreak of the rebellion, said:

"I will state to the Senator and to the country the view that Kentucky took of that question, as far as I am advised. Kentucky believed that this call for seventy-five thousand men was not necessary for the defense of the capital or of the public property. She believed that the calling forth of such an immense armament was for the purpose of making a war of subjugation on the southern States, and upon that ground she refused to furnish the regiments called for."

Yes, sir, she did refuse to respond to the first call of a patriotic President. At a moment when the very existence of this capital was menaced, only a brief space after an attempt had been made by the conspirators to assassinate him on his journey to the capital; when it was perfectly well known here that the conspirators had made up their minds, if possible, to put him to death, to seize upon this capital and the public archives, and to establish Washington as the seat of confederate power; when the whole country was trembling with anxiety and amazement at the audacity of the conspirators; at that gloomy moment when the President of the United States was calling for seventy-five thousand men to rush to the seat of Government and save all from ruin, the Governor of Kentucky refused all aid, all sympathy, and the Senator denounced the call for troops as a wanton violation of the Constitution; and he now coolly informs us that Kentucky believed the call was not necessary for the defense of the capital or of the public property, and claims credit to himself for the discovery that Kentucky had nothing to do with bringing on the war!

Again, he said of Kentucky:

"She hopes, she wishes, she prays that this Union may be maintained. She believes that cannot be done by force of arms; that it must be done by compromise and concillation, if it can be done at all; and hence, being devoted truly to the Union, she desires to stay this war, and desires measures of peace to be presented for the adjustment of our difficulties." * * * "I think her position is one that should be admired and esteemed by all patriotic men, by all Christian men, by all men who love their country and love the Union."

That is, we are to disarm our troops of the United States, call home the navy now blockading the rebel ports, send home our armies, send a supplicating message to the infamous traitor chiefs who have been butchering our sons and brothers for three long years, and humbly ask them to sit down with us in some quiet nook and enter upon the discussion of conciliatory measures with a view to restore the Union and the authority of the Constitution! Sir, if that Senator still entertains this chimera, if he indulges in a dream so childish—I speak of course without any intention of personal disrespect—I venture to call his attention to a passage which I will read by way of correcting his opinions and dispersing the visions of conciliation which appear to be floating before his eyes. I read, sir, from an address signed by the members of the rebel congress in session at Richmond, and of a very recent date. They ask for no conciliation; for no interview; they ask for no mercy. They have a contempt for every friendly and amicable proposition which we could make to them having in view the restoration of the Union. They use this emphatic language:

"To prevent such effects our people are now prosecuting this struggle. It is no mere war of calculation, no contest for peculiar kind of property, no barter of precious blood for filthy hire. Everything involved in manhood, civilization, religion, law, property, country, home, is at stake. We fight not for plunder, spoils, pillage, territorial conquest. The government tempts by no prizes of 'beauty or booty' to be drawn in the lottery of this war. We seek to preserve civil freedom, honor, equality, firesides; and blood is well shed when 'shed for our family, for our friends, for our kind, for our country, for our God.' Burke said, 'A State resolved to hazard its existence rather than abandon its object must have an infinite advantage over that which is resolved to yield rather than carry its resistance beyond a certain point.' It is better to be conquered by any other nation than by the United States. It is better to be a dependency of any other Power than of that. By the condition of its existence and essential Constitution as now governed it must be in perpetual hostility to us. As the Spanish invader burnt his ships to make retreat impossible, so we cannot afford to take steps backward. Retreat is more dangerous than advance. Behind us are inferiority and degradation. Before us is everything enticely to a patriot."

Sir, the tone and style of that address evince no conciliation, no willingness on any terms to restore the old Union; and upon that subject I have never changed my opinion. We shall never restore the authority of the Government, never restore the Union of these States, until we have done it by the absolute subjugation of every rebellious district which now lies within the boundaries of the confederate States. It is a work of war, of violence, of earnest war, of earnest, thorough, and manly violence. That is the only instrument by which we can persuade "our southern brethren" to come back into the Union.

Again, sir, the Senator from Kentucky said in his speech in reply to the resolution for his expulsion:

"I have been opposed to the war, and for that offense my colleague wishes me expelled from the Senate; for that is the charge, that I have been opposed to coercion. In every act of my life, in this whole connection, I have opposed the war, and striven in Kentucky, in mass meetings and otherwise, to keep the peace, to keep the hostile armies of the confederate States and of the United States from our borders."

He had been striving to keep not only the troops of the confederate States but those of the United States from the borders of Kentucky. No matter, according to him, what may have been the designs of the rebels upon Kentucky, no matter though they may have invaded the State with an armed force, his diligence and his patriotism were employed and were satisfied with an effort, in whatever form he saw fit to make it—and I do not know in how many forms he may have sought to do so—to prevent the troops of the United States from marching upon the soil of Kentucky. I shall have a word to say as I proceed on the subject of the neutrality of Kentucky. I think it one of the great sources of all our woe, one of the most lamentable steps ever taken by public men, a plan utterly unconstitutional and utterly unpatriotic.

Thus for a moment, Mr. President, I leave the Senator from Kentucky and his avowed principles. That he is not favorable to the prosecution of this war is established not only by the testimony of his colleague, but by his own voluntary admissions. That he has never voted a dollar of money to prosecute the war, never voted to raise a soldier for this purpose, I presume is true, because both those acts would have been in direct conflict with his avowed principles. I therefore take it for granted that, although occupying his seat in this Senate, and although he has taken the oath which we have all taken to support the Constitution, he has for some reason, so far as this war is concerned, at least refused to obey that portion of the injunction of his oath that requires him to support the Constitution, and consequently the authority of the Government.

Sir, the war has been the principal subject upon the tapis in Congress from its commencement. It has been the theme of every tongue here and elsewhere in the United States. The patriot has been shedding his tears over the fate of son or brother engaged in prosecuting it. The mother has dismissed with her last blessing the only son of her love, and sent him to act the part of a hero in defending his Government against the rebellion. The whole loyal community have poured out their treasure like water in a vast effort to uphold the Government. And still, sir, the Senator from Kentucky has suffered to escape from his lips no word of sympathy for the cause, no vote for the prosecution of the war; but, on the other hand, so far as seems to have been practicable for him, he has on every occasion opposed all measures which have been suggested here for that end. Why has he taken such a course? Why has he cherished such principles? What has been, what is now his object? Let me cite briefly a historical incident which may possibly stand as an admonition for that Senator and those who sympathize with him in conduct and opinion.

After Napoleon had left the island of Elba and recovered the imperial throne of France from the Bourbons by one of the most remarkable military enterprises recorded in history, there was a certain statesman, long familiar with the Emperor, long his fast friend, or professedly so, but who toward the close of 1814 had fallen somewhat into disfavor, but who on the restoration of the Emperor was among the first to humble himself before him, to accept him as the sovereign of France. There was no man whose words were sweeter or more flattering to the ear of the Emperor than those of this statesman. As a compensation for his affected friendship and devotion the Emperor elevated him to the high position of minister of police, and the Duke of Otranto held the seals of that important department of the Government during the "hundred days." About the 1st of May an agent of Prince Metternich proceeded from Vienna to Paris with a letter written by some Vienna banker to a brother banker in Paris, on pure banking business, of course, having apparently no connection whatever with political affairs. But the agent becoming suspected was taken into custody, brought before another minister of the Emperor, and there put to a very severe interrogatory, in the course of which he was obliged to admit that he had received this letter from the prince himself, although upon banking business, and to admit, further, that there were interlined in this banker's letter a series of instructions from Prince Metternich to the Duke of Otranto, written in sympathetic ink, to be developed only by the application of some chemical preparation.

This letter was communicated to the Emperor, who immediately called his private confidential secretary, Baron Fleury de Chaboulon, and instructed him to assume the character of an emissary of Fouché and to repair to Basle, in Switzerland, at which point a certain Mr. Werner was to be sent by Prince Metternich, for the purpose of holding an interview. The secretary met Werner and they had a conversation, in the course of which Werner, Prince Metternich's agent, made the following suggestion: he said, with great suavity, to the secretary, (I translate from Les Cents Jours, by M. le Baron Fleury de Chaboulon, as the work has not been printed in English,) "that the Prince was persuaded that the Duke of Otranto had accepted the ministry of police only to be able to avert from France the misfortune of a civil and a foreign war, and that it was to Monsieur Fouché that the allied Powers committed the care and the honor of saving France from a new war."

That was the individual who took service under the restored Government, who remained in that Government until after the disastrous campaign of Waterloo. It was Fouché. The world has already fixed upon him an infamy as indelible as the mark on the brow of Cain, black as Erebus. Whether the cause in which he took service was good or bad, or the Government in which he remained was just or unjust, there is no man whose heart is so base, no man can ever live hereafter whose sentiments are so degraded, as not to despise the treachery of Fouché. Let me refer the Senator from Kentucky to this historical incident, if not as an illustration, at least as an admonition.

Mr. President, we are told by the Senator from Kentucky that the Government of the United States have no power to restrain persons who are rebels, or who are suspected to be rebels, from voting in the States. I do not agree with the Senator as to the power of the Government to prevent disloyal men voting at a State poll. In the present state of things every man who is not for us is against us. Every man, as I said before, who is not friendly to the Government of the United States in his heart is opposed to it. Every man who is not willing to use reasonable and ordinary means, military means, for defending and upholding it at such a moment as this, is an enemy of the United States, and deserves to be treated as an enemy.

I cannot better express my views on this subject, however, than they are already expressed in the report of the committee on the present bill, and I will therefore take the liberty of reading a portion of that report. I adopt it and incorporate it into my speech because I concur in every sentiment it utters.

Mr. JOHNSON. What page of the report?

Mr. HOWARD. I read from page 3 of the report of the committee:

"It is vain to deny that in the present struggle the Government of the United States is justly, and upon principles of public law, entitled to exercise toward their domestic enemies every belligerent right and power, every warlike appliance recognized in the code of war; and that it is not only the right but the duty of their officers and agents, in waging the contest, to exercise the utmost vigilance in detecting, restraining, and punishing the common enemy and all who abet, sustain, or encourage him. To deny to it this right is to lay it prostrate and helpless at the feet of its deadly foes."

"Were the war a foreign war, waged with any independent nation, there could be no dispute as to the right of the Government to expel from the country every subject of a foreign Power and every person justly suspected of giving it aid and comfort, or to hold such parties in confinement till the war should terminate. This right is in the primary class of belligerent rights, pertaining to every independence; and no greater absurdity can be proposed than to say that although the Federal Government is vested with all the powers known to the laws and usages of war, and may, unrestrained by any constitutional prohibition, use them against the subjects of a foreign Government at war with the United States, yet, as to an organized, widespread insurrection of whole political communities within their own limits, acting under a de facto though a usurped government, it is stripped and denuded of this important means of annoyance and defense. It is plainly in its essence a military power, a belligerent right; as plainly such as the right of capture by sea, which has recently received the solemn sanction of the Supreme Court in a judgment eminent for the power and clearness of its analysis, the profoundness of its learning, and the unanswerable character of its logic."

"It does not by any means follow that because the insurgents are individually subject in law to the authority of the United States they are not to be treated as enemies. To yield to them the rights of citizens, and the protection that in peace would be due to them as such, and at the same time to treat them and the communities to which they belong as enemies at war with the United States, involves a glaring contradiction. If they are in the sense of the law of war and of nations enemies, as they are regarded both by the legislation of Congress, the executive and the judicial departments of the Government, the correctness of whose decision as to their true status cannot and ought not to be questioned, then they are lawfully subject, whether as individuals or communities, to the application of all the rules and means of warfare known to civilized nations; and this, in addition to the further and undoubted right of the Government to punish them for the crime of treason they commit against it. We might appeal in support of this principle to the most eminent teachers of public law, but it is so well recognized that the task would be useless."

"If, then, they are enemies as well as insurgents, the rights of war give to our commanders in the field the use of all the means necessary to make the war on our part successful and effectual, and consequently justify them to resort to any and all measures calculated to defeat and thwart their schemes against our safety, whether those schemes be open violence or secret plots; whether they use the bayonet or the ballot to effacinate their traitorous purposes. Suppose a State, yesterday loyal, to-day passes an ordinance of secession, or declares itself neutral and indifferent between the contending parties, and proceeds by its de facto Legislature to resist the authority of the Government by open force, by attempting to prevent the levy of troops within its borders, or by attempting to prevent the passage of the Union troops across its territory; who will contend that it would not be the right and duty of the commander on the spot at once to disperse or arrest the Legislature, to lay the State under martial law, and place in confinement every person found aiding the disloyal movement, or justly suspected of so doing?

"And it is impossible to see any distinction in principle between such a case and the case of disloyal voters, who at the polls attempt by their ballots to do the same thing. In either case hostility to the Government and a desire for its overthrow stand as the sufficient reason for the preventive interference of the military arm. Not to use it on proper occasions is to expose to destruction the Government itself, and the liberties and rights it guards. It is the inalienable duty of self-defense."

Sir, I still stand by this doctrine thus laid down in the report of the Committee on Military Affairs. I hold that these persons whose hearts are against their Government, who are willing that the Government should be destroyed—and I go as far as to declare that those who are unwilling in such a crisis as this to come to the support of the Government and render it their aid, and even those who affect to occupy a position of mere indifference toward it, are also within the category of enemies of their country—ought not, in justice, to be suffered to go to the polls. There must be a distinction somewhere, in this war, between enemies and friends. A friend is the man whose heart is attached to the Government and who is willing, according to his means, to do something to uphold it. He is not the only enemy who takes up arms or furnishes supplies to those in arms, but who looks upon this struggle with indifference, whose heart has no pulsation in favor of the cause, but who is ready whenever an occasion presents itself to go over and join the rebels, or to welcome them when they come as invaders into our midst.

In all foreign wars it is the right of each belligerent to place in confinement or to expel beyond its limits all the subjects of the adversary who may be found within its borders. This is one of the elementary principles in the laws of war; a power which is almost always exercised. Why are we to deny ourselves the exercise of that necessary means of crippling the enemy; to deny to ourselves the power of confining rebels in "bastilles"—for that is the opprobrious epithet given to every prison that contains domestic rebels arrested among us. Why are we to be deprived of this power in this struggle—a power that has been exercised by all other nations, by all other belligerents, from the dawn of history? It is substantially the same power I now claim for our own Government.

The Senator tells us that the military authorities have no right whatever to interfere in a State election; and if I understood him rightly he went so far as to declare that every person who is not prohibited by the laws of the State itself from voting has a right to vote, and that the United States have no authority to intervene for the purpose of preventing it, although he may be a rebel, stained from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet with the blood of loyal men. I am about to quote an authority which will perhaps have some weight with that Senator. I believe the first example of such interference in a State election was set by General McClellan while commander of the army of the Potomac. In response to a letter of request, addressed to him by Governor Hicks of Maryland, dated October 26, 1861, he issued the following order:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
WASHINGTON, October 29, 1861.

GENERAL: There is an apprehension among Union citizens in many parts of Maryland of an attempt at interference with their rights of suffrage by disunion citizens on the occasion of the election to take place on the 6th of November next.

In order to prevent this the major general commanding directs that you send detachments of a sufficient number of men to the different points in your vicinity where the elections are to be held to protect the Union voters, and to see that no disunionists are allowed to intimidate them, or in any way to interfere with their rights.

Mark the language that follows:

He also desires you to arrest and hold in confinement till after the election all disunionists who are known to have returned from Virginia recently, and who show themselves at the polls, and to guard effectually against any invasion of the peace and order of the election. For the purpose of carrying out these instructions you are authorized to suspend the habeas corpus. General Stone has received similar instructions to these. You will please confer with him as to the particular points that each shall take the control of.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
R. B. MARCY, Chief of Staff.

Major General N. P. BANKS, Commanding Division, Muddy Branch, Maryland.

Many persons to whom that order would apply had been engaged actively in the rebellion, but being nevertheless citizens of Maryland, on returning to that State would, under her then existing laws, be entitled to vote as possessing the qualifications prescribed by the constitution and laws of the State; and yet General McClellan, very properly as I think, issued an order for the arrest and confinement of all such persons who should go to the polls. The object of the order was not only to arrest such persons, but actually to prevent their voting although possessing the statutory qualifications.

If this power exists in the Government of the United States in any of its departments, in time of war, then no State can interfere with its exercise, but the citizens of the State must submit to it as to the exercise of any other Federal power, because it acts upon those citizens as individuals. In short, if the Government have this tutelary authority, if they have the right to treat rebels or rebel sympathizers, or those who aid and abet the rebellion, as enemies, as they undoubtedly have, then they may use it through the military arm or any other instrumentality to which they see fit to resort. They may thus prevent those enemies from exercising any of the rights of citizens in the State. For this we have at least the sanction of General McClellan—certainly, with a certain portion of the members of this body, a high authority; and I am very happy to be able for once to concur fully in the opinions of the general. The power is thus, as we see, sanctioned by that distinguished military leader, the heir-apparent of the Democratic party to the next Presidency, and the promising help and support, I suppose, of the cause of the Union as they would restore it. At all events, it is sufficient for my purpose that I have his complete sanction of the principle that it is the right of the military arm to interfere in State elections so far as to prevent traitors from voting, although they may happen to possess the formal qualifications of electors of the State. I think he was entirely right, and I am free to give him that praise.

If we have that power, as General McClellan agrees we have, then it belongs to us exclusively, and the States have nothing to do but to permit its exercise. It is a power peculiarly pertaining to the United States, and as much to be respected and obeyed as the judicial power of the Government. The two jurisdictions are here as separate and distinct as in any other case. The States have just as much right to trespass on any other constitutional power belonging to the Government as upon this. Sir, in my judgment, the case comes clearly and distinctly within the principle laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Booth, in which the decision of the court was delivered by the present Chief Justice. I will read an extract from that decision. The court say:

"And if the authority of a State, in the form of a judicial process, or otherwise, should attempt to control the marshal or other authorized officer or agent of the United States, in any respect, in the custody of his prisoner, it would be his duty to resist it, and to call to his aid any force that might be necessary to maintain the authority of law against illegal interference. No judicial process, whatever form it may assume, can have any lawful authority outside of the limits of the jurisdiction of the court or judge by whom it is issued; and an attempt to enforce it beyond these boundaries is nothing less than lawless violence."—21 Howard's Reports, p. 524.

And I say here, that whenever a military officer has issued an order for the purpose of keeping traitors away from the polls, and the order is regular in form, no State has in a time of rebellion or civil war any right to dispute or obstruct its operation; and whenever the Governor of a State, a judge of election, or other State magistrate, undertakes to resist such an order, he brings himself within the principle laid down by the Supreme Court, asserting that such interference may be resisted even by violence. It is nothing more nor less than this, that the authority of the United States is supreme; and it rests with the Senator from Kentucky and those who entertain his views, to establish the principle that the Government of the United States is not supreme in the treatment of its enemies. The Senator has not argued that question. He has assumed that it is not. It is with him a mere petitio principii, the assumption of the truth of a proposition that remains to be proved. Let him by fair and candid argument, by reference to the books of authority, show, if he can, that the Government of the United States in the prosecution of a war is not supreme and has no right to define and declare who are enemies of the United States and who are friends. He will find it a vain task; and I indulge the fancy that he will not be swift to undertake it.

Sir, the rebels on this subject have been our instructors. They have found no constitutional difficulty in treating persons within their limits attached to the Government of the United States, and acknowledging their allegiance to it as enemies. Without scruple or hesitation they proceeded at an early day to enact a statute, now in force among them, by which every Union man born in a State still adhering to the Union is proscribed and expelled from their territorial limits. I take the liberty to read the act. The rebels find fewer constitutional difficulties than the Senator from Kentucky seems to do:

"An act respecting alien enemies," approved August 8, 1861.

"Sec. 1. The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact that, whenever there shall be war declared between the Confederate States and any foreign nation or Government, or any invasion or predatory incursion shall be perpetrated, attempted, or threatened against the territory of the Confederate States by any foreign nation or Government, and the President of the Confederate States shall make public proclamation of the event, or the same shall be proclaimed by act of Congress, all native citizens, denizens or subjects of the hostile nation or Government, being males of fourteen years of age and upwards, and who shall be within the Confederate States at the time of the event, shall be liable to be apprehended, restrained, or secured, and removed as alien enemies: Provided, That, during the existing war, citizens of the United States residing within the Confederate States with intent to become citizens thereof, and who shall make a declaration of such intention, in due form, and acknowledging the authority of the government of the same, shall not become liable, as aforesaid, nor shall the act extend to citizens of the States of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, Missouri, and the District of Columbia, and the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, and the Indian territory south of Kansas, who shall not be chargeable with actual hostility or other crime against the public safety, and who shall acknowledge the authority of the government of the Confederate States.

"Sec. 2. The President of the Confederate States shall be, and is hereby, authorized by his proclamation or other public act, in a case of existing or declared war, as aforesaid, to provide for the removal of those who, not being permitted to reside within the Confederate States, shall refuse or neglect to depart therefrom; and to establish such regulations in the premises as the public safety may require.

"Sec. 3. Immediately after the passage of this act the President of the Confederate States shall, by proclamation, require all citizens of the United States, being males of fourteen years and upward, within the Confederate States, and adhering to the Government of the United States, and acknowledging the authority of the same, and not being citizens of the Confederate States, nor within the proviso of the first section of this act, to depart from the Confederate States within forty days from the date of such proclamation; and such persons remaining within the Confederate States after that time shall become liable to be treated as alien enemies; and in all cases of declared war, as aforesaid, alien residents within the Confederate States, who shall become liable as enemies, as aforesaid, and who shall not be chargeable with actual hostility or other crimes against the public safety, shall be allowed the time for the disposition of their effects and departure, which may be stipulated by any treaty with such hostile nation or Government; and when no such treaty may exist, the President shall prescribe such time as may be consistent with the public safety, and accord with the dictates of humanity and national hospitality."

But, sir, the Senator from Kentucky has made another novel discovery in the field of constitutional law, to which I must be indulged in paying some slight attention. He tells the Senate in his speech on this bill that the Government of the United States has no right whatever to send troops into any State unless it be at the request of the Legislature while in session, or of the Executive when the Legislature cannot be convened; and he is extremely earnest and confident on this point. He flatters himself that he has at length discovered the great touchstone by which this whole war is proved to be unconstitutional, and "coercion" a tyranny and an outrage. This is the first time in my professional life that I ever heard it asserted by a gentleman professing to be a judge of the principles of the Constitution, and a good lawyer, that the right of the Government of the United States to employ military force to put down an insurrection was derived from and is solely dependent upon that clause of the Constitution to which he refers. The clause declares that the Government of the United States shall protect each State against domestic violence when called upon by the State. The very language itself shows that the violence against which the State is to be protected is violence not against the authority of the United States, but against the authority of the State, and of the State only.

Domestic violence in a State is violence against the authority of the State, and that violence may be in perfect consistency with the loyalty of the persons who commit it to the Government of the United States.

It is merely local violence against the regular government of the State, and does not embrace an insurrection or rebellion against the Federal Government. And such is the meaning given to the clause in the Federalist, if the Senator will see fit to consult it. It may be entirely consistent with the authority of the United States, like the Dorchester rebellion, in Rhode Island, or the more ancient insurrection of Shay, in Massachusetts. The present war is a rebellion against the authority of the United States, not that of any one particular State, and is not therefore a case of mere domestic violence as mentioned in the clause on which the Senator relies.

This, however, is the Senator's logic: the States in rebellion are agitated by domestic violence; in such cases the Government of the United States cannot interpose, except upon the request of the Legislature of the State when in session, or of the Executive when the Legislature cannot be convened; and because the Legislature and Executive of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas—all the seceded States—have omitted to apply to the Government of the United States for aid to put down this violence, ergo, the Government of the United States has no right to march its troops into those States; ergo, the whole war is unconstitutional, and we who are engaged in prosecuting this war within the limits of these seceded States are guilty of a perpetual violation of our oaths and of the Constitution of our country. Such is the Senator's logic.

The Senator seemed to forget that, aside from this particular clause, there is given to Congress in express terms power to suppress rebellion and insurrection against the Federal Government itself. We are now acting under this broader and general power. We are acting under a power by no means necessary to have been incorporated in the Constitution—the power to suppress rebellion and insurrection—because from the very nature of Government itself, from the very necessity of its being, the Federal Government, like every other Government, must be held to have the right of self-defense, the right to put down resistance to its authority, the right to enforce its own laws, for that cannot be called a Government which has no power to carry its own enactments into execution. It is of the very essence of all Governments to command, and if a Government may command, it is the duty of those who are commanded to obey; so that even without the clause expressly giving to Congress the power to put down an insurrection they would have plenary power so to do.

But the framers of the instrument saw fit to grant the power in express terms, as if in anticipation of this "State rights" objection.

In order to make out his point, the Senator referred us to a passage in Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, which, by the way, does not prove his point at all, and has no possible connection with it; but the passage he read was in juxtaposition with another of so much importance that I will take the liberty of reading it. That excellent writer, quoting from the forty-third number of the Federalist, says:

"Should it be asked, what is to be the redress for an insurrection pervading all the States, and comprising a superiority of the entire force, though not a constitutional right? The answer must be that such a case, as it would be without the compass of human remedies, so it is fortunately not within the compass of human probability; and that it is a sufficient recommendation of the Federal Constitution that it diminishes the risk of a calamity for which no possible constitution can provide a cure."

Again:

"The southern States being more peculiarly open to danger from this quarter?"

That is, from a general insurrection—

"ought to be particularly tenacious of a Constitution from which they may derive such assistance in the most critical periods."

Ah, sir, what a guarantee was in the Constitution held out to the southern States against that dangerous element which has now awakened into terrible activity! Had it not been for the madmen who have drawn their sword against their country for the purpose of extending slavery beyond its ancient limits; had it not been for that wild fanaticism which professed to see that no Government on this continent could exist with safety unless resting upon human slavery as its corner-stone, we should have had continued peace, and this glorious Constitution, with all its guarantees of liberty, peace, and prosperity for the present and the future, would still have been in quiet operation, and no man here, no man in the North, would have been found to go so far as to urge the taking up arms to prevent the extension of slavery, much less to abolish it in the States where it existed.

Sir, we entertained no such purpose, and to impute it to us now is a wanton misrepresentation and a wanton falsification of the history of the times. We told them only, "We are opposed to the extension of slavery beyond its present limits; we intend to try with you that great question at the ballot-box; if we overcome you there the only result will be that slavery will go no further;" but we told them in the same breath, we assured them as brother assures brother, with all the earnestness of sincere patriotism and love of a common country, "We do not propose to intermeddle with slavery as it exists in the States." We gave them this sincere assurance over and over and over, a thousand times, and almost with tears. They gave no heed to our assurances. They affected to discredit everything we said or could say. They imputed to us the most wanton purposes. They said, "Your design, notwithstanding all your protestations, is to interfere with slavery and to emancipate the slaves in the States." And with this cunning deception, with this vile slander on their lips against as patriotic a party as ever honored this or any other country, they went before their people and deluded them, or most of them, into the belief that such were our purposes.

They went further, sir. They drew the sword and have now flung away the scabbard; and now that they have courted the disasters which are coming upon them, now that they have made slavery the gage of battle, now that they have set up a government against ours, founded upon slavery as its fundamental element, I for one am for waging the combat with them to the very last extremity. I say to them:

"Lay on, Macduff;
First cries of blood, enough."

My conscience will not be troubled by the fanciful constitutional objection that the Government of the United States have no right to "subjugate a State." We have, sir, the same right to subjugate a State in insurrection as to subjugate a foreign country with which we are at war; and the Senator from Kentucky will find it impossible, I apprehend, to draw anything like a sensible distinction between the two cases.

The Senator, not satisfied with assailing the report of the committee with almost unexampled bitterness, not satisfied with undertaking to vindicate the bill now before us, remarked that the committee had gone out of their way for the purpose of assailing and aspersing the character of the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Johnson;] and the Senate were entertained for a time by the honorable member from Kentucky with what he seemed to regard as a vindication of that honorable Senator. As one of the authors of this report I have this to say in regard to the honorable member from Maryland. When he shall state any ground of personal dissatisfaction with the mode in which he has been treated in that report I shall be as ready as any other Senator not only to listen to him, as I always do, with great pleasure, but shall hasten with alacrity to do him justice.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable Senator will permit me to interrupt him for a moment, there is as I think in the report, so far as I have been able to read it, some passages that I think, indeed I know, do me personally injustice. I did not suppose, however, when I saw them, that the honorable Senator himself, whose name appeared on the report as its author, had in fact written that portion of the report. I imagined that he had adopted it, and that he had adopted it without even reading it. I had not when I read it, nor have I now, the slightest belief that it was the purpose of the honorable Senator to call in question the sincerity of any opinions which I have expressed on this floor, either on the question with which the report deals or upon any other question on which the Senate have done me the honor to listen to me.

The passage to which I refer intimates, or rather says, that my election as a member of this body by the Legislature of Maryland was owing to the fact that that Legislature had been itself elected by such military interference as is charged to have been used in the recent election. It was new to me, sir; and as I could not imagine how the honorable member from Michigan, who lives thousands of miles away from us, could have known anything about the local politics of the State, and particularly as to the manner in which the Legislature that thought proper to confide in me in part the interests of the State as a member of this body was elected, I took for granted, as I take for granted now, that in everything to be found in that report relating to the manner in which that election was conducted, the honorable member pinned his faith upon information that he derived from some one else.

It is also intimated—I might as well state now, instead of waiting to state it in what I propose to say on these questions themselves, wholly irrespective of personal considerations, as I think they should be—it is intimated in the report that my dissatisfaction with what was done by the military at the recent election in Maryland was owing to the fact that the result of that election disappointed some partisan hopes of mine. There never was a charge or an intimation more wholly and absolutely unfounded. It is not true in any particular. I had no partisan hopes. If ever I was capable of indulging in any such hopes I think I know myself well enough to know that in the present condition of the country, if there be any men in the country willing to indulge such hopes, I should be the last man in the country to indulge them. I have nothing to hope politically except to hope that this rebellion may be speedily overthrown. I have no political aspirations other than that of conducting myself on the floor of this Senate with courtesy to all its members, and patriotically toward the country.

So far as it is supposed that I have been influenced by any disappointment in the result of the election in the particular congressional district in which that result was attained, as it was by force of this (as I think) military interference, the honorable member has done me great injustice in point of fact. The gentleman who represents that district in consequence of that election was bound to me by ties of personal friendship, as well as by ties which political accord creates. It was a friendship dating long before this rebellion. It is a friendship strengthened by the acquaintance and association which I had with him in the session of the Legislature of which we were both members. It was also an admiration of the man derived from my knowledge of his very superior talents as a lawyer, as well as his admirable qualities as a gentleman. It is due to truth to say that if the choice between the two contestants at that election had depended upon my vote it would have been cast in favor of the member who now represents the district. What I regretted, and what I shall continue to regret, was—as I think it was not to be justified upon any principle, political or military—that the military should have been suffered, without interference on the part of the higher authorities of the Government, to do the deeds which were done on that occasion by them.

With this explanation, therefore, I am sure the honorable member will believe me when I state to him that I have not, and have not had, from the moment I read that report to the present hour,

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Military Interference with Elections—Mr. Howard.

the remotest suspicion that he intended to reflect upon me politically or as a man.

Mr. HOWARD. The honorable Senator from Maryland is quite right in the supposition he has expressed that I entertained no such intention. Certainly there is no member in this body for whom I have a higher esteem than for that honorable gentleman, and none, surely, to whom I would be more reluctant to do the slightest discourtesy or injustice; and I am happy that my remarks on that subject have given him an opportunity of making this explanation.

But, sir, to return to the speech of the Senator from Kentucky. The Senator starts with the broad proposition that the evidence before the Committee on Military Affairs to whom this bill had been referred showed that the military had interfered with the freedom of elections in Kentucky and Maryland. He was vehement in his denunciation of the report, because it stated that from the information the committee had been able to avail themselves of, the evils proposed to be remedied by the Senator's bill appeared to them to be almost wholly imaginary. There is not, I may remark here, in the report which has been so severely denounced by the honorable Senator a single statement denying that there may have been some abuses in the employment of the military forces at the polls, whether in Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland, or Delaware. But, sir, I shall have more to say on this subject as I proceed.

The Senator states that the committee think the charge of disloyalty is a full answer to all arguments that can be brought against the Administration; in other words, that whenever any gentleman here or elsewhere brings a well-founded allegation against the mode in which the Government is administered or against the executive officers, or Congress, it is a sufficient reply to turn around upon him and say, "Why, sir, you are a disloyalist." I hope, sir, I am not actuated by any such miserable bigotry as is here imputed to me; and I submit to the honorable Senator whether it is entirely candid and fair and manful to treat the report of the committee in this manner. That report was drawn up as carefully and with as much circumspection as the materials which the committee had been able to get together would permit. Of course, upon such a subject, it was not only difficult but impossible to collect all the evidence and all the facts bearing on the case, stretching as they did from Missouri into Delaware. The committee can ask for themselves only this praise, that they collected all the facts which were conveniently within their reach, and have given them such a construction and derived from them such results as are set forth in the report; and I think those results and conclusions are fairly deducible from the evidence before them.

The committee are not to be held responsible for anything which does not appear to have been before them in evidence; and I say again it is not to me a satisfactory reply to our conclusions to say that a charge of disloyalty is the habitual reply to well-founded allegations against the Administration. The Senator from Kentucky, when he shall reconsider this whole subject, will discover that in making that remark he was actuated more by a zeal to uphold the interests of a party than by any principle of patriotism or any respect for justice. The report of the committee stated that a certain document had been laid before them by the Senator from Kentucky, purporting to be "an address to the people and Congress of the United States," by certain gentlemen signing themselves a "committee on behalf of the Democratic party." The report contains some comments on this singular pamphlet, and the Senator from Kentucky charges that those comments are uncandid and untrue.

Mr. POWELL. If the Senator will allow me I will remind him that I said in my speech that I did not intend to charge the committee with any willful misrepresentation, but that they were mistaken.

Mr. HOWARD. I am happy to accept the explanation of the honorable Senator.

Mr. POWELL. That will be found in my speech. I am making no explanation.

Mr. HOWARD. I am about to proceed to show that the committee were not only not guilty of any falsification or willful misstatement of the evidence before them, but that they were guilty of no mistake. Whoever shall read the Senator's speech will hardly rise from its perusal with the impression that he did not intend to impute to the committee willful misrepresentation. But let us examine the facts.

The report alleges that at the date of a certain letter, which is included in the pamphlet, addressed to Mr. Wickliffe, of Kentucky, and dated June 13, 1863, the business of recruiting blacks in Kentucky was in active progress, and also in various other slaveholding districts. The reply which the honorable member makes to this statement is, that at the date of that letter there was no such thing as recruiting black soldiers progressing in Kentucky. How the precise fact may have been I am not able to say. I had always understood, however, that the business of recruiting blacks had been going on in some degree in Kentucky from about the date of the passage of the act of 1862 authorizing it. But whether it was progressing in Kentucky at that precise time or not is entirely immaterial, and can furnish no just ground for the assertion that the committee had misrepresented the facts of the case. The letter itself, which was the subject of comment in that report, admits that the Administration had then already adopted the policy of recruiting black troops. This is admitted, and it is against that policy that the letter is particularly denunciatory. The writers of the letter used the following language:

"We hold this rebellion utterly unjustifiable in its inception, and a dissolution of the Union the greatest of calamities.

"We would use all just and constitutional means adapted to the suppression of the one and the restoration of the other."

Again they say:

"It is now obvious that the fixed purpose of the Administration is to arm the negroes of the South to make war upon the whites, and we hold it to be the duty of the people of Kentucky to enter against such a policy a solemn and most emphatic protest."

What is the plain implication from this language addressed to Mr. Wickliffe, that the writers hold the rebellion unjustifiable "in its inception?" Is it not tantamount to a declaration that although in its inception the rebellion was utterly unjustifiable, it had, nevertheless, become otherwise in consequence of the acts of the Administration, and particularly the act authorizing the recruiting of black troops? I can put upon it no other construction. I cannot read it without deriving from it the idea which certainly lurks in it, that although the rebellion was at first unjustifiable, still, inasmuch as the Government had resorted to the raising of black troops for the purpose of carrying on the war, the rebellion had ceased to be unjustifiable and had become justifiable. The Senator from Kentucky with all his acumen will hardly be able to give this language any other meaning.

But the letter contains a most solemn protest against this measure. It admits that the rebellion has become justifiable, and goes on, by way of aggravation, to assert:

"It is now obvious that the fixed purpose of the Administration is to arm the negroes of the South to make war upon the whites, and we hold it to be the duty of the people of Kentucky to enter against such a policy a solemn and most emphatic protest."

And still the Senator says that at the very time the letter was written, at the very time this solemn protest was entered by these leading gentlemen of Kentucky, there was no such thing in Kentucky as the recruiting of black troops. May I not then ask, what right had these gentlemen while the alleged evil of recruiting of black troops did not exist in that State to make a solemn protest against the Government carrying on that business in any other portion of the United States? What injury was it to Kentucky that the United States were collecting together black troops in Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, or any other portion of the United States? What harm was it doing to them? They were not losing their "property" in the shape either of enlistments or conscription of their slaves. In whose interest but that of the rebels was this solemn protest of the "committee on the part of the Democratic party" put forth? What had loyal Kentuckians to complain of? Plainly, nothing.

What, then, is the pith and point of the declaration that the rebellion had become justifiable, although unjustifiable in its inception? Not because recruiting of black troops was going on in Kentucky, but because it was going on somewhere else, and because these troops were to be used as aids in suppressing the rebellion. Sir, this is an audacious presumption on the part of Kentucky. No, sir, I will not say Kentucky; I do not mean the people of Kentucky; I mean the demagogues who assume to be the leaders of the people of Kentucky. What right have they to dictate to the United States what troops they shall raise, or where they shall raise them, or how employ them, so long as the people of Kentucky are not affected by the proceeding?

Sir, it is a most arrogant assumption of the right on the part of these soi-disant patriots and Union men to dictate to the Government of the United States what policy it shall pursue in carrying on the war. We are told by them, first, "You must not carry on this war at all." The Senator from Kentucky announces here that all attempts at coercion are unconstitutional, that the war itself is unconstitutional; and his friends in Kentucky take up the refrain, say the same thing, and arrogantly tell us that if the United States shall see fit to recruit black troops in Missouri, or in Tennessee, or in Louisiana, the rebellion at once changes its character and becomes justifiable. Kentucky is greatly injured, Kentucky has a right to utter her most solemn and emphatic protest. Sir, I have too much respect for the true patriotism, the true manhood of Kentuckians, too much respect for the past history of that gallant State; as a citizen of Michigan I have too much reverence for the memory of the ancient people of Kentucky, who rescued the Territory of Michigan from the grasp of the invader, and many of whose bodies fallen in the struggle of 1812 now lie interred almost at my own door, to believe that there is one man out of five hundred among the Unionists of the State who has the least sympathy with this rebellious declaration of this self-styled Democratic committee. I believe the heart of Kentucky and Kentuckians, if left to its own impulses, is and will be true to the great cause we are defending, and that, if left to themselves, the good people of that State would be first and foremost in maintaining the Government of their fathers.

Again, sir, in order to make the report of the committee more odious, and as it would seem, to stigmatize the author almost as a falsifier, the Senator tells us that the committee have designedly misdated the act of Kentucky of March 11, 1862; that in order to justify their language, in which they approve of the issuing of a proclamation by Governor Robinson, some three months before the election of 1863, calling upon the judges of election to carry out the law of Kentucky, the committee have post-dated the act by one year.

I will not read from the speech of the Senator from Kentucky to show with what peculiar bitterness he attacks the report upon this ground, but simply ask his candid attention to the report itself, and show how easily this anachronism in the date of the act is corrected. The act itself was passed on the 11th of March, 1862. The copyist employed by the committee to transcribe it from the documents referred to them, by a mere clerical error changed the date from 1862 to 1863; while at the same time there is enough contained on the face of the report to show the erroneous date. It is a mere clerical error of no importance; and yet the Senator from Kentucky labored long to stigmatize and to render odious the report itself and even the author, under the idea that there had been a sort of forgery in the date of the act. This is not fair treatment; it is not worthy of the occasion or the subject.

Mr. POWELL. I will state, if the Senator will permit me to do so, that the draughtsman of that report in the whole argument must certainly have been under the apprehension that that law was passed in 1863, because he states precisely and distinctly in it that the law had been in force but three months, and hence the necessity of the Governor's proclamation; and in another place it is stated that it was passed over Governor Magoffin's head, and he resigned in 1862.

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly it does so state, and this statement arises from an error of the copyist; it is totally immaterial for the purposes of the argument. The error is clearly manifested by the fact also stated in the report, as the Senator remarks, that the act was passed before Magoffin resigned, which was in 1862. This, sir, is a narrow foundation for so grave a charge against the committee.

The Senator next insists that the writers of the letter to which I have alluded did not wish the rebels to vote, and that in this respect, also, the committee "drew upon their fancy for their facts." Well, sir, let us see how this is. The allegation is that the writers did not wish the rebels to vote. The address to which the letter is appended is signed by seven gentlemen, all of whose names are also signed to the letter. The letter is dated June 13, 1863, and is addressed to Hon. C. A. Wickliffe, and the address is of a date subsequent to the August election. The printed pamphlet is dated October, 1863.

Now, let us see whether or not those men did wish the rebels to vote. The Senator says they did not desire the votes of rebels. I assert they did, and the address itself proves the fact. The signers of the address, including the seven signers of the letter, use this language:

"It is very frankly admitted that we hoped and expected to obtain the support of the great mass of the southern rights men of the State. They were for the most part Democrats of long standing, though classed by the adherents of the Administration as 'disloyal.'"

"The great majority of them were not secessionists, and were entirely free from all complicity in the rebellion."

"This is what they all say, including the seven signers of the letter:

"The great majority of them were not secessionists, and were entirely free from all complicity in the rebellion."

The inference is that if a great majority were not secessionists, and were free from complicity in the rebellion, the minority of them, however few or however numerous, were in complicity with the rebellion, and were secessionists; so that the result is that here was a portion of the people of Kentucky, the minority, if you please, of the southern rights party, that were actually secessionists and in complicity with the rebellion; and the writers of the pamphlet say that their purpose was to obtain the votes of all these southern rights men, including both classes, secessionists as well as others—if there could be others.

So much for the honeyed compliment of the Senator from Kentucky to these secessionists, some of whom I trust had the luck to be driven from the polls at that election by the strong arm of the Government forces. This confession is of itself sufficient proof of the necessity of military protection of the true Unionists of Kentucky at that election, and, were there no other evidence, must forever shut the mouth of the writers of the Wickliffe letter, as well as the other authors of the address "to the people and Congress of the United States." They wanted secessionists who were in complicity with the rebellion to vote, and wanted their votes.

[The honorable Senator here gave way for a motion to adjourn.]

THURSDAY, March 24, 1864.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, from interfering with elections in the States.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, at the adjournment yesterday I was replying to some objections raised by the Senator from Kentucky to the report of the Committee on Military Affairs. The Senator stated that two orders were issued by military men in that State just previous to the general election of August 3, 1863, which directed that whenever the military authorities had occasion to make requisitions for supplies upon the people of Kentucky, they should first call upon disloyal men and mark the receipts they gave as disloyal; and that it was generally rumored about the State that those persons would be regarded as disloyal who should at the coming election vote the Democratic ticket, which fact would expose their property to seizure by the military.

This was one particular ground of complaint urged by the Senator against military interference in Kentucky. But even admitting this rumor to have been well founded, it cannot be considered as an objection against the military orders issued for the protection of the polls against the interference of disloyal men and traitors. Nor have we any evidence, except the assertion of the Senator from Kentucky, that a single man in Kentucky was deterred from the polls by this rumor. There may have been such a rumor. It is by no means impossible or improbable, for we all know that on the eve of an election the parties interested are industrious and ingenious in the manufacture of rumors for the purpose of influencing votes. But whatever may have been the fact, this alleged intimidation could not have arisen from the orders issued for the protection of the loyal voters.

The Senator makes another point against the report of the committee. He misrepresents as untrue the passage relating to the fidelity with which the orders of the subordinate commanders in Kentucky were carried out. The report uses the following language:

"The orders of the subordinate commanders were, so far as they are embodied in the pamphlet, and so far as we have been able to ascertain, in strict accordance with General Burnside's order and the statute of the State, which we have cited; and the pamphlet admits that these orders 'were carried out with rare fidelity by those to whom their execution was intrusted.'"

The report affirms that these orders were in strict accordance with General Burnside's order. The Senator from Kentucky takes issue with the committee, and asserts that the various subordinate orders, instead of being in accordance with the general's order issued from headquarters a few days before the election, were not in accordance with that order, but were violatory of it. Now, sir, I lay it down that there was not a single subordinate order issued by the inferior officers in Kentucky inconsistent with the order of General Burnside, embracing as it did the Kentucky act of expatriation and proscription; and I shall be obliged to consume some little time in analyzing these several minor orders for the purpose of showing that the Senator's assertion is unfounded. There are but eight such subordinate orders contained in the pamphlet, which was the only evidence before the committee. All the other orders relate merely to foraging, and not to elections. In order to understand clearly whether they were in accordance with the general's order it will be necessary to read that order. It is in these words:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO,
CINCINNATI, OHIO, July 31, 1863.

Whereas the State of Kentucky is invaded by a rebel force with the avowed intention of overawing the judges of elections, of intimidating the loyal voters, keeping them from the polls, and forcing the election of disloyal candidates at the election on the 3d of August; and whereas the military power of the Government is the only force that can defeat this attempt, the State of Kentucky is hereby declared under martial law, and all military officers are commanded to aid the constituted authorities of the State in support of the laws and of the purity of suffrage as defined in the late proclamation of his Excellency Governor Robinson.

As it is not the intention of the commanding general to interfere with the proper expression of public opinion, all discretion in the conduct of the election will be, as usual, in the hands of the legally appointed judges at the polls, who will be held strictly responsible that no disloyal person be allowed to vote, and to this end the military power is ordered to give them its utmost support.

The civil authority, civil courts, and business will not be suspended by this order. It is for the purpose only of protecting, if necessary, the rights of loyal citizens and the freedom of election.

By command of Major General Burnside:
LEWIS RICHMOND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

This order was based on the then recent proclamation of Governor Robinson, of Kentucky. It is as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

For the information and guidance of all officers at the approaching election, I have caused to be herewith published an act of the Legislature of Kentucky entitled "An act to amend chapter fifteen of the Revised Statutes, entitled 'Citizens, Expatriation, and Aliens.' The strict observance and enforcement of this and all other laws of this State regulating elections are earnestly enjoined and required as being alike due to a faithful discharge of duty, to the purity of the elective franchise, and to the sovereign will of the people of Kentucky expressed through their Legislature.

Given under my hand, as Governor of Kentucky, at Frankfort, this 10th day of July, 1863, and in the seventy-second year of the Commonwealth.

J. F. ROBINSON.

By the Governor:

D. C. WICKLIFFE, Secretary of State.

Appended to that proclamation is the statute of Kentucky to which I have referred. It is as follows:

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That any citizen of this State who shall enter into the service of the so-called confederate States, in either a civil or military capacity, or enter into the service of the so-called provisional government of Kentucky, in either a civil or military capacity, or, having heretofore entered such service of either the confederate States or provisional government, shall continue in such service after this act takes effect, or shall take up or continue in arms against the military forces of the United States or the State of Kentucky, or shall give voluntary aid and assistance to those in arms against said forces, shall be deemed to have expatriated himself, and shall no longer be a citizen of Kentucky, nor shall he again be a citizen except by permission of the Legislature by a general or special statute.

"Sec. 2. That whenever a person attempts or is called on to exercise any of the constitutional or legal rights and privileges belonging only to citizens of Kentucky, he may be required to negative on oath the expatriation provided in the first section of this act, and upon his failure or refusal to do so shall not be permitted to exercise any such right or privilege.

"Sec. 3. This act to be of force in thirty days from and after its passage.

"Passed and became a law, the objections of the Governor to the contrary notwithstanding, March 11, 1862."

It will be remembered that at the time the Legislature of Kentucky passed this most salutary act, Magoffin was Governor of Kentucky. He refused to approve it; but the Legislature passed the bill over his head and it became a law. Such a statute seems to have been incompatible with the principles of that patriotic Governor of Kentucky, Magoffin!

I have thus laid before the Senate the proclamation of General Burnside, embodying within itself the proclamation of Governor Robinson, the latter proclamation containing as part of itself the statute of proscription of Kentucky. I proceed to inquire whether the subordinate orders which were carried out and executed "with fidelity," according to the confession of the authors of the pamphlet, were in accordance with this proclamation of General Burnside and with the law of Kentucky.

General Burnside's order of July 31 excludes from voting all persons whom the act excludes, and in addition declares that the judges of election "will be held strictly responsible that no disloyal person be allowed to vote; and to this end the military power is ordered to give them its utmost support."

This order was in substance and effect the same as that of General McClellan already cited. Indeed, it seems to have been based upon it as a precedent. It goes no further, and rests upon precisely the same principles of public law.

I will go rapidly through with my analysis of the various cases insisted upon by the Senator from Kentucky, in which he says the subordinate officers transcended the authority given them by the order of General Burnside. It should be borne in mind that the Kentucky act declares that no person shall be deemed a citizen of Kentucky or shall be allowed to exercise any of the rights and privileges of a citizen who had given aid and assistance to those in arms against the United States, or borne arms against the Government, or who had held any office, civil or military, in the confederate States, or under the provisional government of Kentucky. The first subordinate order complained of is that of Assistant Adjutant General A. C. Semple, in which he says merely that persons of open and avowed disloyalty will not be permitted to stand for office. This was strictly within the general order.

The second order referred to by the Senator was that of Colonel Thomas Johnson, which prohibits the same thing, and adds that no persons will be permitted to stand as candidates "who may be opposed to furnishing men and money for a vigorous prosecution of the war against the rebellion." I remark in respect to this order that it was in accordance with the act of Kentucky when properly understood, because under the circumstances then existing, Kentucky being then invaded by the rebel armies, a person thus opposed to furnishing men and money to the Government was voluntarily giving aid and assistance to the enemy. At such a time openly to avow a willingness or a wish to withhold men and money evinced a willingness to welcome the invaders; and a man who could stand up at such a time and make such an announcement was as much a traitor as if he bore a musket upon his shoulder and was serving in the rebel army.

This order was to be enforced in the counties of Trigg, Caldwell, Lyon, Crittenden, and Livingston, as is shown by its terms. What was the political character of those five counties? They all lay within the first congressional district of Kentucky; and it is a sufficient justification of the order to say that this first congressional district had openly, in the month of January, 1862, elected a member of the congress of the rebel confederacy. This district, as I affirm to be an indisputable historical fact, was from the beginning in favor of the rebellion, and the mass of its people aiders and abettors of the insurgents.

Such were the men who were prevented from voting at the August election of 1863. And is such an order, issued upon such an occasion, to be denounced as unconstitutional and tyrannical, which prevented open traitors, constituents of a traitor representative now in the rebel congress, from voting?

The third order was the order of Colonel Mundy. It is to this effect:

"All loyal citizens, who have not forfeited their citizenship, can safely and quietly cast their votes for the candidates of their choice; but all who have forfeited their right of citizenship, under the provisions of the act of Assembly, who shall present themselves at the polls and fraudulently attempt to vote, will be immediately arrested by the guard detailed for that purpose at such precinct, and confined in the military prison."

Certainly, persons who had forfeited their citizenship under the law of Kentucky were not proper persons to be admitted to the privileges of an election. It was forbidden not only by the laws of war, which prohibit all enemies from participating in such privileges, but was expressly forbidden by the act of Kentucky.

The fourth order was that of Captain Belt.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator will allow me to state that I did not make any very special comment on Colonel Mundy's order; but I will ask the Senator who, under that order, was the judge: the judges appointed by the law, or the military officer whom Col. Mundy sent there? That is the point.

Mr. HOWARD. The order of General Burnside was explicit that the military authorities should employ all their vigilance and all their power in carrying out the laws of the State and in preventing disloyal citizens from voting. Somebody, indeed, must have the power to determine whether a person is qualified or not; and under the circumstances, it cannot be denied that (although it may have been the duty of the judges to determine whether the voter was privileged to vote or not) the tutelary authority of the United States equally had the right; nay, sir, it was the paramount and supreme right of the military authorities to determine that question, and for reasons I will briefly repeat. A war existed then and there; the enemies of the country thronged throughout Kentucky; rebels were thick as leaves in Vallumbrosa at all the polls; and it was equally the duty of the Federal military agents to determine who was a friend and who an enemy of the Government.

I was speaking, sir, of the order of Captain Belt. The Senator alleges this as a case presenting ground of complaint. And what was it? An order was issued by this Captain Belt, who is himself a Kentuckian, and an illiterate person, as would appear from his manner of spelling, (which is held up to very unnecessary ridicule by the authors of this learned pamphlet,) in which he points out individually a Mr. Hodges as being a disloyal man, and prohibits the judges from allowing him to stand as a candidate. I reply if this man Hodges was disloyal, as the officer believed, the officer was justified in instructing the judges of election not to permit him to stand as a candidate, for he had no right to be a candidate if disloyal. He had no right to exercise an office; and if a man has no right to exercise the functions of an office he has no right to receive votes for that office.

The fifth case is the order of Colonel Foster. By his order, the colonel prohibits from standing as candidates every one who is not in all things "loyal to the State and Federal Governments, and in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war for the suppression of the rebellion;" and his order forbids any person to vote who is not known to the judges to be an undoubted loyal citizen, or who has not taken the oath prescribed by the act of Kentucky. This order was within the spirit of the act of Kentucky, for under the circumstances not to be in favor of the prosecution of the war was to give indirect assistance to the invaders, and a person standing in that attitude came fairly within the order of General Burnside.

The sixth order complained of was that of General Hurlbut. It prohibits from voting or standing as candidates all persons not avowedly and unconditionally for the Union and the suppression of the rebellion. This was equally within the spirit of the act of Kentucky, and for the same reason.

The seventh order is that of General Asboth. Much has been said against it. Let us see whether it is obnoxious to the severe criticism heaped upon it. It is dated at Columbus, Kentucky, July 29, 1863, and is as follows:

[General Orders, No. 47.]

DISTRICT OF COLUMBUS,
HEADQUARTERS SIXTH DIVISION,
SIXTEENTH ARMY CORPS,
COLUMBUS, KY., July 29, 1863.

That no further doubt may exist as to the intent and meaning of Special Orders No. 139, dated Headquarters Sixteenth Army Corps, July 14, 1863, it is ordered that no person shall be permitted to be voted for, or be a candidate for office, who has been or is now under arrest or bonds, by proper authority, for uttering disloyal language or sentiments.

County judges within this district are hereby ordered to appoint, as judges and clerks of the ensuing August election, only such persons as are avowedly and unconditionally for the Union and the suppression of the rebellion, and are further ordered to revoke and recall any appointment of judges and clerks already made who are not such loyal persons.

Judges and clerks of elections are hereby ordered not to place the name of any person upon the poll-books, to be voted for at said election, who is not avowedly and unconditionally for the Union and the suppression of the rebellion, or who may be opposed to furnishing men and money for the suppression of the rebellion.

The following oath is prescribed and will be administered by judges of elections to voters and to such candidates as reside within this district:

"I do solemnly swear that I have never entered the service of the so-called confederate States; that I have not been engaged in the service of the so-called 'provisional government of Kentucky'; either in a civil or military capacity; that I have never, either directly or indirectly, aided the rebellion against the Government of the United States or the State of Kentucky; that I am unconditionally for the Union and the suppression of the rebellion, and am willing to furnish men and money for the vigorous prosecution of the war against the rebellious league known as the 'confederate States'; so help me God."

Any voter, judge, or clerk of elections, or other person, who may evade, neglect, or refuse compliance with the provisions of this order will be arrested and sent before a military commission as soon as the facts are substantiated.

By order of Brigadier General Asboth:
T. H. HARRIS,
Assistant Adjutant General.

I insist that this order is equally within the scope of General Burnside's, equally within the true intent and meaning of the act of Kentucky. But, sir, even leaving that act out of view, under the circumstances which then surrounded General Asboth, with the whole community swarming with traitors and rebelsympathizers, I insist that it was not only the right but the duty of the general to issue such an order. It was, under the circumstances, for him and for him alone to designate what persons should vote at the election; and it was not the right of the authorities of Kentucky, even if the local law had authorized it, to set up a claim to the contrary. The State was under martial law; but I make no especial claim on that ground. It was enough that war existed in Kentucky, and it was one of the rights of war to see to it that traitors were not suffered to approach the place of election. Had it been, in the judgment of the military commander at the time, necessary entirely to suppress an election at a particular precinct and dismiss the judges to their homes, there can be no doubt the act would have been legal and justifiable on the ground of military necessity.

The eighth order is that of General Shackelford, which I will also read, since that also has been the theme of very severe comment. It is dated at Russellville, Kentucky—a name by no means unfamiliar to the honorable Senator.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST BRIGADE,
SECOND DIVISION, TWENTY-THIRD ARMY CORPS,
RUSSELLVILLE, KENTUCKY, July 30, 1863.

In order that the proclamation of the Governor and the laws of the State of Kentucky may be observed and enforced, post commandants and officers of this command will see that the following regulations are strictly complied with at the approaching State election:

None but loyal citizens will act as officers of the election. No one will be allowed to offer himself as a candidate for office, or be voted for at said election, who is not in all things loyal to the State and Federal Government, and in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war for the suppression of the rebellion.

The judges of election will allow no one to vote at said election unless he is known to them to be an undoubtedly loyal citizen, or unless he shall first take the oath required by the laws of the State of Kentucky.

No disloyal man will offer himself as a candidate, or attempt to vote, except for treasonable purposes; and all such efforts will be summarily suppressed by the military authorities.

All necessary protection will be supplied and guaranteed at the polls to Union men by all the military force within this command.

By order of Brigadier General J. M. Shackelford, commanding:
J. E. HUFFMAN,
Assistant Adjutant General.

This falls equally within the scope and intent of the order of General Burnside, and for the same reasons. It was issued at Russellville, the seat of the rebellion in Kentucky. There is a notoriety belonging to that town, and to show what was done there I beg to read an extract from a new history of the rebellion by a rebel author, Mr. Edward A. Pollard. Speaking of Kentucky and the state of things there in 1861, he says:

"On the 18th November, the opponents of the Lincoln rule in Kentucky assembled in convention at Russellville, in the southern part of the State, for the purpose of organizing a provisional government for Kentucky, and for taking steps for her admission into the southern confederacy. On the 20th November the convention unanimously agreed upon a report, presenting in a strong light the falseness of the State and Federal Legislature, and concluded with the declaration that 'the people are hereby absolved from all allegiance to said Government, and that they have the right to establish any Government which to them may seem best adapted to the preservation of their lives and liberty.' George W. Johnson, of Scott county, was chosen Governor. Commissioners were appointed to negotiate with the confederate government for the earliest admission of Kentucky into the government of the confederate States. The embassy of the commissioners to Richmond was successful, and before the middle of December Kentucky was duly recognized as one of the States of the southern confederacy."

Kentucky was formally admitted into the rebel confederacy in the month of December, 1861, and represented in their congress by twelve members. To show further what was the political condition of Kentucky at that early period, I will read a portion of the proclamation of Zollicoffer, dated the 16th December, 1861, when leading a confederate army into Kentucky for the purpose of carrying on the war against us. He says:

"They [the Government of the United States] have closed your rivers, embargoed your railroads, cut off your natural and proper markets, left your stock and produce on hand almost valueless, and thereby almost destroyed the value of your lands and labor. We have come to open again your rivers, to restore the ancient markets for your produce, and thereby to return to you the accustomed value of your lands and labor. They have represented us as murderers and outlaws. We have come to convince you that we truly respect the laws, revere justice, and mean to give security to your personal and property rights. They have forced many of you to take up arms against us. We come to take you by the hand as heretofore, as friends and brothers. Their Government has laid heavy taxes on you to carry on this unnatural war, one object of which is openly avowed to be to set at liberty your slaves, and the ensuing steps in which will be to put arms in their hands and give them political and social equality with yourselves. We saw these things in the beginning, and are offering our hearts' blood to avert those dreadful evils which we saw the abolition leaders had deliberately planned for the South."

The rebel general was awake to the same gloomy vision of armed negroes which now seems to frighten the "Democratic committee" of Kentucky.

Zollicoffer calls the people of Kentucky without any distinction his brethren. He affects to offer them rights and privileges, and essays to relieve them from the terrible tyranny of the Government of the United States. It is easy to see what effect this proclamation would naturally have upon the public mind in Kentucky. It would tend greatly to inflame it, to stir up that disloyal feeling to guard against which the orders I have noticed were issued.

Mr. President, if there ever was a necessity for the vigorous interposition of military authority to guard the polls against the intrusion of rebels, if there was ever a case in the history of the United States in which the strong arm of military power was invoked by every interest of community, it was the case of Kentucky; and I undertake to say that without this interference, Kentucky, in all human probability, would to-day have been regularly installed as a member of the rebel confederation. Nothing but the loyal hearts and strong arms of northern men who hurried from their homes has prevented that State, with all its glorious memories, going over to the rebellion.

Mr. POWELL. If the Senator will allow me I will ask him the date of that order of General Zollicoffer.

Mr. HOWARD. It is dated December 16, 1861.

Mr. POWELL. 1861! These occurrences took place in 1863.

Mr. HOWARD. I was speaking of the political condition of Kentucky, and read this order as a piece of evidence to show what was the condition of affairs in Kentucky for nearly two years previous. It throws much light on the state of things in 1863.

As further evidence of the feeling in Kentucky, not in 1863, but in 1861, I venture to call the attention of the Senate to another document. It is a letter of General Buckner addressed to Magoffin, Governor of Kentucky, dated June 10, 1861. It has some tendency to illustrate the influences under which Kentucky neutrality, so called, had its origin. The letter is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS KENTUCKY STATE GUARDS,
LOUISVILLE, June 10, 1861.

SIR: On the 8th instant, at Cincinnati, Ohio, I entered into an arrangement with Major General G. B. McClellan, commander of the United States troops in the State north of the Ohio river, to the following effect:

The authorities of the State of Kentucky are to protect the United States property within the limits of the State, to enforce the laws of the United States, in accordance with the interpretations of the United States courts, as far as those laws may be applicable to Kentucky, and to enforce, with all the power of the State, our obligations of neutrality as against the southern States, as long as the position we have assumed shall be respected by the United States. General McClellan stipulates that the territory of Kentucky shall be respected on the part of the United States, even though the southern States should occupy it, but in the latter case he will call upon the authorities of Kentucky to remove the southern forces from our territory. Should Kentucky fail to accomplish this object in a reasonable time, General McClellan claims the same right of occupancy given to the southern forces. I have stipulated in that case to advise him of the inability of Kentucky to comply with her obligations and to invite him to dislodge the southern forces.

He stipulates that if he is successful in doing so, he will withdraw his forces from the territory of the State as soon as the southern forces shall have been removed.

This he assures me is the policy which he will adopt toward Kentucky.

Should the Administration hereafter adopt a different policy, he is to give me timely notice of the fact. Should the State of Kentucky hereafter assume a different attitude, he is in like manner to be advised of the fact.

The well-known character of General McClellan is a sufficient guarantee for the fulfillment of every stipulation on his part.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
S. B. BUCKNER,

Inspector General.
To his Excellency B. MAGOFFIN, Frankfort, Kentucky.

It would seem then that as long ago as the date of this letter, General McClellan had assumed to enter into a treaty by which the neutrality of Kentucky was to be guaranteed. Sir, this was a dangerous step on the part of that general. It was a step in direct violation of the laws of the United States, totally incompatible with his duty to his Government, and which, had it been made effectual as against the United States, would have led to the strange spectacle of an independent nation, acknowledging no allegiance either to our Government or to the rebel States, and maintaining within the borders of the Union a condition of independent neutrality wholly incompatible with the duty of that State under the Constitution.

But to return to the pamphlet. It complains that great injustice was done at Moscow, in Kentucky. The Senator refers to a report of Major Gibson of the mode in which the election at this place was conducted. The major says:

"Major Gibson having read to the board of inspectors of election General Harbat's Order No. 159, and General Asboth's General Order No. 47, explaining the same, and prescribing the oath to be administered to the voters and candidates, and having read to them General Burnside's order placing the State of Kentucky under martial law, and having stated publicly before the board, in the presence of the voters, that he was there under proper military orders to enforce a strict compliance with General Asboth's Order No. 47, demanded of the clerk, sheriff, and judges that each of them should, before recording a vote, take the oath. They refused to do so on the ground that General Asboth's order, in their opinion, was inconsistent with President Lincoln's proclamation in regard to those who would within a certain time lay down their arms and return to their duty as loyal citizens; that the oath required of them by General Asboth conflicted with their oaths to the constitution and laws of Kentucky in this, that the constitution of Kentucky guaranteed to the people a free election, and that the laws of the State subjected them, as inspectors, to fines, forfeitures, penalties, indictments, &c., unless they placed upon the poll-lists the names of all candidates voted for, and that they could not as honorable and conscientious men, take an oath which required them to act as judges of the election in accordance with the laws of Kentucky, and take an oath prescribed by General Asboth, which did not in their opinion coincide with the enactments of the State of Kentucky.

"They, as well as the citizens, claimed that the proclamation of Governor Robinson, of Kentucky, was the best authority and exposition in regard to the laws of expatriation and the return of citizens to their duty, and their rights and privileges thereafter; and that under his proclamation every citizen who returned to the State and remained peaceable and law-abiding and took the oath of allegiance to the Federal Government, was entitled to protection and to the right of the elective franchise.

"To this Major Gibson replied that they would subject themselves to similar fines and imprisonment in case they would not comply with General Asboth's order; that as long as the State was under martial law, and that law could be enforced, the civil law was subservient to the military power, and that unless they complied with the order he should have to place them under arrest and take them to Columbus.

"In order, however, to act in strict accordance with the order, (the order not saying in so many words that the judges or inspectors should take the oath,) one person, Mr. R. A. Thompson, was allowed to offer to vote. Major Gibson demanded of the judges that they administer the oath prescribed by General Asboth. This they refused to do, for the reasons above stated.

"Major Gibson then placed them under arrest, and requested them to accompany him to Columbus, which they complied with promptly and cheerfully."

It is clear from this statement that the judges at that precinct utterly set at defiance both the act of Kentucky and General Asboth's order, and, of course, were arrested, as they deserved to be.

Again, the pamphlet enumerates nineteen counties in the State of Kentucky at some of the polls in which the military orders were enforced. These counties lie along the lower Ohio and on the Mississippi, in the western extremity of the State, and there is no proof of the alleged acts except the signatures to the pamphlet. Eight of those nineteen counties lie within the first congressional district of Kentucky, the same which in January, 1862, elected, without disturbance or resistance on the part of Union men, a member to the rebel congress. I may apply the old maxim, ab uno disce omnes; if such was the character of eight of these counties it is not fair to presume that a state of things equally hostile to the Government, equally inconsistent with loyalty, existed in the others?

The Senator's great complaint as to the execution of all these orders is that the Democratic ticket was not allowed to be voted. It is impossible to tell with any precision to what extent this may have been the case, and I can only say that I must presume, in the absence of all proof to the contrary, that the military gentlemen who guarded the polls acted impartially and fairly, and if persons were rejected on the ground that they were Democrats, the understanding of the military authorities in Kentucky was that such Democrats were disloyal men. The truth of the complaint is, however, by no means established.

I do not stand here to pretend, and I will not assert, that there may not have been abuses in the execution of some of the orders. It would be very natural that such should be the case. Indeed, it would be impossible to exclude all abuse and all misuse of such a power. But you may say the same of the execution of any law. Every power, every law is liable to be abused; but this is no reason for denying or extinguishing the power itself, for repealing it or for repealing the law.

The leader of this party, Mr. Wickliffe, was plainly unfriendly to the Government of the United States. He was their candidate for Governor. The letter inviting him to stand as such declares that the writers "hold this rebellion utterly unjustifiable in its inception," plainly, as I have already remarked, intimating that it had become justifiable. The writers of the pamphlet observe: "Mr. Wickliffe, in accepting the nomination which had thus been tendered him, expressed his hearty concurrence in our view;" that is, his hearty concurrence in the statement that the rebellion had become no longer unjustifiable. I submit, sir, that a man who, at such a time, can so far forget what is due to his country as to intimate that this rebellion had become a justifiable one, was not a fit person to be voted for at the polls. And I say boldly that I think the military authorities in Kentucky did exactly right when they instructed the judges of election not to permit Mr. Wickliffe's name to appear on the poll list as a candidate for Governor, although, notwithstanding several orders of that kind, he received a very considerable vote in Kentucky.

But, sir, there is no allegation, even in the pamphlet itself, that any one single individual known to be a true and loyal man was hindered from voting at the election in Kentucky on the 3d of August, 1863. It is very true, as the writers of the pamphlet remark, that the aggregate vote at that election compared with the number of male persons over twenty-one years old in 1862 was small. The aggregate number of votes polled is set down at 84,930, while the writers remark "that in 1862 the whole number of male persons twenty-one years of age in Kentucky was 182,246." For obvious reasons the entire vote cast was comparatively small; but the smallness of the vote shows not so much that voters were excluded from the polls as that multitudes kept away because of their own disloyal proclivities, while thousands upon thousands had emigrated or gone into the rebel army or into the Union Army.

As a further illustration of this election in Kentucky, I have been at the pains of examining a document presented by the Committee of Elections in the other House, purporting to be the report of the contested-election case between John H. McHenry and George H. Yeaman in the second congressional district of Kentucky. Mr. Yeaman is the sitting member. That report presents this state of fact: the total vote in the second congressional district of Kentucky in 1861, and before anybody had gone out to either army, was 14,665; afterwards that district, according to the evidence contained in this report, furnished between five and six thousand men to the Union Army and about two thousand to the rebel army, making the total force furnished to both armies from that district about eight thousand men; in August, 1863, the total vote in that district was 11,398, of which Yeaman received 8,311 and McHenry 3,087, leaving Yeaman's majority 5,224.

The several military orders were issued only to enforce the law of Kentucky, and to defeat the rebel conspiracy. Yeaman was nominated by the Union party, and supported by them; McHenry sought and received the support of rebels. This is proved by overwhelming evidence; and it is proved that thousands of persons who were notoriously rebels, or rebel sympathizers, came to the polls and voted without let or hindrance. The oath was administered only to rebels and secessionists. The election was quiet and peaceable, and the soldiers did not interfere. Nottsville and Yillington are proved by this report to have been strong rebel precincts. At Nottsville McHenry had four to one against Yeaman, and at Yillington he had two to one against Yeaman.

Mr. POWELL. Do I understand the Senator to state that in that record there is no evidence to show that the polls were interrupted by the military?

Mr. HOWARD. The evidence is that there was no open interference by the soldiers in that district.

Mr. POWELL. I will not reply to the Senator now, but I will say one word. It is proved in the record which the Senator held in his hand a moment ago that in the counties of Henderson and Davis, and other counties, persons who were true loyal men were arrested and imprisoned who voted, and that others were prevented from voting, and absolutely the poll-book was taken away from the judges in one case. The grossest frauds and corruption are proved in that very document; and I will show it when I reply to the Senator.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall be happy to listen to any reply the Senator from Kentucky may see fit to make. The document is open to him; he is free to examine it.

The Senator from Kentucky asserts that the charge of disloyalty against the authors of this pamphlet is untrue, and he repeats over and over again that the Military Committee in their report charge those authors with being disloyal persons. Now, sir, you will look in vain in the report for any charge that the authors of the pamphlet are disloyal men. The report does not so charge them; yet I must say at the same time that the declarations of the authors of the pamphlet show a different kind of loyalty from mine. It is the loyalty of neutrality, which is no loyalty, and just as inconsistent with the duty which a State and its people owe to the Government of the United States as open rebellion.

Neutrality, sir, Kentucky neutrality, what is it in law, and what would it be if practically carried out there or elsewhere? If the agreement of General McClellan with Buckner had been carried into execution practically Kentucky would have been as effectually out of this Union as is now the State of South Carolina. Neutrality, let me say to the Senator, is an attribute belonging exclusively to a sovereign Power, an independent nation. You cannot predicate neutrality of any community that does not possess the right of sovereignty as an independent nation, for there are certain rights and duties pertaining to neutrality which can be exercised only by an independent nation, and with which any subordinate or dependent condition is totally incompatible.

Sir, let us contemplate for a moment the condition that Kentucky would have been in if she had carried out effectually her idea of neutrality. The Government of the United States would have been disabled from recruiting a single man within her limits, such recruiting being forbidden by the laws of war and nations within neutral territory. Again, the United States could not have marched a single platoon across the border of Kentucky, although the enemy had been in her midst. Without the permission of Kentucky, whose territorial jurisdiction reaches, I believe, to the right bank of the Ohio and to the right bank of the river Mississippi, the United States could not have transported a regiment or a single cannon upon her waters. The Ohio and the Mississippi would have been sealed up against the navigation of the United States. Not a gunboat could have been employed anywhere within her waters. She would have been flourishing in all the peace and comfort of neutrality, keeping the Union forces away upon the one side and possibly inviting the rebels upon the other, while at the same time she would have been at complete liberty to carry on trade and commerce in everything not contraband of war with both the belligerent parties. In short, she would have been enjoying a harvest of profits in her trade with the rebels, and a like harvest in her trade with the Union armies, and at the same time feeling none of the inconveniences of the war. Such, sir, was manifestly the idea at the bottom of Kentucky neutrality.

Is it founded upon the Constitution? Will the gentleman say that under that instrument it is the right of any one of the States to set up to be neutral in a war, whether a civil or a foreign war? No, sir. It is as plainly prohibited as open rebellion, and the claim is as incompatible with fidelity to the Government as the claim of nullification or secession.

Sir, it is amazing that a gentleman who has so much to say about the violation of the Constitution of the United States, a gentleman who has not hesitated to say upon this floor that if justice had been done to Abraham Lincoln for his imputed unconstitutional interference in State elections he would have been hanged like those who were denounced as traitors by the laws of Greece for voting at elections where they had no right—it is amazing that such a Senator can stand up here and advocate in the same breath the right of a State to assume the condition of neutrality in a war. It is nothing more nor less than actual secession, because it implies an utter repudiation of the obligations of the State to the General Government. Sir, I thank Heaven that the President of the United States at an early day rebuked this pretension. In the first message he addressed to Congress, dated the 4th of July, 1861, he used the following pointed and clear language. I read it in order to free him and all who support him and his Administration from all taint of complacency in and all countenance of this dangerous and fatal heresy:

"In the border States, so called—in fact, the middle States—there are those who favor a policy which they call 'armed neutrality'; that is, an arming of those States to prevent the Union forces passing one way or the disunion the other, over their soil. This would be disunion completed. Figuratively speaking, it would be the building of an impassable wall along the line of separation, and yet not quite an impassable one; for, under the guise of neutrality, it would tie the hands of the Union men and freely pass supplies from among them to the insurrectionists, which it could not do as an open enemy. At a stroke it would take all the trouble out of the hands of secession, except only what proceeds from the external blockade. It would do for the disunionists that which, of all things, they most desire—feed them well, and give them disunion without a struggle of their own. It recognizes no fidelity to the Constitution, no obligation to maintain the Union, and while very many who have favored it are, doubtless, loyal citizens, it is nevertheless very injurious in effect."

Truth requires me to say I am not aware that this assumption on the part of General McClellan, to encourage and sanction the claim of neutrality on the part of Kentucky, has ever been denied or renounced. On the other hand, judging from what I discover in a New York paper dated in 1861, I am led to believe that the statement made by General Buckner of his having entered into such a treaty with General McClellan is correct. There will be found in the New York Evening Post of June 27, 1861, the following:

"General McClellan, in a dispatch to an officer of the Navy in Cincinnati, states that the interview which General Buckner has reported was strictly private and confidential."

Here is an admission that he held an interview with Buckner, although he says it was "strictly private and confidential," a circumstance which does not alter its character or tend in any degree to contradict the statement of fact made by Buckner,

"That it was repeatedly solicited"—

No doubt—

"and that he gave no pledge whatever on the part of the authorities at Washington that the United States troops should not enter Kentucky."

No, sir; nor does Buckner affirm that he gave any such pledge on the part of those authorities, but only that the pledge was given by General McClellan:

"The only result of the interview, as he understood it, was that confederate troops should be confined to confederate soil, so far as Kentucky was concerned."

This statement of General McClellan is no-wise inconsistent with that of Buckner. It admits the fact of the interview and does not deny any of the important averments of Buckner. It alleges that General McClellan gave no pledge on the part of the Government. Buckner does not charge that he did. General McClellan affirms in guarded terms that the only result of the interview was that confederate troops should be confined to confederate soil so far as Kentucky was concerned. This is in perfect consistency with each of the stipulations claimed to have been entered into by Buckner, and is no denial of any of them. If this dispatch emanated from General McClellan, and he thought it worth his while to take notice of Buckner's letter, especially if that letter was inaccurate in its statement, that was the occasion for him to have denied the facts stated by Buckner; and still this dispatch contains no such denial.

Mr. President, I repeat that, so far as I have been able to discover, there is not a case where any good, true, and loyal man was driven from the polls by military authority in Kentucky who was entitled to cast a vote there. There may possibly have been such cases. If there were, they have not come within my observation.

I come now, sir, to consider that part of the report which relates to the State of Maryland, where it is alleged the grossest outrages have been perpetrated by the military authority in interfering with elections. There was a general election in that State in November, 1861. At that election Governor Bradford, at present the Executive, was chosen Governor. Just anterior to that election, as I have remarked, General McClellan, at the request of Governor Hicks, issued a proclamation for the purpose of guarding the polls against the intrusion of rebels and rebel sympathizers. But General McClellan was not the only military officer who assumed to exercise a military protection. General Dix also issued his proclamation in the following words:

HEADQUARTERS, BALTIMORE, November 1, 1861.
To the United States Marshal of Maryland, and the Provost Marshal of the City of Baltimore:

Information has come to my knowledge that certain individuals who formerly resided in this State, and are known to have been recently in Virginia bearing arms against the authority and the forces of the United States, have returned to their former homes with the intention of taking part in the election of the 6th of November, instant, thus carrying out at the polls the treason they have committed in the field. There is reason also to believe that other individuals, lately residents of Maryland, who have been engaged in similar acts of hostility to the United States, or in actively aiding and abetting those in arms against the United States, are about to participate in the election for the same treacherous purpose, with the hope of carrying over the State by disloyal votes to the cause of rebellion and treason. I, therefore, by virtue of the authority vested in me to arrest all persons in rebellion against the United States, require you to take into custody all such persons in any of the election districts or precincts in which they may appear at the polls to effect their criminal attempt to convert the elective franchise into an engine for the subversion of the Government, and for the encouragement and support of its enemies.

In furtherance of this object, I request the judges of election of the several precincts of the State, in case any such person shall present himself and offer his vote, to commit him until he can be taken into custody by the authority of the United States; and I call on all good and loyal citizens to support the judges of election, the United States marshal and his deputies, and the provost marshal of Baltimore and police, in their efforts to secure a free and fair expression of the voice of the people of Maryland, and at the same time to prevent the ballot-box from being polluted by treasonable votes.

JOHN A. DIX,

Major General Commanding.

That election resulted favorably to what was called the Democratic party. Governor Bradford was the successful candidate for Governor. He was elected under the order of General McClellan and that of General Dix. I do not remember to have heard a single complaint against either of those orders, though both were enforced. At that election also the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] was chosen a member of the State Legislature. Everything went off harmoniously. The whole country was satisfied that at that time at least there was a necessity for the orders. Nobody found fault with them. There was not then in Maryland, nor is there now, any law prohibiting traitors from voting; and, so far as I am advised, the qualifications of voters in that State still remain precisely what they were before the civil war broke out.

But just before the election of November, 1863, a military order was issued which has been the subject of great complaint and I think of great misapprehension. I refer to the famous Order No. 53, issued by General Schenck. That it may be understood, I will read it:

HEADQUARTERS MIDDLE DEPARTMENT,

EIGHTH ARMY CORPS,

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND, October 27, 1863.

It is known that there are many evil-disposed persons now at large in the State of Maryland who have been engaged in rebellion against the lawful Government, or have given aid and comfort or encouragement to others so engaged, or who do not recognize their allegiance to the United States, and who may avail themselves of the indulgence of the authority which tolerates their presence to embarrass the approaching election, or, through it, to foist enemies of the United States into power. It is therefore ordered:

1. That all provost marshals and other military officers do arrest all such persons found at, or hanging about, or approaching any poll or place of election on the 3d of November, 1863, and report such arrest to these headquarters.
2. That all provost marshals and other military officers commanding in Maryland shall support the judges of election on the 3d of November, 1863, in requiring an oath of allegiance to the United States, as the test of citizenship of any one whose vote may be challenged on the ground that he is not loyal, or does not admit his allegiance to the United States, which oath shall be in the following form and terms.

The oath is simply a promise on the part of the person taking it that he will not for the future take arms against the United States or do any act to aid or abet the rebellion, and has no reference to the past. The voter is not required to swear that he has not been in arms against the United States or given aid to the enemy, but is required to promise that he will not do so in future. The order goes on:

3. Provost marshals and other military officers are directed to report to these headquarters any judge of an election who shall refuse his aid in carrying out this order, or who, on challenge of a vote being made on the ground of disloyalty or hostility to the Government, shall refuse to require the oath of allegiance from such voter.

By order of Major General Schenck:

W. H. CHESBROUGH,
Lieutenant Colonel and Assistant Adjutant General.

The rule prescribed by General McClellan's and General Dix's orders went much further, for those orders prohibited all persons who were disunionists from voting, while the order of General Schenck was a mere promise of future good conduct. It was purely prospective, and was in no sense proscriptive. And yet Governor Bradford, in his message to the Legislature of Maryland, delivered in January, 1864, in his zeal to cover that order with odium and make it hateful in the eyes of the people, misstates and misrepresents it. In speaking of the order the Governor says:

"You will be furnished with a copy of this order, and it is not necessary further to recite it than to state in general terms that it was to be executed by the military, aided by the provost marshals. They were to arrest voters whom they might consider disloyal approaching or hanging about the polls; a prescribed form of an oath was furnished, without taking which no one, if challenged, could vote."

Thus giving the Legislature and the public to understand that whenever a person approaching the polls was challenged for any cause whatever, he was obliged to take the oath prescribed in General Schenck's order; whereas, in fact, the order only required the oath to be administered to those persons who were challenged, not generally, for any cause, but upon the ground that they were not loyal. The challenge was based solely on the ground that the voter was not a loyal man, and was limited to that question alone. Governor Bradford, without much regard for candor and fairness, misstates the effect of the order. He says:

"They were to arrest voters whom they might consider disloyal approaching or hanging about the polls; a prescribed form of oath was furnished, without taking which no one, if challenged, could vote."

That, sir, was not the effect of the order—

Mr. JOHNSON. I will thank the honorable Senator from Michigan to read the first clause of the order.

Mr. HOWARD. I have once read the whole order except the oath. I will read it again, however.

Mr. JOHNSON. I mean the original order.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir. I mean the original order. I am very glad that the honorable Senator from Maryland has called my attention to it again. The first clause is in these words:

"1. That all provost marshals and other military officers do arrest all such persons found at, or hanging about, or approaching any poll or place of election on the 3d of November, 1863, and report such arrest to these headquarters."

The Governor in his message repeats this first clause, and seems determined to treat it as if in force during the election, although he well knew it had been revoked by the President of the United States on the 2d of November, the day before the election, and at Governor Bradford's request. He seeks to make this order and those who executed it odious. He misstates and misconstrues it, and endeavors to impress the Legislature and the public with the idea that during the election the first clause was in force directing the arrest of all persons found hanging about or approaching the polls.

I have said that Governor Bradford's message was hardly candid in its statement of the contents of this order. On page 44 of the report of the committee will be found a proclamation issued by him on the 2d of November, the day before the election, to the people of that State. He says:

"After the above was in print, at three o'clock this afternoon, I received from the President the following dispatch:

"I revoke the first of the three propositions in General Schenck's General Order No. 53, not that it is wrong in principle, but because the military being, of necessity, exclusive judges as to who shall be arrested, the provision is liable to abuse. For the revoked part I substitute the following:

"That all provost marshals and other military officers do prevent all disturbance and violence at or about the polls, whether offered by such persons as above described or by any other person or persons whomsoever." The other two propositions are allowed to stand. My letter at length will reach you to-night.

A. LINCOLN."

Such was the dispatch addressed to Governor Bradford, the day before the election, by the President. That revocation of the first clause was formally announced by an order from headquarters at Baltimore on the day of its date, in which the general says:

"Paragraph I of General Orders No. 53, from these headquarters, is modified so as to read as follows:

"1. That all provost marshals and other military officers do prevent all disturbance and violence at or about the polls, whether offered by such persons as above described, or by any other person or persons whomsoever."

By command of Major General Schenck:
WILLIAM H. CHESBROUGH,
Lieutenant Colonel and Assistant Adjutant General."

On the same day the President of the United States addressed a manuscript letter to the Governor in which he sets forth his reasons not only for altering the previous order of General Schenck in that point in which it appeared to him to be objectionable, but for retaining the rest of it, and enforcing it during the election.

On Monday, the 2d of November, the Governor issued his counter-proclamation against the modified order. It is a singular document, and may be found on page 44 of the report of the committee. He says:

"I avail myself of the occasion to call to the particular attention of the judges of election that they are, on the day of election, clothed with all the authority of conservators of the peace, and may summon to their aid any of the executive officers of the county, and the whole power of the county itself, to preserve order at the polls, and secure the constitutional rights of the voters."

"It is also made their 'special duty' to give information to the State's attorney for the county of all infractions of the State laws on the subject of elections, and by these laws it is forbidden to any 'commissioned or non-commissioned officers, having command of any soldier or soldiers quartered in any district of any county of the State, to muster or embody any of said troops, or march any recruiting party, within the view of any place of election during the time of holding said election.'"

Again:

"I need not, I am sure, remind them of the terms of the oath they are required to take before entering upon their duties, and according to which they swear to 'permit all persons to vote who shall offer to poll at the election, &c., who, in their judgment, shall, according to the directions contained in the constitution and laws, be entitled to poll at the same election, and not to permit any person to poll at the same election who is not, in their judgment, qualified to vote as aforesaid.'"

"It is the judgment of the judges of election alone, founded upon the provisions of the constitution and laws of the State, that must determine the right to vote of any person offering himself for that purpose. I trust and believe that they will form their judgment and discharge their duty as their conscientious convictions of its requirements under the solemn obligations they assume shall dictate, undeterred by any order to provost marshals to report them to 'headquarters.'"

"Whatever power the State possesses shall be exerted to protect them for anything done in the proper execution of its laws."

This proclamation was a direct invitation to the judges of election and the people of Maryland to disregard the order, and, if need be, to resort to violence in resisting it. It was a threat to produce an insurrection; and to drive out the United States troops by force. The report of the Military Committee holds that the Governor had no right to issue it, or to instruct the judges in this manner. The Senator from Kentucky, in his emphatic reply to this part of the report, tells us that the Governor of Maryland had "a right to issue a proclamation concerning elections." Who denies it? The Senator was combatting a proposition the committee had not made. The committee do not say that Governor Bradford had no right to issue a proclamation concerning elections. What they do say is, that he had no right to issue this proclamation, and to assume thus to instruct the judges of election, and that so far as he did assume thus to instruct them he was guilty of a usurpation, as he clearly was. The language of the committee is:

"The law of Maryland charges the Governor with no authority over elections, and vests him with no right to instruct the judges of elections in the law of their duty."

"This proclamation was, therefore, a palpable usurpation."

This is a very different proposition from that which is put into their mouths by the Senator from Kentucky. And he exclaims exultingly:

"It was left to the Military Committee of this honorable Senate, a learned committee, to be sure, to make the discovery that the Governor of Maryland had no constitutional authority to issue a proclamation concerning elections."

Mr. POWELL. What page of the report does the Senator read from?

Mr. HOWARD. From page 22. Undoubtedly, sir, the Governor of Maryland, like any other Governor, has a right to issue a proclamation on any subject connected with his duties; but neither the Governor of Maryland nor any other Governor has the right to say to the judges of elections, "Your duties are such and such, and you must do so and so." The law, not the Governor's proclamation, regulates their duties. And whatever may be that law, whether in the shape of a State statute or the order of a military man for the protection of the polls, such as that of General Schenck, it is nevertheless law, and Governor Bradford had no more right to say to the judges that they were not to obey General Schenck's order than to tell them they were not to obey a statute of the United States. It did not lie in the mouth of the Governor of Maryland to dispense them from that obligation.

He not only assumes to dispense them, but tells them, almost in terms, that if they cannot successfully resist the order without calling out the power of the county, they are empowered to call it out. He goes further, and tells them that whatever power the State possesses shall be exerted to protect them for anything done in the proper execution of its laws.

Sir, if the judges of election had been as hasty as the Governor, if they had resorted to the power of the county or other force for the purpose of resisting the execution of this order, it is easy to see that before the sun of the 3d of November went down below the western horizon the soil of ancient Maryland would have been stained with fraternal blood, and hundreds, perhaps thousands of her sons been weltering in their gore; for it would inevitably have led to a violent collision between the troops of the United States and the people of Maryland.

The Senator from Kentucky proceeds to close his climax of denunciation against the committee with these words:

"To what miserable quibbles and inconsistencies those who defend tyrants and usurpers are driven!"

"Tyrants and usurpers," are they? Men who, under the flag of the Union, protect the ballot-boxes from violation and pollution, and keep from the polls rebels and those who are aiding and assisting rebels in this great national struggle of ours—these are tyrants and usurpers! Sir, I may retort this personal invective. I may say to the Senator from Kentucky, to what miserable quibbles and inconsistencies are those persons driven who seek to uphold what they assume to be the rights of the States against the supreme authority of the nation! To what miserable quibbles and inconsistencies does this doctrine of "State rights" lead us when we attempt to follow it! Sir, it is an ignis fatuus which necessarily draws on its deluded votary until he is lost in the brambles and thickets of a morass, until he finally brings up in open rebellion against the United States.

The Senator further remarks:

"The destruction of the reputations of those who know and have spoken of these disgraceful and wicked usurpations is the only means by which they can escape from that damning infamy which must in all time accompany them."

"Damning infamy!" Mr. President, we must run our risk with posterity. It is, however, fortunate, I think, for such declaimers that

"To each unthinking being, Heaven, a friend, Gives not the useless knowledge of its end."

Were it otherwise, these gentlemen, while looking into the future, if they are capable of looking into the future, would curse themselves and call upon the rocks and the mountains to cover them from the shame that awaits their memories. It would have been well for this class of politicians if they had indulged in some provisions when the cloud of this war was thickening and beginning to roll above our heads. Had they exercised but common foresight, especially while banqueting at their Belshazzar's feast on the plains of Kansas, they might have seen the "half of a man's hand" slowly revealing itself and writing upon the wall of their power the oracular words, traced by mystic but visible fingers upon the palace walls of that tyrant king, "Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin: God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it; thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting; thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians." They might have obtained a glance at such admonitions had they been blessed with ordinary prescience; but, sir, intoxicated with power, blinded by presumption, they allowed themselves to see nothing admonitory in the signs of the times, until, finally, their folly culminated in war upon their country, by which their power has passed away, thank God, forever!

But, sir, let us particularize. What were the acts of oppression in Maryland of which the Senator from Kentucky complains? We have a right to presume that he has in his speech presented all the proof which he deems material to make out his point against the Military Committee and in support of his bill. I have shown, I think, that all his proofs drawn from Kentucky are without weight.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Military Interference with Elections—Mr. Howard.

SENATE.

And now, what is the proof of unfair interference in Maryland? These are the alleged cases. The first is Colonel Tevis's proclamation, from which I will read a word; for I wish to show with what ingenuity the Senator from Kentucky has slurred over a most important fact connected with this order.

Mr. POWELL. I "slurred" it over by putting the whole order in my speech; every line of it is there.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir; but the fact of its instant suppression is not given. This colonel issued the following proclamation at Chestertown, Maryland, on the 3d of November:

HEADQUARTERS THIRD MARYLAND CAVALRY,
CHESTERTOWN, November 3, 1863.

Whereas the President of the United States, in reply to a letter addressed to him by Hon. Thomas Swann, of Baltimore city, has stated that all loyal qualified voters should have a right to vote, it therefore becomes every truly loyal citizen to avail himself of the present opportunity offered to place himself honorably upon the record or poll-book at the approaching election, by giving a full and ardent support to the whole Government ticket, upon the platform adopted by the Union League convention. None other is recognized by the Federal authorities as loyal or worthy of the support of any one who desires the peace and restoration of this Union.

CHARLES CARROLL TEVIS,
Lieutenant Colonel Commanding.

I am not certain but Tevis was correct in his ideas; but it is certain he had no sort of authority from General Schenck or any other military source for issuing such an order. And it was disapproved as soon as known, and on the same day of its date. Only about fifty copies were ever circulated, as the report shows; and on the day of its issue Tevis himself was arrested by his superior officer for thus transgressing his authority. The honorable Senator from Kentucky appears to be blind to these important facts.

The second case presented by the Senator is a statement made by a certain Thomas Sudler, not that any one had been prevented from voting, but that the sergeant at the poll told him that before General Schenck's order was received at his camp he had received orders from his superior officer—

"To challenge every voter, to examine all tickets offered, to administer the oath contained in Order No. 53, and to decline to allow any ticket but the yellow or Creswell ticket to be polled."

There is no proof that any attempt was made to carry out this subordinate order, and it is entitled to no weight as evidence except as showing that the author transgressed his duty in issuing it.

The third case put by the Senator is the statement of Cyrus L. Jones. Jones says:

"I called the attention of my brother judges, saying, 'There will be a hereafter to this.' The sergeant then guarded the window through which the ballots were handed in to be put in the ballot-box with soldiers, took his place at the window, and rejected all who would not vote the yellow or Creswell ticket. He did not permit a single ticket of any other description to be polled, although I saw two men make several attempts, at different times during the day, to vote a ticket with Mr. Crisfield's name on it, and many other men were intimidated from offering to vote."

This statement contains no reason for the rejection. It might have been because the persons offering to vote were notorious rebels, or had already voted, or had refused to take the oath, or were not qualified voters. It is, like the rest, an ex parte statement.

The fourth instance is the statement of Mr. J. H. Tarr that he offered to affirm to the conditions of the oath as prescribed; that this was refused, and he was ordered from the polls, and left without voting. This statement is evasive, and plainly omits to set forth the whole truth. He asked the sergeant to define loyalty, showing that he was at the polls merely bantering with the officer and uselessly consuming time, and hence driven off.

The fifth case is the statement of one Charles Cole, that a certain man of the name of Wachter was kicked and driven away from the poll; and he furnishes to the Governor a certificate signed by Mr. Wachter in support of his statement; but Mr. Wachter himself in his certificate does not say a word about the kicking or being pushed away from the polls; so that I take it for granted this part of Cole's statement is his own invention; for it must be presumed that if Wachter had been kicked or pushed from the polls as Cole asserts, he himself would have made the statement in this certificate.

The sixth is the statement of one of the judges of election, that a Mr. Davis, though willing to take the oath, was ordered to be arrested at the polls, and left without voting; and that another man at the same poll was induced not to vote by a threat of the officer to take the ballot-box from the judges in case they permitted it.

Mr. President, these are all ex parte statements. I will not say that they are all untrue; it is sufficient for my purpose that they are ex parte statements, and made without a cross-examination or any opportunity for the parties interested on the opposite side to be present and elicit the whole truth. They are, for the most part, the statements of heated, disappointed partisans. And what do these six cases of alleged abuse prove? Only this, that in a few, a very few, instances the power of the military was perhaps misused, but leaving it quite uncertain whether it was misused at all.

The Senator alleges that the judges were prevented from executing the laws. In many cases, he says, they were imprisoned. Let me say, with the utmost personal respect for that Senator, that I have discovered no case, from the beginning to the end of this vast amount of written testimony, which shows or conduces to show that the judges of election were prevented in any case from executing the laws. If there be any such case, I hope the honorable Senator will be able to lay it before the Senate. There are but two cases in which the judges of election were arrested; the one the case in Kentucky, which I have mentioned, where the judges of election openly and contemptuously refused to recognize the military authority and to execute the orders, and were therefore placed under arrest; the other, of which I shall soon speak more particularly, in Maryland.

In no case, sir, were the judges prevented from holding the election; in no case were they imprisoned until they had plainly violated the military order to which they justly owed obedience.

The two leading incidents of the election in Maryland were, first, the arrest of certain parties in Kent county, on the Eastern Shore, who had been prosecuting certain persons employed by the Government in enlisting slaves under the act of 1862, and second, the proceedings at Princess Anne, in Somerset county. Perhaps the most succinct account of the former is to be found in the report itself.

It is thus narrated by the committee:

"On October 31, 1863, Mr. B. H. Gardner complained in writing to Colonel Platt that he had been indicted and held to bail in $3,000 for enlisting negroes for the United States, called in the indictment 'abducting slaves,' and that 'the principal actors in the affair were James B. Ricard, candidate for the State Senate, George Vickers, sr., Jesse H. Hines, David A. Benjamin, Colonel Edward Wilkins, William P. Francis, Thomas Baker, John D. Todd, George B. Westcott, Samuel W. Spence, and Charles Stanley.'"

"On this complaint an order was made on the 1st of November, 1863, as follows: 'Colonel Tevis will arrest the above-named men and send them to these headquarters.' 'It was well known that the judge of that district is a violent secessionist, who had repeatedly prostituted the power of the judiciary into an instrument for the prosecution of loyal men; he had caused the indictment of General H. H. Goldsborough, for arresting certain traitors, though he did not dare actually to incarcerate him on his indictment; and for that and other outrages he had been arrested and sent to Fort Warren, when he was released by a mistaken clemency amounting to infatuation; and he signaled his return to the bench by a renewal of his evil practices, till the public indignation has lately compelled him to resign his judicial position.'"

"Of course it was not to be expected that the United States would allow a disloyal judge to pervert the judicial machinery of the State to annul the law allowing slaves to volunteer; and the order for the arrest of the parties implicated was given."

"When Colonel Tevis arrived in Kent county—"

This was just before the election; I think on the 1st of November or the last of October—

"he learned that Medlers, Perkins, and Fisher, had been also concerned in this prosecution, and they were also arrested for that cause. All who were arrested were sent to Baltimore on the 3d of November."

"Mr. George Vickers had also written an article, published in the Kent News, on the 26th and 31st of October, inciting the people to resist by force the enlistment of slaves, and the publisher of that paper was arrested with Vickers."

"Now, to cite these arrests as the commencement of military interference with the election;—"

Arrests which took place before the election, and had nothing whatever to do with it—

"and to suppress the sufficient and wholly different causes for the arrest, evinces a want of that candor which should characterize an executive communication. Other proof than a mere innuendo must connect them with the elections."

"So soon as this proclamation was known in Baltimore, the use which would be made of it to connect it with the arrests and to assail the integrity of the election was seen, and it was instantly disapproved by the general. Colonel Tevis ordered to be arrested, and the persons who were candidates were at once returned to Kent by steamer, on the night of the 3d of November, and they arrived early on the 4th, the day of election."

"Mr. Ricard now sits in the State Senate from that county. They were returned, after disclaiming any share in the prosecution of Gardner, but on parole to appear for further investigation."

Mr. POWELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question, and that is where he gets the proof that there were but fifty copies of that proclamation circulated?

Mr. HOWARD. It is stated in the report.

Mr. POWELL. It certainly was not in the pamphlet containing the Governor's message, which was the only document I thought the committee had before them. I have heard of no other evidence.

Mr. HOWARD. The other case is the alleged arrest of the judges of election at the poll held at Princess Anne, in Somerset county, by Captain C. C. Moore, and the prevention by him of Arthur Crisfield from voting. This transaction appears to have given rise to much clamor. It was alleged that Captain Moore had wantonly arrested the judges of election, and broken it up, and that he had willfully prevented young Crisfield, the son of Mr. Crisfield, a candidate for Congress from that district, from voting. So great was the disturbance of the public mind occasioned by the complaints against Captain Moore that the President of the United States at once, upon application made to him, issued an order for the arrest and trial of Captain Moore by a military commission. The matter assumed the more importance from the fact that Mr. Crisfield openly alleged that he had been defrauded of a seat in Congress by reason of illegal military interference in the district, and chiefly at Princess Anne, in Somerset county.

The case underwent a judicial investigation, and I shall best subserve the cause of truth by laying before the Senate the order of the President of the United States directing that investigation and the result of the investigation. The President issued the following order:

"Major General Schenck will put on trial before a military commission Captain Moore, mentioned within, for having transgressed General Order No. 53, in arresting the judges of elections, and for having hindered Arthur Crisfield from voting, notwithstanding his willingness to take the oath in said order prescribed. Let Hon. John W. Crisfield be notified of time and place, and witnesses, named by him as well as by Captain Moore, be examined. Let time and place be reasonably convenient to witnesses, and full record kept and preserved."

Captain Moore was brought to trial upon the charges here specified. Both parties, under the order of the President, were enabled to produce their witnesses, and the whole subject underwent a most thorough, patient, and exhausting examination before an intelligent and impartial military board; and that board came to the following conclusions, which they thus announce in the report of their proceedings to the President:

"After a careful consideration of this evidence, the commission is of an opinion that the closing of the polls by the judges preceded their arrest; and whatever may have been the reason given by Captain Moore, the fact remains that it was not judges he seized, but citizens who had abandoned their posts as officers. If any doubt remains, that doubt is removed by their formal announcement made at the time, and subsequently reduced to writing, sworn to, and published, that they could not and would not conduct the election in accordance with General Order No. 53. The commission therefore finds:

"1. That Captain C. C. Moore is not guilty of transgressing General Order No. 53, in the arrest of James M. Dryden, John C. Pints, and Thomas H. Fisher."

Who were the judges of election.

"2. That Captain C. C. Moore is not guilty of hindering Arthur Crisfield from voting while willing to take the oath of allegiance."

The whole proceeding, therefore, resulted in this: the officer against whom so much complaint has been made, upon whose name has been heaped so much calumny here and elsewhere, was found guiltless of the charges preferred against him, and to have acted in strict pursuance of his duty.

I read further from the report of the committee on the subject of the Maryland election:

"The Governor of Maryland has dealt in very general abuse of the officers charged with its execution, and number

Democracy of Kentucky, &c.—Mr. Anderson

ous complaints are appended to his message in proof of his imputations.

"But for these proofs we might have feared there was some foundation for the complaints; but the slightest inspection of those papers discredits them, and official documents disprove them.

"We take the trouble to make a brief analysis of them, so that the accusation shall fall by the confessions of the accusers as well as the authentic history of the occurrences.

"There are in Maryland twenty-one counties and the city of Baltimore, the latter containing one third of the people of the State.

"No illegal act is complained of by the Governor in the city of Baltimore, or in sixteen of the twenty-one counties.

"In one of the counties in which the election is pronounced void—Frederick—no candidate opposed Mr. Thomas for Congress; he received 3,987 votes, Mr. Goldsborough received 3,985 votes, and his competitor, Mr. Maffit, got 751 votes.

"The objection to this election is confined to one voting place.

"At that place one person is stated to have been compelled to cast a ballot against his will.

"The person who states this affirms that the votes of loyal voters were refused because they would not take the oath prescribed by General Schenck.

"But he also says, 'Your proclamation to the citizens and election judges of our State did not seem to be more regarded by the election judges at their polls than if it had never been issued.'

"So it was the judges of election, who, the Governor tells us, are the sole judges of the law, who thought his proclamation was not law, and who thought it was legal to require an oath as the test of citizenship.

"Does one vote in one precinct in one county seriously compromise the seat of Mr. Thomas?

"Every other complaint is confined to the first district, and to four only of the eight counties composing it; and so futile is the case made against those counties that the Governor disclosed his sense of its weakness by the significant remark: 'In the statements and certificates which have been forwarded to me from different counties in that congressional district, I have been furnished, I presume, with an account of part only of the outrages to which their citizens were subject.'"

I will also read an extract from another document I hold in my hand respecting the same election. It is the "minority report of the committee on elections of the House of Delegates" of Maryland on the subject of the elections which had taken place in that State in the preceding November, and out of which had grown contests for offices. The authors of this minority report are regarded in that State as secessionists. Their views, therefore, though apparently candid, are not to be presumed entirely free from partiality and party bias. They say:

"In the cases before you it is unquestionably true that no fraud, violence, or other illegalities were prompted, instigated, or practiced by the successful candidates, or by or through any of their friends, agencies, or means, or in any way intended to promote their election.

"It is equally clear that all such frauds, violence, and illegalities were prompted and instigated by those who were opposed to the successful candidates, and that they (the successful candidates) were elected in spite of such means of opposition."

Further:

"At a majority of the other precincts there was more or less of military interference, appearing mainly to be designed to impair the vote of Mr. Crisfield, and to promote the election of Mr. Creswell, opposing candidates for Congress, without aiming especially at any other candidate, except by one John W. Davis, provost marshal at Tyaskin precinct, who was willing that any voter should vote for whom he pleased, provided the voter would vote or promise to vote for him for sheriff. But he does not seem to have received many votes; nor does it appear that many, if any, voters were excluded from the polls at that precinct. At some of the precincts there was little or no interference.

"Upon summing up the testimony in regard to the military interference with the election, and its effects upon the voters, it is evident to the minds of the undersigned that more persons were kept from the polls who would have voted for the returned clerk and register than would have voted for the contesting candidates. Many Democrats did not attend the polls on the ground that the military had been or would be sent to the county at the instance of men of the Union party; and that they, the Democrats, as had been the case before in almost every part of the State, would not be allowed to vote. This impression appearing from the proof to be general, the undersigned are clearly convinced that more Democratic voters were kept from the polls than voters of the Union party. In consequence of this impression, and the actual military interference at the polls, the undersigned are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that Levin Woolford, the Democratic candidate for clerk, and John J. Dashiell, the Democratic candidate for register of wills, lost more votes than did the contesting candidates, Cadmus Dashiell, for clerk, and S. C. Long, for register. They are convinced therefore that the result, if there had been no military or other interference, would have been the same, except that Levin Woolford and J. J. Dashiell would have been elected by increased majorities."

As I said in the beginning, Mr. President, in order to justify Congress in passing this bill, the proof of existing evils should be plain, indubitable, and irresistible. The times especially require it. Were it a time of peace, I admit the military authorities of the United States would have no power to interfere with State elections; but it is not a time of peace, but of war; a time in which the feelings of every man in the nation are taking a fixed direction, either in favor of the Government or against it; a time when it is absolutely necessary for the preservation not only of the Federal Government but of the State governments that a line of demarcation should be drawn between the loyal and the disloyal, between men who are friendly and men who are unfriendly; and I insist that, in view of the evidence before us, there is no sufficient reason for the passage of this bill had we even the power to pass it. In reference to Kentucky, there is absolutely no proof that any loyal man who wished to vote has been prevented.

In respect to Maryland, the proof is that there may have been a few instances of abuse, a few cases perhaps, and only a few, in which loyal men entitled to vote have been hindered; but I urge in reply that the evils thus proved are by no means sufficient to justify us in withholding military protection from the great mass of Union men, and breaking down in the border States the only barriers which can guard them against the dangerous intrusions of disloyal men. Such a measure would open the door to far greater evils than those complained of. And, sir, so far as the bill relates to the election of State officers, I flatter myself I have demonstrated that the measure transcends the power of Congress. Such an act of legislation would be simply void for want of authority.

As to the State of Delaware, I have but a very few words to say, and shall then take leave of this subject. Those words will be the words which the Legislature of that State have themselves uttered, and I shall leave it for the Senate and the country to judge whether there was not in the case of Delaware a necessity equally urgent for the employment of the military in the protection of the polls. The Legislature of that State, on the 29th of January, 1863, solemnly resolved:

"That under the same pretense freedom of speech and of the press have become idle words, as if upon them did not rest the corner-stone of the fabric of our free institutions; that these monstrous usurpations of power are not rebuked by Congress, but tolerated because of the declaration that they are necessary to put down the rebellion. Such declaration is utterly false; but if it were true, regarding as we do the preservation of civil liberty paramount to every other consideration, we unhesitatingly declare that the end proposed to be attained is not worth the sacrifice required.

"That viewing the numerous violations of the Constitution of the United States by the Federal Executive as tending to destroy the liberties of the people and the rights of the States, and the evident intent to carry on the present war for the emancipation of slaves and the subjugation of the southern States, either of which, if successful, would, in the opinion of this General Assembly, involve the whole country in irretrievable ruin, and prevent forever a restoration of the Union; we therefore declare, under a solemn sense of the oath we have taken to support the Constitution of the United States, the constitution of the State of Delaware, and to perform our duties as members of this General Assembly with fidelity, that we can give no aid or countenance to a war for such purposes."

That is, to a war waged for the purpose of subjugating the rebel States; or, in more intelligible language, a war waged for the restoration and re-establishing of legitimate government in those States. Sir, this resolution of the Legislature of Delaware I regard as tantamount to an ordinance of secession; it is a declaration that they will take no part in this war because, in their opinion, it is unconstitutional and unjust. What else have the rebels said? What have the rebels, by resolution or in their public journals, ever declared more hostile to the Government of the United States and its exertions to suppress the rebellion than is contained in this traitorous resolution? for it deserves no better and no other epithet.

And, sir, by way of carrying out the ideas embraced in it the Legislature of the State on the 25th of March, 1863, passed an act making it highly penal for any person, a citizen of that State, to keep or bring or have within five miles of any voting place within the State any armed troops, punishing such person with fine and imprisonment as if he were a felon. Why, sir, if the laws of that State were carried out and the President were one of its citizens, and should happen to be personally present at a place of voting in Delaware in the command of a part of the Army for the purpose of arresting or giving battle to traitors, he would be liable under this Draconian act of great and mighty Delaware to be indicted, fined, and imprisoned as a malefactor. Sir, it is useless to tell me that there was no necessity for military interference in a State whose Legislature could pass such acts. The President of the United States would be blameworthy, he would forfeit the respect of every friend of the country, did he not see to it that the rights of Union men and of the Government were upheld in such places; and for one, sir, I thank him for his salutary interference. I thank him and I thank other military men for their devotion to the cause of the country, and their protection of the Union men of Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland, and Delaware in this terrible ordeal of civil war through which we are passing. Sir, the country owes them a debt of gratitude. The cause of human liberty, protected by a written Constitution, is greatly indebted for their patriotic vigilance and devotion.

Sir, I beg the pardon of the Senate for consuming so much of their time. They will, however, attest that I have not hitherto been in the habit of trespassing upon it in debate; but they will, I trust, forgive me that on a subject so grave, involving the powers of the Government as a peace-maker and peace-keeper in the States, I have felt it my duty to give this bill my earnest consideration, and to lay the leading facts before the Senate, as I shall do before the country. And I trust, as I close my remarks, the Senator from Kentucky will be disposed to dismiss the flattering anticipation in which he indulged at the opening of this discussion, when he announced that the proofs were so strong in favor of his bill that he should even expect the vote of the Senator from Michigan when it should be put upon its passage. Sir, I trust I have said enough to dispel that dream.

Democracy of Kentucky and their Allies in the North.

SPEECH OF HON. L. ANDERSON, OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 5, 1864.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the President's annual message,

MR. ANDERSON said:

MR. CHAIRMAN: In the remarks I propose to make a reply will not be attempted to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Voorhees,] but will be mainly confined to the situation of affairs in Kentucky, which have prevailed since the outbreak of the rebellion, and now present themselves, and in which the people of my State have an all-absorbing interest, and which has produced more or less of crimination and recrimination.

Three of my colleagues [Mr. W. H. RANDALL, Mr. SMITH, and Mr. CLAY] and myself, have been charged with deserting the Union party and the platform of the State by voting for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COLFAX] for Speaker, and the other Union officers in the organization of this House. It is known to every intelligent public man in Kentucky that the Legislature, at its session of 1862-63, adopted the following series of resolutions:

"Resolved, That our institutions are assailed by an armed rebellion on one side, which can only be met by the sword, and on the other by unconstitutional acts of Congress and startling usurpations of power by the Executive, which we have seen by experiment can be corrected by the ballot-box. Policy as well as principle requires that Kentucky shall await the process of reform, which is slow but sure, and refrain from all unlawful and unconstitutional acts which have already brought terrible calamities upon the country, while we invoke the aid of all patriotic men to avert the evils that threaten our free institutions.

"Resolved, That this General Assembly now, in the exercise of its right to differ in opinion with the national Executive, enters its solemn protest against the proclamation of the President of the United States, dated 1st January, 1863, by which he assumes to emancipate all slaves within certain States, holding the same to be unwise, unconstitutional, and void.

"Resolved, That the General Assembly declares that the power which has recently been assumed by the President of the United States, whereby, under the guise of military necessity, he has proclaimed and extended martial law over States where war did not exist, and has suspended the writ of habeas corpus, is unwarranted by the Constitution, and its tendency is to subordinate civil to military authority, and to subvert constitutional and free government.

"Resolved, That this General Assembly hail with pleasurable hope the recent manifestations of conservative sentiment among the people of the non-slaveholding States in their late elections, and regard the same as the earnest of a good purpose on their part to cooperate with all other loyal citizens, give security to the rights of every section, and maintain the Union and the Constitution as they were ordained by the founders of the Republic."

The cardinal idea of which is found in the first three lines of the first resolution, "that our institutions are assailed by an armed rebellion on the one side, which can only be met by the sword." Yet my colleagues, [Mr. MALLORY, Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. GRIDER, and Mr. HARDING,] who did not vote with myself and friends [Mr. CLAY, Mr. RANDALL, and Mr. SMITH] in the organization of the House, the other day voted against tabling the resolution of that impersonation of peace disloyal Democracy, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] to send commissioners to the rebel government at Richmond to humble the nation and disgrace our gallant Army by begging for peace, who then abandoned this cardinal idea that our institutions are assailed by an armed rebellion that can only be met by the sword.

But these resolutions were so full of complaint toward the Federal Government, and so silent of complaint toward the rebel government, that when the Union party met in convention at Louisville, where the loyal masses and not the politicians were represented, the convention would have nothing to do with the legislative resolves until a respectable degree of loyalty and Unionism was infused into them by the following additional resolutions:

"1. Resolved, That this convention approve and indorse the principles embodied in the joint resolutions upon Federal affairs adopted by the General Assembly of this Commonwealth at this late session, hereby affirming the same.

"2. Resolved, That the present causeless and wicked rebellion should be crushed by the whole power of the Federal Government, and the national authority restored over all the revolted States. And we are in favor of devoting our whole resources, if necessary, to the accomplishment of that object.

"3. Resolved, That we are opposed to the intervention or mediation of any foreign Power in our present troubles, preferring to settle our own difficulties in our own way, and all propositions to that effect which may be made by any foreign State or nation ought to be respectfully but unequivocally declined by our Government.

"4. Resolved, That the people of Kentucky have suffered insult and injury at the hands of the so-called southern confederacy, and are stimulated by every motive of interest and honor to oppose and overthrow it. This confederacy has sought and now seeks to break up the Union, forever dear and necessary to them, and when by their often repeated decisions they refused to join in the work of treason, infamy, and ruin, it trampled down their State constitution, put up a weak and usurping governor over them, and placed pretended senators and congressmen in its councils at Richmond, assuming to speak their voice; it invaded their State with armies, and sought to conquer and carry them away from a Union they revered to one they detested; it ravaged by bands of marauders, not soldiers, their fields time and again, robbed them of their public revenues and private property, destroyed their public records, burned their towns and houses, carried away their non-combatant citizens into long and loathsome imprisonment, where many still languish, murdered many of them, sometimes in their own homes, and in the presence of their families, and sometimes by cruel and infamous deaths, extending these atrocities even to women and children, thus setting at defiance all the laws of civilized warfare; and these efforts have continued and increased with the increasing aversion of the people of Kentucky to all its wicked designs, and now threaten to break with fresh force upon that State and people; that therefore the people of Kentucky can never cease their efforts for their own protection, the condign punishment of the authors of these wrongs, and the complete overthrow of the rebel confederacy; and all citizens of Kentucky (if any there be) who refuse to support their State and fellow-citizens against such unprovoked wrongs and cruelties, or profess to sympathize with such enemies, are false to their allegiance to friends, neighbors, State, and nation; that, nevertheless, of one thing the people of the revolted and the loyal States and of the world may rest assured, Kentucky will submit to such a despotism when she has no power to resist it."

"5. Resolved, That it is the duty of the Federal and State Governments to take timely and energetic steps for the defense of the soil of Kentucky against the invasion, the people from further plunder and ruin; and we earnestly invoke their attention to the subject, at the same time calling upon all the citizens of the State to second every effort in this behalf.

"6. Resolved, That our thanks are due, and are hereby tendered, to our gallant soldiers in the field, for the brave and devoted manner in which they have hitherto upheld the ancient renown of Kentucky, and bid them 'God speed' in the noble work of defending the honor of our flag and preserving the Constitution and Union, assuring them of our cordial, united, and unaltered support and the praises of a grateful country. That we feel also the profoundest veneration for the memory of the brave Kentuckians who have fallen in the great struggle for the Union, and the deepest sympathy for their surviving relations, whose just claims upon the country are hereby gratefully recognized."

The insult, injury, and grievances which the people of Kentucky had received at the hands of the rebel authorities and their minions are forcibly set out in the fourth resolution. These grievances, so onerous, so injurious, so insulting to a brave people, seem to have been forgotten or purposely overlooked by the "peace Democracy" and my colleagues, their allies, who differ from me.

But the supreme, cardinal resolve is the record in which the Union men of Kentucky pledged themselves:

"That the present causeless and wicked rebellion should be crushed by the whole power of the Federal Government, and the national authority restored over all the revolted States. And we are in favor of devoting our whole resources, if necessary, to the accomplishment of that object."

The whole resources of the people of Kentucky are pledged, not even excepting the everlasting "nigger," that so terribly exercises these peace Democrats of the North and my colleagues who vote and act with them. Upon this convention (not legislative) platform the candidates for State officers were nominated and were elected, save Hon. Joshua Bell, who declined the nomination for Governor, Governor Bramlette being put in his place.

But soon a Democratic party appeared in the field to contest for the offices, and this Democratic party absorbed the almost entire sympathies of the northern Democracy, and the entire corps of Democratic journals gave it a warm and cordial support, with a very few exceptions, among which may be named the Boston Post and Buffalo Courier.

A short retrospect of the history of this Democratic party of Kentucky will enable this House to estimate, in a slight degree, the loyalty of this party never found in its actions, and only occasionally in its professions. Soon after the election and before the inauguration of the present Chief Magistrate, Mr. Lincoln, the Gulf States began to secede; the border States were more tardy. The Virginia Legislature had invited, by resolution, a consultation of the border States in convention, to be held at Frankfort, Kentucky, in May, 1861. The Union men nominated their ticket, of one from each congressional district, and two for the State at large. The Southern Rights alias Democratic party also nominated their ticket. The election was to be on the first Monday in May. Before the election day the Virginia convention passed the secession ordinance, and she abandoned the convention called at her instance. The pseudo Democracy of Kentucky, seeing that they were likely to be disgraced in the election, and the time not having arrived when by force and fraud they could carry Kentucky into the maelstrom of rebellion, determined to withdraw their ticket, but the Union ticket continued and received at the polls one hundred and five thousand votes out of a voting population of less than one hundred and fifty thousand. It is still fresh in the recollections of many the fraudulent devices resorted to to defeat this election. In the county of my residence, these Democrats on the morning of the election sent out runners to the election precincts with the lying information that both tickets were withdrawn, and no election was to be held. In a majority of the precincts of my county no polls were opened; in some of the Democratic counties of my district no election was held. But the election showed that over two thirds of the votes of the State were still for the Union.

On the 20th of June following our congressional election came off; the State was then entitled to ten Representatives; nine Union men were elected and one Democrat, that notorious traitor, Henry C. Barnett. The Union ticket for Congress received a majority of about fifty thousand votes.

On the first Monday of August following the entire popular branch of our Legislature and one half the Senators had to be elected, and the Union party elected seventy-five of the one hundred members to the House of Representatives and all the Senators. Thus Kentucky had, from May to August, pronounced by overwhelming majorities that her people would abide in the Union.

Having been thrice defeated by such imposing numbers, the treasonable designs of this party culminated in a system of violent lawlessness and disregard of decency unparalleled. In most of my district all law and order was broken down; no man who professed Union principles was permitted to exercise the functions of his office. The circuit judge of my judicial district, who had been a great popular favorite, and who had administered the laws for ten years with entire satisfaction, also being a delegate to the Charleston convention; saw and appreciated its action, and felt constrained to denounce its objects, because he would not rebel against the Federal Government that had never wronged him, and betray the State whose laws had been confided to his administration, was not permitted to hold courts in his district; indeed, had he attempted to do so, an excited populace would have taken his life by the most brutal means. Committees were regularly organized, and constant communication kept up with the rebel military authorities at Memphis and elsewhere in Tennessee; these were constantly urging the rebels to possess Kentucky, especially that part of it in which I reside. The State's attorney for my district was sent as commissioner to Montgomery to obtain from the rebel government then sitting there guns to put in the hands of the disloyal; and they openly boasted that if they could obtain twenty-five thousand stand of arms they would take Kentucky out of the Union in twenty-five days. A disloyal Governor, through a disloyal inspector general, had the State arms distributed among disloyal State guards, most of whom went into the rebel service and took with them the State arms. An extra twelve hundred muskets and a battery of six cannon and caissons were sent to a disloyal colonel of State guards at Paducah, who shipped them out to my town, placed them under the care of a disloyal captain of State guards; and this within thirty miles of the rebel encampment at Union City, in Tennessee. Of course, as was intended when shipped from Frankfort, these all fell into the hands of the rebels; they made a raid one night and got the guns without resistance. The largest town in my district, Paducah, containing about six thousand inhabitants, was governed by a mob. Though the criminal judge of the district lived there, and a county and city judge lived there, and other inferior magistrates, yet there was no law or order, no guarantee to Union men; these were mobbed and driven off, and sometimes murdered. The railroad was controlled for the purpose of transporting every contraband article to the rebels, while the packages of citizens who were Union men were violently opened and searched. The lives of Union men were daily and openly threatened because of their sentiments, and more than twenty murders occurred within a circle of twenty miles of my town, of citizens, before either side had taken military possession. Large meetings were held at which the most treasonable sentiments were uttered, recruiting for the rebel service openly and defiantly made, with the avowed purpose of possessing Kentucky and subjugating her free people. A disloyal Governor had twice called the State Legislature together to get it to call a "sovereignty convention," but it persistently refused.

Having failed to accomplish their wicked designs, through the firmness and patriotism of the people and Legislature, they resorted to a means which, although more wicked, was more promising. A petition directing the Governor to call a "sovereignty convention" by proclamation was circulated, and obtained thousands of signatures. This great abomination was advocated by their chief organs, the Louisville Courier and Paducah Herald, but the loyal men in various ways made it known to the Governor that his life would be the forfeit of any such wickedness. All their nefarious projects having miscarried, these par excellence, patriotic, and much-oppressed Democrats of the first congressional district—a part of the people of which I have the honor to represent, the others being represented by one Willis B. Machen in the rebel congress, placed there by their votes openly and notoriously given at a public election—called a convention, to meet at my town, Mayfield, for the purpose of making a military alliance with the then seceded State of Tennessee, and separating the entire first congressional district from the State of Kentucky. The address that called forth that immense convention—the largest ever held in my district—was one of the most treasurable documents ever put forth by the most unblushing traitor. It was signed by three now prominent Democrats of my section. The bold and treasonable utterances of that convention were not excelled by South Carolina. Who were the chief actors in that traitorous conclave? Without stopping to rehearse their names, I will say they embrace almost every prominent Democrat in my district at this time. In this nest of rebels and conspirators was hatched that most infamous of pretended governments, the provisional government of Kentucky.

Soon after this Mayfield convention there was a body of personal and political bankrupts met at Russellville, Logan county, Kentucky, which, in the sheerest mockery, called themselves a convention. Not an election in any county of the State had been held. In some counties not even a common neighborhood political gathering, in other counties the merest meager primary meetings were held, and, by common resolve of political juntas, delegates were sent to the Russellville convention. Every county in the State was professedly represented—many of them self-constituted delegates. Yet this motley crowd of traitors, bankrupts, in principle as well as personal and political, assumed to be a sovereignty convention, to frame a constitution and make a government for the people of Kentucky, and overturn the well-established State government. They elected one George W. Johnson their provisional governor, and other State officers, and appointed one representative from each congressional district, who constituted his legislative council, with power to enact laws.

Among the enormities of this legislative council was an act giving to their justices of the peace jurisdiction to fine the citizen one thousand dollars and imprison him twelve months, without the intervention of a jury; and imprisonment by the petty tools of traitors hung over every Union man. This provisional government, being upheld by the military power of the rebels, then having a large part of the State in possession, by fines and gun taxes, and other illegal exactions, plundered the people of Kentucky out of hundreds of thousands of dollars, to sustain the most miserable set of renegades ever before congregated.

This provisional government appointed commissioners, some of whom had been indicted in times of peace for felony and who had never dared to venture a trial, to visit the judges, clerks, sheriffs, and other county and ministerial officers of the legitimate State government, who had been placed in office according to the constitution and laws of the State, and require them to renounce their allegiance to the legitimate State and United States Governments, and to swear allegiance to the provisional State and confederate governments. On the application of this provisional government, Kentucky was admitted by an act of the rebel congress into the so-called confederacy.

Who were the men that got up and carried on this provisional government? Who were the officers of the legitimate State government who betrayed their trust and the confidence reposed in them and violated their oaths of office to the State of Kentucky, and, by this unworthy betrayal of the State and its people, swore allegiance to the provisional government and confederacy, continued to hold their offices, and turn over its functions and influence to this charnel-house of corruption, the Southern Rights, alias Democratic party? The old men of this party are at home, enjoying the protection of the Government, complaining of the "unconstitutional" acts of the President; their sons are in the rebel army, fighting against the State that gave them birth.

But the bright and glorious days of Forts Henry and Donelson, and of Shiloh, rolled around; the rebel troops were driven from Kentucky, the provisional government had been crammed into the pocket of George W. Johnson, and retreated with the army of the rebel General Sidney Johnston. The Federal troops took possession, and the benign and legitimate laws of the real State government could once more be administered, and as soon as you could say "Presto, change!" this Southern Rights party all at once became the Democratic party of Kentucky—great God!—and was soon admitted into full fellowship with the northern Democracy; "a fellow-feeling made them wondrous kind." Time marched on; another effort must be made by the rebels to redeem Kentucky. General Bragg, with the power and flower of the whole western rebel army, is sent into the State. They announce that they have come to stay and permanently possess Kentucky; men begin to recruit for their service; flaming addresses are sent among the people; the southern feeling is appealed to, and large numbers are again recruited, but wagons, horses, and bullocks are recruited by the thousand, and grain by the thousands of bushels, from the Union men, without compensation or even civility.

But thanks to the gallant men from the great Northwest, and those gallant veterans under Buell, Bragg is made again to retire from the State. Just before this, however, there was a scene in Frankfort. Johnston having been killed at Shiloh, one Richard Hawes was selected as the provisional governor of Kentucky, the rebels being in possession of the capital of the State—the legitimate Governor and the Legislature having removed to Louisville. Said Hawes was to be inducted into office in great pomp. He had read his address from the portico of the State-house, when an adjournment for dinner was made, and with a view to return and complete the ceremony by the official oath, but while at dinner the booming cannon of General Manson was heard from the romantic heights on the south of the Kentucky river, and ball and shell began to fall thick and fast among the rebel hosts. Without waiting to finish these ceremonies, so imposingly begun, or even his dinner, Governor Hawes disappeared with the rebel army, and the soil of Kentucky, so far as I know, has not since been desecrated by his tread.

Who were the men that aided in these imposing ceremonies? And who gave encouragement to rebel enlistments and impressments? The Democracy of Kentucky.

After these things occurred, and in the early months of 1863, preparatory to a contest for the State offices to be filled at the August election, 1863, there congregated at Frankfort a body of men calling themselves a Democratic convention, but from what primary assemblies the newspapers of the day did not inform us. Among those that congregated as delegates were many prominent actors in the scenes I have described.

Colonel Gilbert, then in command of the post, as a true and faithful officer and patriot, determined that no band of conspirators against the Government he was upholding should congregate to mature their machinations within his jurisdiction, and he dispersed them. After this was done, by private interviews and frequent intercourse, these men found a worthy representative of their sentiments and ulterior views and objects in Hon. C. A. Wickliffe, an ex-member of the Thirty-Seventh Congress. He was elected to Congress as a Union man, but, like other quasi-loyal men, had fixed an ultimatum at which he would cease to be loyal. He that fixes an ultimatum had better spare the time and labor and become at once disloyal, for he is destined to find himself ultimately coöperating with the rebels. He that cannot forego his cherished preferences and partialities, as events arise in the onward progress of such a vast conflict as is now convulsing the American people, has but little patriotism to start with, and that will become daily wasted until soon exhausted.

This Democratic party of Kentucky selected him as their standard-bearer in 1863, and the same party which had sent a full delegation to the rebel Congress, to vote the rebel authorities all the men and money that should be wanted, desired to send another delegation to Washington who would vote neither men nor money unless the President and Congress would let them dictate the policy of the war. This party also greatly desired the possession of the State government, as shown by their repeated efforts to establish the provisional government of Kentucky; but as this had become a hopeless failure, they determined to make an effort to possess the legitimate State government, and, as Democrats, went before the people of Kentucky, who knew their misdeeds and indignantly rejected them. They, however, had the sympathies of their northern Democratic brethren, who have never sympathized with the true Union men of Kentucky. And to-day nine tenths of this Democratic party of Kentucky would hail with delight the "stars and bars"—the ensign of treason—and rejoice to see it triumphantly waving from every hill-top and turret of Kentucky. Nothing would yield them more pleasure than to see the rebel General Lee, with his rebel army, possess and plunder the northern cities and people, and be able to dictate terms of peace from that venerable and sacred edifice, the Hall of Independence, in Philadelphia.

For the purpose of showing the positions occupied by Hon. Mr. Wickliffe I make the following quotation from his letter accepting the call to run as their gubernatorial candidate. He says:

"I became satisfied that the policy of the war was changed—that the abolition power had triumphed—that the measures of Congress and the policy of the war had fallen under the control of the abolitionists."

Again he says:

"I recorded my vote against those measures, and against the bill appropriating for the present year the sum of $700,000,000."

which was the Army appropriation bill passed at the session of 1862-63. Thus it will be seen that the position of Mr. Wickliffe, the nominee of the Democratic party in Kentucky, was that no more men or money ought to be furnished the constituted authorities of the Government for the suppression of the rebellion, unless they were permitted to dictate the policy of the war.

These were the issues; and gentlemen, claiming to belong to the Democratic party, upon this floor occupy a position identical with his. Those issues were decided by the people of my State, through the ballot-box, at the August election in 1863.

I do not refer to this matter because I have any desire to indulge in political controversies, but simply for the purpose of vindicating myself and those of my colleagues who are this day standing true to the platform of the Union men of Kentucky in sustaining the constituted authorities of the land, by furnishing them with all the means necessary to crush out this unholy and wicked rebellion.

Mr. Wickliffe states in his letter of acceptance that the character of the war had been changed by the President and Congress, and for that reason he had voted against all the appropriations necessary for the suppression of the rebellion, regarding the war as one for the abolition of slavery, which no Kentuckian of any honor or manhood could support; and this was the contest which took place in Kentucky in 1863.

Mr. Wickliffe's letter further states that the Democracy of Kentucky were in full sympathy with the Democracy of the North. About the time this Democratic rebel traitor party in Kentucky organized in opposition to the Union men, upon the platform that no more men or means should be voted to the Government for the purpose of suppressing the rebellion by force of arms, we find in Ohio—the third State in the Union in wealth and population—the same party meeting in convention to nominate a candidate for Governor. This convention claimed also to be the representatives of the Democratic party, and as such nominated, as candidate for Governor of that patriotic State, Mr. Vallandigham, who was a member of Congress when the rebellion broke out, and when the first gun was fired upon our flag waving over Fort Sumter, voted and spoke against making any appropriations to sustain the military power of the Government and to crush out the rebellion by armed force—a man who has been consistent in his opposition to fighting the rebels, and who constantly declared, as the members of his party on this floor are now declaring every day, that the Government cannot be maintained by meeting rebels force with force; that we must stop fighting and cease passing confiscation laws, as such a course only tends to exasperate the southern people and unite them against us; but that we ought to conciliate them by offering terms of peace. Such is the man the Democratic party of Ohio nominated for the office of Governor, on a platform in which not one word is to be found against the rebellion or in favor of furnishing men and money to sustain the Government in suppressing it.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Democracy of Kentucky, &c.—Mr. Anderson.

HO. OF REPS.

This action of the leaders of that party in Ohio convinced the Union men in Kentucky that the Democracy of the North, following the lead of such men as Vallandigham, Wood & Co., were opposed to sustaining the Government and putting an end to the rebellion. The action of that party in Ohio was followed by the Democratic leaders, not only in every State where elections were held in 1863, but also in almost all the other northern States. In the latter, for the purpose of misleading the people who had always voted the Democratic ticket, they called conventions and passed resolutions sustaining the nomination of Vallandigham, who had been sent by the Government into exile in the rebel States, where his sympathies always had been. This banishment was the result of his opposition, not only to the conscription law, which he denounced as unconstitutional, but also in consequence of speeches made in his own and other States, advising the people not to volunteer in the armies of the United States. For thus discouraging enlistments he was, by a court-martial, tried, found guilty, and sent South, within the rebel lines, into a locality where his nomination for Governor of Ohio was first made by a rebel paper. During all this time the contest in Kentucky was becoming sharp and bitter; the true Union men of the State supporting the ticket headed by Governor Bramlette, while the Democrats and rebel sympathizers followed the lead of ex-Governor Wickliffe. During that contest in my State, where did the so-called Democratic party of the North stand? Were they for the Union ticket or for the rebel ticket? Were they for the election of any man in the State known to be for sustaining the Government with all the means necessary to suppress the rebellion?

Mr. Chairman, the record has been made. I could, were it necessary, show by almost every Democratic paper in the North, that they were the advocates of the election of Wickliffe, and those occupying the same platform that he did. Not only so, but many Democratic sheets denounced the election held in my State in 1863 as a fraud on the great Democratic party of Kentucky; and in almost every Democratic convention held since that election they have denounced it in like offensive terms—not in particular districts, but throughout the whole State—when in fact the Union State ticket received a majority of the legal votes of the State.

Such, Mr. Chairman, is the character of the slanders published to the people of the United States in regard to the election held in my State in 1863, by professed Democratic papers in the North; and it is with such men on this floor, sympathizing with this party, that I am called upon to act, and am actually told that it is my duty to do so under the Union State platform. The charges made in regard to the election held in my State are without any foundation in fact. The election there was held in strict accordance with the laws of the State, and no one was prevented from voting who would take the oath prescribed, and no one refused to take the oath unless he was a rebel at heart and desired the success of the rebellion.

But, Mr. Chairman, the friends of this party now on this floor as Representatives are endeavoring to confine their denunciations of that election to certain districts in the State which have sent Representatives here who refuse to act in concert with the Democratic party.

Having given the action of this party in the State of Ohio up to the August election in my State, I now propose, for the purpose of showing the action of its leaders, to follow them to the great State of Pennsylvania. On the 17th of June, 1863, the leaders of this party met in convention at Harrisburg to nominate a candidate for Governor. The individual selected was Judge Woodward, who accepted the nomination, and the principles laid down in the following platform:

"HARRISBURG, June 17.

"On the reassembling of the convention, at eight o'clock this evening, the chairman of the committee on resolutions offered the following series, which were unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That we approve the resolutions upon the state of the country, passed by the House of Representatives of this Commonwealth on the 13th day of April last, and in addition thereto, and as a further expression of our views upon public affairs, do

"Resolve as follows, That we again renew our fidelity to the Constitution of the United States, the great charter for which our forefathers struggled and fought, and which was established, as they themselves expressed it, 'to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and posterity.' That inasmuch as the Constitution embodies the only guarantee we have for public liberty and private right, as without it we can have no hope of protection from bloodshed, spoliation, and anarchy, the man who sneers at the 'Constitution as it is' proves himself to be deficient in the first elements of patriotism, and any officer of the State or Federal Government who swears to support the Constitution, and afterwards, with that oath on his conscience, willfully violates it, is wholly unworthy of public confidence. That among the rights which the Constitution provides to every citizen, that of being secure in his life, liberty, and property, so that he cannot be deprived of either without due form of law—a fair trial by a competent judge and jury of his neighbors, with witnesses to confront him and counsel to defend him—is so great in itself, so necessary to the happiness of the people, for whom all government is made, and this is so plainly written down in the Federal Constitution and in all the State constitutions that any person who can misunderstand it has not the mental capacity which fits him for a public station.

"Resolved, That we have heard with intense alarm and deep indignation that some of our political opponents claim for the President of the United States a power hitherto wholly unknown in America, and never exercised in Europe or Asia except by the most despotic monarchs, namely, the power to arrest free citizens for the expression of their honest opinions on public affairs; and that the President has not only presumed to exercise this power himself, with the moderation and mercy which his own nature might prompt, but has delegated it to many subordinates, and they again to others in every part of the country, until its hideous presence is seen and felt all over the land.

"Resolved, That among the numerous officers to whom the President has given this terrible power, above the laws and above the people, there must, in the nature of things, be a large proportion who are totally incapable of wielding it either honestly or wisely, namely: politicians, filled with partisan rancor; knaves, who do not care for justice, and ruffians who delight in trampling it under foot; and therefore we are not surprised to learn that the worst men have been torn from their families, judges knocked down on the bench, ministers of the gospel imprisoned in loathsome dungeons, and respectable women and children treated with a brutality which it would be indecent even to name; and all this, in many cases, without a pretense, even, of a political offense, much less of any crime against the laws. That a free government cannot exist without a free press; and the constitution of this State, as well as that of the United States, has declared that it shall be free. Those persons, therefore, in office, who attempt to suppress books and newspapers by violence, are the enemies of this Government, and ought to be themselves suppressed. That we heartily thank the lion-hearted Democracy of Ohio for the manly vindication they have given to the Constitution against the great crime committed upon it in the arrest and deportation of Vallandigham, and we assure them of our cordial sympathy in the great struggle they are making for their undoubted rights. That the plain duty of the chief magistrate of this Commonwealth requires him to use whatever power the law has placed in his hands to protect the State and the people from lawless outrages, come from what quarter they may, and no man is fit to be Governor of this State who will consent to hold his own liberties and let the people hold theirs at the mere will of the Federal Executive.

"Resolved, That the Democracy of Pennsylvania have ever been true to the cause of the Union. It was in the name and for the sake of the Union that our party was made; that we denounce the base insinuation that the Democratic party entertains now, ever has entertained, or ever can entertain, the slightest sympathy with the present gigantic rebellion, or with traitors in arms against the Government, or would ever consent to a peace on any terms involving a dismemberment of this Union, as utterly unjust; and in proof of this we point with exultation to the lavish contributions to the war in blood and treasure heretofore and now being made by the hundreds of thousands of Democratic citizens, who were among the first to fly to the rescue of the Union, and peril their lives in its defense.

"Resolved, That, as the true friends of the Union, and feeling a profound anxiety for its fate, we claim, and will exercise, the right to consider, discuss, ascertain, and urge, in becoming terms, upon the people and the constituted authorities, whatever measures will, in our judgment, be most likely to place and keep the whole national Union together under one General Government.

"Resolved, That when the war began we had the solemn pledge of the Federal Administration and of the party which placed it in power, as expressed in the resolution passed by Congress July 23, 1861, that it is not waged on their part in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or for the purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of these States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired, and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease. But the Federal Administration, acting under the influence of a small faction of ultra abolitionists, always opposed to the Union, and without the consent of the great mass of the people, has totally changed its grounds, growing and proclaiming its purpose to be wholly different, and thus it has greatly delayed our just hope of an honorable peace."

Mr. Chairman, what the great character of the resolutions were which these refer to, as passed by the Legislature of that State, I cannot tell; but no matter what they are, since the last resolution, quoted above, charges "that the Federal Administration, acting under the influence of a small faction of ultra abolitionists, always opposed to the Union, and without the consent of the great mass of the people, has totally changed the grounds of the war," which is the same charge, in substance, as made by Mr. Wickliffe, the Democratic candidate for Governor of Kentucky, thus virtually affirming that the war ought not to be further prosecuted. There is not one word in the entire set of resolutions denouncing secession or rebellion, or pledging the candidates to aid in furnishing men and money to suppress the rebellion. But, on the other hand, there is great sympathy expressed for the martyr and leader of the Democracy, Mr. Vallandigham. Such is the record as shown by the party in Pennsylvania.

In the month of July following, the rebels in arms against the Government of the United States invaded the State of Pennsylvania, but thanks to a loyal people, who refused to listen to the teachings of disloyal Democracy, the armies of the Republic were sufficient to beat back the rebel hordes, and when the smoke of the battle at Gettysburg had passed away the flag of the country floated in triumph upon the field of victory, despite the rebels in arms, and their aiders and abettors in the North. About the time this great battle was fought and this glorious victory achieved, there was a disgraceful riot in the great Democratic city of New York, superinduced by the opposers of the Government in the prosecution of the war and the enforcement of a draft. An actor in the scene appears in the person of Governor Seymour, who belongs to, and is in sympathy with, the Vallandigham Democracy, who addresses the mob, and calls them his friends, instead of confronting them with the militia of the State, with orders to shoot down and destroy the last one of them. They were no doubt friends to the Democratic party, but they were enemies of the Government, and aiders of the rebels in arms against the Government. This same Democratic Governor sent a dispatch to the President of the United States to suspend the draft until order could be restored by conciliation, but the President, like a good law-abiding officer, refused to listen to the suggestion.

Mr. Chairman, such is the record of the party, such its showing in favor of loyalty and devotion to the Government. In these dark hours of peril and gloom, these scenes took place. They are recorded on the pages of American history, and will go down to posterity as the patriotic acts of the Democratic party. But the contest for political favor in the North went on.

Notwithstanding the defeat of General Lee at Gettysburg, and of the mob in the city of New York, the canvass in the great States of Ohio and Pennsylvania grew sharper and warmer as the day of trial approached. It was a contest between loyalty and despotism, a contest between the friends of republican freedom and civil liberty, and those who would surrender this country into the hands of rebels and traitors.

As the day for the election approached, another actor appears in the scene; a man who had fought under the flag of his country, and had apparently done good service—I allude to General George B. McClellan. On the 12th day of October, 1863, two days before the election in the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania, this man, who was once the idol of the Union men of the country, so far forgot himself, and the issues involved in these elections, as to throw his name and influence on the side of the Vallandigham-Woodward Democracy. I quote his letter on the subject:

ORANGE, NEW JERSEY, October 12, 1863.

DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to an article in the Philadelphia Press, asserting that I had written to the managers of a Democratic meeting at Allentown, disapproving the objects of the meeting, and that if I voted or spoke it would be in favor of Governor Curtin, and I am informed that similar assertions have been made throughout the State.

It has been my earnest endeavor heretofore to avoid participation in party politics. I had determined to adhere to this course, but it is obvious that I cannot longer maintain silence under such misrepresentations. I therefore request you to deny that I have written any such letter, or entertained any such views as those attributed to me in the Philadelphia Press, and I desire to state clearly and distinctly, that having some days ago had a full conversation with Judge Woodward, I find that our views agree, and I regard his election as Governor of Pennsylvania called for by the interests of the nation.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Democracy of Kentucky, &c.—Mr. Anderson.

HO. OF REPS.

I understand Judge Woodward to be in favor of the prosecution of the war with all the means at the command of the loyal States, until the military power of the rebellion is destroyed. I understand him to be of the opinion that while the war is urged with all possible decision and energy, the policy directing it should be in consonance with the principles of humanity and civilization, working no injury to private rights and property not demanded by military necessity and recognized by military law among civilized nations.

And, finally, I understand him to agree with me in the opinion that the sole great objects of this war are the restoration of the unity of the nation, the preservation of the Constitution, and the supremacy of the laws of the country. Believing our opinions entirely agree upon these points, I would, were it in my power, give to Judge Woodward my voice and vote.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

GEORGE B. MCLELLAN,

HON. CHARLES J. RIDDLE.

Thus it will be seen that General McClellan, after a free and full conversation with Judge Woodward, comes to the conclusion that "he understands Judge Woodward to be in favor of the prosecution of the war with all the means at the command of the loyal States, until the military power of the rebellion is destroyed." He seemed to be at a loss to tell how the Judge stood by the platform on which he was nominated, and which he (Woodward) accepted, or from any public declaration he had made; but it remained to find out the opinions of the judge, on the great and important questions involved, by a private, free, and full conversation with him. The platform, however, on which the judge was nominated denounced the arrest and banishment of Mr. Vallandigham, and expressed great sympathy with the Democracy of Ohio for such a violation of their undoubted rights.

Mr. Chairman, this is the same Judge Woodward who decided that the soldiers from the State of Pennsylvania, who had volunteered under the flag of their country, were not, under the act of the Legislature of that State, entitled to vote; but that the act referred to was unconstitutional and void; and he also decided that the conscript law was unconstitutional. But this same Judge Woodward and his party became exceedingly indignant when the laws of the State of Kentucky, prohibiting rebels in arms and their sympathizing allies from voting, are enforced by the officers of that State, and they denounce our election as a fraud upon the people, and a farce.

Such was the man, Mr. Chairman, that General McClellan desired to see elected Governor of Pennsylvania, over Governor Curtin, a true, tried, and devoted patriot. Sir, when General McClellan wrote that letter he destroyed his influence and standing with the Union men of this country, he cut himself loose from true patriots, and joined hands with those who opposed the Government in putting an end to the rebellion. By this action he has identified himself with the Vallandigham Democracy, with whom the Union men of Kentucky cannot consistently, and never will, in my judgment, act.

I might go on, Mr. Chairman, and show by the record that the leaders of the so-called Democratic party have assumed the same position in other States; that is, opposition to the future prosecution of the war; but it is unnecessary, for it is written on almost every page of the history of this rebellion that their position now is, and has been for more than one year, that no more men or money should be voted to crush the rebellion by force of arms. On this distinct and vital issue, the contest in the loyal States in 1863, for political power, was made and squarely presented. And it was decisively decided by the voice of a free and enlightened people against them. When the sun, on the 14th day of October, 1863, went down, the decision in the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania was made, and when the news was telegraphed North and South, the greeting of every Union man was, All honor to Ohio, the Buckeye State, and, God bless old Pennsylvania. They are as firm in their devotion to freedom as their sons were to the flag on the bloody field of Gettysburg. Who was there in the border States that loved his country better than party or treason that did not rejoice at the election of John Brough, by one hundred thousand majority over Vallandigham, and who did not shout for the election of Governor Curtin over Woodward? Every Union man in Kentucky rejoiced at the success of these men, but every rebel-sympathizing Democrat hung his head in sorrow for the defeat of those they regarded as their friends.

Such, Mr. Chairman, is the history of this party, as shown by its acts and conduct up to the meeting of Congress in December last. Then the issue was presented to the Union Representatives of Kentucky, how they should act in the organization of this House. We had either to act with the Union men of the North, and give them the organization of the House, or act with the Democracy, and give them the organization; in other words, to give the power to those known to be in favor of destroying the rebellion by force of arms, or to place the power in the hands of those who were opposed to furnishing the means necessary to speedily end this war by military force. Being pledged myself to the platform of the Union party in my State to sustain the loyal agents of the Government "with all the resources of that State," if necessary, I could not, as a Representative, do otherwise than keep my pledge and vote for the nominees of the Union party in this House, necessary for its organization. For this I have been charged with a violation of the platform of my party in the State of Kentucky. Not only so, but have been denounced as an abolitionist by that loyal sheet and would-be organ of the Union party of Kentucky, the Louisville Journal.

Mr. Chairman, the vote I gave for Speaker was in strict conformity with the platform of the Union party in Kentucky; and so far as the charge of abolitionism is concerned, it is an old, worn-out charge, always made use of by certain men when they have no other argument. But the idea of the Journal charging the Representatives on this floor from Kentucky, who voted for the honorable gentleman from Indiana for Speaker, as being abolitionists is simply ridiculous, especially when it is known that the senior editor of that paper has been charged by the Democratic party with abolitionism for the last twenty years; and they have further charged that before that gentleman left the land of steady habits, the State of Connecticut, he wrote a book, in which he appeared to be so anxious for the abolition of slavery in the United States that he wanted "the Lord to meet them in the air to free them." I know of no party in this country to-day who propose to go as high up for this purpose. This charge of being an abolitionist, Mr. Chairman, cannot deter or drive me from a full discharge of my duty. I was born and reared in the State of Kentucky; have been identified with slavery all my life; own slaves to-day. But, sir, my slaves, nor all the slaves in Kentucky, cannot make me disloyal or traitorous to my country. If slavery is being destroyed it is the result of this wicked rebellion; and my judgment is that when the rebellion is destroyed this institution will go with it.

Sir, when this war was inaugurated by the rebels and traitors, the Government of the United States called on my State to furnish her quota of troops to maintain the honor of the Government and uphold its flag. Governor Magoffin responded to the call, and said that Kentucky would not furnish a man or a dollar. In less than six months from the date of that response, the rebels and traitors in arms against our Government invaded Kentucky, for the purpose of forcing her people to join them in their unholy crusade for the destruction of the Government of the United States. And this invasion was made after the people of my State had three times in succession, in 1861, voted at the ballot-box to remain in the Union. Being thus invaded, and without the necessary means to protect ourselves from these traitorous hordes, the Legislature of the State (not the Governor) called on the national Government for aid to drive the invaders from the soil of the State, and nobly did the Government respond to that call. Troops poured into the State from Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and other States, and they were met and received with joy and pride by every Union man.

These men, who had left their homes, firesides, and all that was dear to them on earth, came to our relief in that dark hour of peril and gloom. They stood up side by side and shoulder to shoulder with the Kentuckians, under the same flag, and fighting in the same holy cause against a common foe. No questions were asked of those men, whether they were Republicans or Democrats, or whether they were for slavery or against it, but the vital, overshadowing issue was, the life of the Government is at stake, the honor, the lives, and liberties of the people of Kentucky are involved and jeopardized. Her citizens were being arrested and imprisoned, her fields were being devastated, and the rebels would have succeeded in the complete destruction and subjugation of the State had it not been for the timely aid given us by the national Government. With such help we were able to drive the rebels and traitors from our border, not, however, without bloody conflicts, for the soil of my State was wet with the blood of loyal Kentuckians and their allies and friends from other States who stood up with them on the field of battle. And to-day there are lying beneath the soil of Kentucky the bones of thousands of martyrs to the cause of the free principles of this Government.

Mr. Chairman, if Kentuckians can fight under the same flag with northern men in the same holy cause, is there any crime? Can it be criminal in me, a Kentuckian, on this floor as a Representative in Congress, to vote with and for northern men to sustain these soldiers now in the field? Could I do less, and maintain my pledge made long before the meeting of this Congress, than to give the vote I did?

Mr. Chairman, the vote I gave for Speaker was right. The acts and conduct of the Opposition or Democratic party on this floor since that vote was given confirm it. To show their opposition to the prosecution of the war, I will refer to facts which have transpired here. On the 17th of December last, my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] introduced a series of resolutions, as follows:

"Mr. SMITH submitted the following resolutions, upon which he demanded the previous question:

"1. Resolved, That as our country, and the very existence of the best Government ever instituted by man, are imperiled by the most causeless and wicked rebellion that the world has seen, and believing, as we do, that the only hope of saving this country and preserving this Government is by the power of the sword, we are for the most vigorous prosecution of the war until the Constitution and laws shall be enforced and obeyed in all parts of the United States; and to that end we oppose any armistice or intervention, or mediation, or proposition for peace, from any quarter, so long as there shall be found a rebel in arms against the Government; and we ignore all party names, lines, and issues, and recognize but two parties in this war—patriots and traitors.

"2. Resolved, That we hold it to be the duty of Congress to pass all necessary bills to supply men and money, and the duty of the people to render every aid in their power to the constituted authorities of the Government in the crushing out of the rebellion, and in bringing the leaders thereof to condign punishment.

"3. Resolved, That our thanks are tendered to our soldiers in the field for their gallantry in defending and upholding the flag of the Union, and defending the great principles dear to every American patriot.

"Mr. CRAVENS. Cannot we divide the resolutions?

"The SPEAKER. There can be a separate vote on their adoption.

"Mr. GRIDER. Is it in order to move that the resolutions lie over and be printed?

"The SPEAKER. It is not, the gentleman from Kentucky having demanded the previous question.

"Mr. W. J. ALLEN. Is it in order to amend the resolutions?

"The SPEAKER. Not unless the previous question be voted down.

"The House divided on the demand for the previous question; and there were—ayes 80, noes 6; no quorum voting.

"Mr. STEVENS called for tellers.

"Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. COLE, of California, and BLISS were appointed.

"Mr. MALLORY. I hope the resolution will be again read, and I think if the vote be taken again there will be a quorum.

"The resolutions were again read.

"Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that there be a recount without tellers.

"The SPEAKER. That can be done only by unanimous consent. If there be no objection, the Chair will again count the House.

"No objection was made.

"The House again divided; and there were—ayes 99, noes 12.

"So the previous question was seconded.

"The main question was then ordered.

"Mr. HOLMAN called for a division of the question.

"The SPEAKER stated that the question would be on the adoption of the first resolution.

"Mr. LOVEJOY demanded the yeas and nays.

"The yeas and nays were ordered.

"The Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

"During the call,

"Mr. MALLORY said: I rise to a point of order. The resolution on which the House is voting is not the one that is called the first resolution by the gentleman who introduced them.

"The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that by mistake the second resolution has been reported by the Clerk instead of the first.

"Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point of order that the first, though called a resolution, is really in the nature of a preamble, and should be voted on last.

"The SPEAKER. It is not, however, a preamble. It commences with the word 'resolved.'

"Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that the vote now can only be cast by unanimous consent.

"The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that there can be no objection to setting aside the roll-call.

"Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

"The SPEAKER. The Chair will take the responsibility of ordering the roll-call to be suspended, subject to the censure of the House if he be wrong in doing so.

"The Clerk reported the first resolution.

"Mr. CRAVENS. I move to lay the resolutions on the table.

"Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

"Mr. CRAVENS. I withdraw my motion to lay on the table.

"Mr. ANCONA. I renew it.

"Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays.

"The yeas and nays were ordered.

"The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 60, nays 100; as follows:

"YEAS.—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bliss, Brooks, Chanter, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Edson, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—60.

"NAYS.—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Bailey, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brova, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—100.

"So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table."

These resolutions are to the point; and it does seem to me that there is nothing in them to which any man could object who is really for crushing the rebellion by the sword. Such being the fact, how does it happen that gentlemen who claim to be Union men manifest so much opposition to these resolutions? Why vote to lay them on the table? If the doctrines set forth are correct and ought to be carried out by the constituted authorities, why endeavor to bury them? These are questions which every Union man will demand should be answered by the sixty Representatives who voted to lay them on the table. Mr. Chairman, if this rebellion is not to be destroyed by force, will gentlemen who oppose it being done in that way tell us how it is to be done? Is it by compromise, or conciliation? If the former, how shall we set about it, when the rebels, from the highest to the lowest, have declared time and time again, upon every occasion, that they would agree to nothing save the acknowledging of their independence? Every act and declaration of those in rebellion is to this effect. Then why talk about compromise unless you are willing to compromise on that basis? Why is it that when the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] introduced his celebrated peace resolutions during the present session of Congress, we find fifty-nine Representatives voting against a motion to lay them on the table; or, in other words, voting to appoint commissioners to open negotiations with the authorities at Richmond, to the end that this war shall cease?

"Mr. FERNANDO WOOD submitted the following resolution; which was read by the Clerk:

"Whereas the President, in his message delivered to this House on the 9th instant, and in his recommendation to the people to assemble at their places of worship and give thanks to God for recent victories, claims that the Union cause has gained important and substantial advantages; and whereas, in view of these triumphs, it is no longer beneath our dignity, nor dangerous to our safety, to evince a generous magnanimity becoming a great and powerful people by offering to the insurgents an opportunity to return to the Union without imposing on them degrading or destructive conditions: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the President be requested to appoint three commissioners, who shall be empowered to open negotiations with the authorities at Richmond, to the end that this bloody, destructive, and inhuman war shall cease, and the Union be restored on terms of equity, fraternity, and equality under the Constitution.

"Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I ask for its adoption; and on that call for the previous question.

"Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table; and on that motion call for the yeas and nays.

"The yeas and nays were ordered.

"The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 98, nays 59; as follows:

"YEAS.—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Briggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Ganson, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Ashael W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubard, Hutchins, Julian, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Lovejoy, Marvin, McAllister, McBrice, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perkins, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upon, Van Valkenburgh, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—98.

"NAYS.—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, Chanter, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Edson, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, William Johnson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, McDowell, McKimsey, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Stuart, Sweat, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—59.

"So the resolution was laid upon the table."

All who thus voted, with perhaps one exception, belong to the Democratic party, or act in concert with it. Why are gentlemen on this floor so anxious to send commissioners to treat with rebels and so loth to vote men and money to fight them? The rebels began the war, struck the first blow; and when they are satisfied with fighting, and have tasted sufficiently of Yankee bullets and bayonets, the presumption is that they will say so, and lay down their arms and submit to the Constitution and laws of the United States. Until they do so, I never will by any act of mine say compromise once.

Again, the armies of the Government are needing supplies of men and money. An enrollment bill is reported from the Military Committee to raise the troops called for by the President; and also to raise what may be deemed necessary in the future to put down the rebellion. To this bill it was hoped there would be no opposition from the Democratic party, especially as they have voted, when forced by a majority of the House, for the second resolution of my colleague, [Mr. SMITH,] "that it was the duty of Congress to pass all necessary bills to supply men and money to the constituted authorities of the Government in crushing the rebellion;" yet day by day they discuss and denounce the bill by which alone the armies of the Government can be filled to meet the rebel hosts, and finally on its passage almost to a man vote against it.

Such, sir, is the record of this party; a record which cannot be defended before an enlightened and patriotic people; a record in direct conflict with the platform of the Union party in Kentucky; a record against the soldiers now in the field, under the flag of the country, fighting armed rebels; a record which already stands justly condemned by the voice of a free people—by the people of my State at the last August election. This, sir, is the party with which the Union men of my State are told they must act in the coming presidential contest. Sir, the Union men of Kentucky will never forget their traditions for patriotism; never forget the teachings of that statesman, Henry Clay, whose principles they yet cling to, so far as to join hands with the Vandalism or so-called Democratic party of the North. No, sir, never; but her true sons will rally from her mountains, her rich valleys, and all along her smiling plains, and act in concert with the true Union men of the North and South, and at the ballot-box in November next say, by their votes, to the Vandalism Democracy, "Weighed in the balance and found wanting" in patriotism.

The true friends of the Union men in the border States are the supporters of the constituted authorities of the land, who are now and have all the while been endeavoring to put down this rebellion. We should not obstruct or endeavor to thwart the President in his efforts to crush the rebellion, by uncalled-for denunciations or unjust criticism on his acts, even though we may differ with him. To do so is to assist the insurgents, and to give them "aid and comfort." Sir, my State has suffered enough in consequence of this rebellion, and that too at the hands of rebels and traitors, as is truthfully set forth in the fourth resolution adopted by the convention at Louisville, Kentucky, referred to in a former portion of my remarks; but had she proved faithless to duty and followed the advice of her traitorous sons, Breckinridge, Barnett, and others, her situation would have been ten-fold worse; her fields would have been desolated, and devastation would have swept over her like a tornado. The effects of this unjustifiable rebellion are, however, to be seen all over the State; in home circles, broken families, separated and embittered on the causes of this terrible contest.

Sir, to be a Union man in a slave State is no easy task; he suffers the taunts and jeers of those who are ignorant, led on by designing demagogues, who too cowardly to fight remain at home with an oath on their conscience, protected by the Government, but on all occasions are talking about the Constitution and its violation by the President and those aiding him in crushing the rebellion. These are the men in my State who call themselves Democrats. They are the men with whom the so-called Democrats of the North sympathize; and it is such conduct as this, in my judgment, which is prolonging the war; and before God and the country, I believe that the opposition to the prosecution of the war by men professing to be Union men has largely contributed to keep up this struggle to the present time. All the acts of the Opposition in this House, together with all the declarations of its members, show to the world that they are opposed to destroying the rebellion by force of arms. They declare over and over again that war cannot bring peace, and that the people in rebellion can never be subjugated. These declarations and this opposition is made known to the rebels, and it has the effect, whether intended or not, to give them encouragement and make them hold out longer in the struggle. Why is it, if these gentlemen are for crushing the rebellion, they do not rise above all party feeling and prejudice, and by their acts, their votes, and speeches, aid the constituted authorities of the land in destroying the rebellion? If this course was pursued we would all be united and no power under heaven could defy us. The Opposition may think that the measures adopted by the President are not the best adapted successfully to put an end to the rebellion; but by the Constitution he is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, and it is the duty of all good citizens to aid and strengthen him in his efforts to restore peace and tranquillity to our bleeding country.

Mr. Chairman, there is no difference in moral guilt between those who adhere to a foreign despot and those who encourage a domestic traitor. A tyrant in 1776 attempted to smother a country in its infancy. Traitors in 1864 seek to destroy a nation in its manhood. Those who gave aid and comfort in 1776 to the enemy, either openly or secretly, were not as culpable as those who now either openly or covertly sustain this infamous rebellion. The Tories of 1776, the nullificationists of 1832, and the opposers of this war, will all in our country's future history be consigned to one common grave of infamy and execration. True and devoted Unionism knows no conditions, but stands by the constituted and lawful agents of the Government in all their action to crush the rebellion—scrutinizing such action, it is true, but doing so like earnest patriots, not like covert traitors. In times like these party spirit should be hushed. That spirit was hushed in the Revolution when our fathers were struggling to establish this Government. And when the hero of New Orleans crushed nullification in South Carolina in 1832, he was sustained by the patriotism of men such as Clay and Webster.

The true Union men of this country will protect it from foreign despots and from domestic traitors: "One country, one Constitution, one destiny." Let this be the rallying cry of the Union men in the coming contest for political power. It is the lesson breathed from the tombs of the patriots, who in times past maintained the honor and upheld the flag of our country. Let the lesson taught by their example and precepts prevail over the dishonoring suggestions of degenerate sons of the present day, who profess to belong to the Democratic party, but who malign and traduce the name of those who were true to the flag and interests of this country, one and indivisible.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

SPEECH OF HON. GARRETT DAVIS,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

March 30, 1864.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration the joint resolution (S. No. 16) proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. DAVIS said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: There is no more important business to be transacted by the people of the United States than the amendment of their Federal Constitution, the fundamental law of their Government. The general reason assigned by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, who reported this resolution, and supported it in a very able speech, why the proposed amendment should be adopted, struck me as being very unsound and altogether fallacious. He assumed that slavery was the cause of the rebellion: in substance, that whether the immediate and proximate cause was in the purpose of the rebels to establish a southern confederacy, consisting exclusively of slave States, and based upon the institution of slavery, or whether that immediate and proximate cause was the interference of the northern fanatics and abolitionists with the institution—in either state of case, slavery was the cause of the war, and therefore should be abolished. If my honorable friend should devote himself to the general policy of abolishing all causes that directly or indirectly lead to wars, with the purpose and hope to prevent them, I think he will adopt one of the most utopian and impracticable notions that has ever yet engaged the mind of a statesman and a legislator.

Sir, what produced the war of the Revolution? The apparent cause was the encroachment of the mother country upon the rights of the colonies. The immediate and proximate cause was the imposition of the stamp tax and duties on the importation of teas and other articles into the colonies. This was taxation without representation. According to the logic of this day, as taken up and enforced by the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the wise and proper mode of treating that difficulty at the time would have been to prohibit such transactions as required stamps and the importation of articles upon which duties had been or were likely to be imposed by act of Parliament. Taxation of the colonies by the Parliament of England without being represented in it was unquestionably the proximate cause of that war; and according to the reasoning of the Senator, the abrogation of all property, commerce, and transactions in the colonies upon which the mother country could levy taxes would have made their imposition impossible, and have thus removed the cause of the impending war, and that policy should have been adopted by the colonies as well to prevent the then impending as future wars.

We had a war with England commencing in 1812. Every war has its cause or causes, and the causes of most wars are multiform, and both immediate and remote. They are not single and isolated; they are not limited to one or two, but are generally many. They spring primarily out of the wickedness and bad passions of the human heart, its ambition, its lust of power and domination. Various subjects, according to the condition of different countries, are made the pretexts of war; but they are primarily in the infirmity and the wickedness of our common nature. The immediate causes of the war of 1812 were certainly the encroachments of England upon the shipping, the seamen, and the commercial rights of the United States. If those subjects of national rivalry and collision had not then existed, there would not and could not have been a war of which they were the cause or the pretext. According to the mode of argument of the honorable Senator the proper and wisest mode of treating that difficulty would have been to abolish those interests of our country that produced the war, aggressions upon which by England constituted its proximate cause. The cause being removed, there could have been no war; and their annihilation being permanent, they could produce no future wars with England or any other country.

What was the cause of the war of the United States with the Seminole Indians? What produced all the wars that we have had with the Indian tribes? Nothing but the encroachments of the white settlers upon the Indian lands, and the wrongs and oppressions committed by the white settlers upon the Indian tribes. The mode of argument adopted by my honorable friend would prove that all our difficulties and wars with the Indians could and should have been prevented by keeping our people away from their lands and all contact with them, to the end that there should exist no causes of war between them.

No gentleman is more thoroughly read than the Senator from Illinois of the number and bloodiness of the wars of which the Christian religion has been made the pretext. I suppose there is no matter that appertains to man that has been connected with a greater number of wars, or more of bloodshed and misery, and of such an infinity of crimes, national and individual. The argument of the Senator on the present occasion for the destruction of slavery would demand, with equal truth and far more force, the abolition of the Christian religion at the times when those wars occurred, and now also for its expulsion from the earth to prevent it from being the remote or proximate cause of future wars.

Sir, it has been said, and repeated times without number, truly, that history reproduces itself. The same course of events that have occurred will, under a like state of circumstances and causes that produced them, sooner or later come again, and so on perpetually. The world will, through all the generations of man, have its wars originating in the bad passions of rulers, of which conflicting national interests, boundaries, religion, and an indefinite number of other causes will be made the pretexts, and it is impossible to devise preventives for them.

Mr. President, if I was asked to point out the most operative single cause of the pending war, I should certainly name the intermeddling of Massachusetts with the institution of slavery. I suppose other Senators, and especially those from the northern portion of the free States, would associate South Carolina as being equally probably a greater sinner than Massachusetts. From this equality of delinquency and guilt I should certainly dissent. But I would be disposed to compromise the matter by conceding "bad eminence" to both of these States, and in relation to both I would be perfectly willing to adopt the remedy of the honorable Senator from Illinois and inflexibly to put it in execution. I would abolish both of the States; and if that abolition could have occurred twenty or thirty years ago I feel entire confidence that this deplorable war would never have occurred. I only regret that it has not been within the scope of providential events or within the actual and executed policy of the Government and people of the United States that these two pestiferous States had been wiped out in the past generation. Sir, it would have been a demolition, but it would have produced incalculable good to the whole country.

But, sir, I am opposed to the pending proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States for several reasons intrinsic to the subject. In the first place it strikes at one of the most essential principles of our commingled system of national and of State governments. When the Declaration of Independence was promulgated and when the Constitution of the United States was adopted, there were thirteen States. According to the present boundary of these thirteen States, the area of territory of the United States is now more than five times as much as the aggregate of those States, and the number of States will be, if the Union is restored, before many years multiplied to more than fourfold of the original thirteen. Those States had existed as independent communities. While they were colonies, they were independent of each other; dependent only upon the Government of the mother country. When the colonies assumed their independence, they took that condition as separate and distinct sovereignties, and the attributes of independence, in its essential nature, of each of the States was not destroyed or parted with by the old Articles of Confederation. All the substantial powers of sovereignty, of separate political independence, subsisted and were exercised by the various States after the adoption of the Articles of Confederation. According to my recollection, the Articles of Confederation were not finally adopted by all the States until 1778. They were offered for the adoption of the colonies in 1776, and a considerable time elapsed before they were adopted by several of them.

The people of all the colonies had been habituated from their first settlement each for itself, by its own will and by its own legislative body, to manage its own domestic and local concerns. There consequently was no proposition that these domestic concerns of the States should be surrendered to a common national Government, either when the Articles of Confederation or the present Constitution of the United States was formed. If such a proposition had been made, it would not have been entertained one moment, either in the Congress that formed the Articles of Confederation or the Convention that framed the Constitution. But if such an extensive jurisdiction had been surrendered by the States to the General Government, its exercise would have been impossible under the Articles of Confederation and impracticable under the Constitution, as well from the generally limited and restricted powers of the United States Government under both, as from the incompetency of our central Government to wisely and safely manage all the local affairs of so many States, varying in climate, soil, pursuits, productions, natural and artificial, education, opinions, and religious faith; and each for itself having always previously had the exclusive management of all these concerns. They were never intended to be, and are not in fact, confided to the General Government; but by an express provision of the Constitution are with jealous forethought reserved to the States.

If that was the state of things when there were but thirteen States and comparatively so small a territory, with what accumulated force does it present itself now, when we are about to have thirty-eight or thirty-nine States, and many others will soon be thronging into the Union, and it has already overleaped the distant Rocky and Coast mountains, and is washed by the billows of both the Atlantic and Pacific oceans?

If we are to have union, liberty, and peace, the indispensable condition is that the great fundamental principle, that the States are to have the entire and exclusive control of their own local and domestic institutions and affairs, must be held inviolable by the General Government. The opposite would result in intolerable despotism and misgovernment, soon to be overthrown by general consent or violence.

Sir, to this objection it may be answered, "This amendment is restricted to a single subject, and that subject slavery." But the proposed amendment carries a general principle which is as hostile to other peculiarly local and State institutions and interests as to slavery.

When the war of the Revolution commenced every State in the Union held slaves, and it was the normal condition of the colonies. It continued to be the normal condition of the States from their Declaration of Independence until after its acknowledgment by the treaty of 1783. The States that adhered to slavery and continued that institution had more reason and juster grounds of complaint against the States which abolished it than these States had against those that continued it. If all the States that held to slavery at the close of the war of the Revolution had continued it to the present time, the subsequent mischievous agitation by the people of some of the States of slavery in other States, and the present convulsion would never have been heard of. Slavery would not have been even an imputed cause of any war or trouble among the States. The States that abolished slavery themselves departed from the homogeneous condition of the colonies and original States. They had no power or reason to claim more than the right to control that institution within their own borders, to abolish it or to continue it, as seemed to them best; and they ought scrupulously to have abstained from intermeddling with it in other States who chose to continue it. The plainest policy and the commonest good faith required this forbearance.

The right of Kentucky to continue slavery was as perfect and absolute as was the right of Massachusetts to abolish it. She had no more just ground to insist that the other slave States should abolish slavery than they had that she should continue it. But Senators seem to lose sight of this great feature in our blended system of government. To maintain it, to hold it in its harmonious and perfect action, it is as essential that the existence of the authority and powers of the States within their reserved sovereignty should be upheld, maintained, and preserved as it is that the limited and delegated powers and sovereignty of the General Government should exist, be supported, defended, and exercised. Sir, our complex system of government was so fashioned and understood by those who made it. I will read from the thirty-ninth number of the Federalist, which was written by Mr. Madison in support of this important principle. He is discussing the character of the Government and its mixed features, and he says:

"But if the Government be national, with regard to the operation of its powers, it changes its aspect again when we contemplate it in relation to the extent of its powers. The idea of a national Government involves in it, not only an authority over the individual citizens, but an indefinite supremacy over all persons and things, so far as they are objects of lawful government. Among a people consolidated into one nation this supremacy is completely vested in the national legislature. Among communities united for particular purposes it is vested partly in the general and partly in the municipal legislatures. In the former case all local authorities are subordinate to the supreme, and may be controlled, directed, or abolished by it at pleasure. In the latter the local or municipal authorities form distinct and independent portions of the supremacy, no more subject, within their respective spheres, to the general authority than the general authority is subject to them within its own sphere. In this relation, then, the proposed Government cannot be deemed a national one, since its jurisdiction extends to certain enumerated objects only, and leaves to the several States a residuary and inviolable sovereignty over all other objects."

The men who framed the Constitution were preëminently wise, experienced, and patriotic statesmen. Its contemporaneous expounders understood it well, and the presentation and argument of its leading principles in the numbers of the Federalist, for ability and truth never was exceeded by commentary or gloss on any Government. If those who have charge of and administer the Government now and in the future would learn from them, maladministration could be but rare and of no great or abiding mischief. In no treatise which I have read can as much be learned in the same space of the true nature and principles of our Government as in number thirty-nine of the Federalist. In this paragraph the sovereignty delegated by the people of the States to the Federal Government and that retained to themselves and their governments respectively is clearly stated. In the first "its jurisdiction extends to certain enumerated objects only, and leaves to the several States a residuary and inviolable sovereignty over all other objects." The Government of the United States and of the States have separate and distinct portions of the aggregate mass of all political sovereignty, and each government is of paramount and supreme authority within its proper jurisdiction. To make war upon the United States or any State when they are respectively in the exercise of their constitutional powers or to resist by armed force the execution of their laws is equally treason; and if this war or resistance is made by officers of the United States against a State, or by officers of any State government against the United States, it is no less treason against the State or the United States respectively than it would be if the delinquents were unofficial persons. The President may commit treason against a State and a Governor of any State against the United States by the same acts that would be treason if done by private individuals. No position of office or authority, whether under the United States or a State, gives any immunity whatever for acts of treason against either.

Mr. HOWE. As the Senator and I seem to be agreed upon one point, and I wish to know how far I am committed—

Mr. DAVIS. I do not hold you committed at all.

Mr. HOWE. In reference to that I should like to ask him a single question. I ask him whether the Army of the United States commit treason in making war against the laws of South Carolina? Does he hold that that is one of the States whose laws limit the action of the Army of the United States?

Mr. DAVIS. No, I do not hold that, but I lay down my position thus: that when a State is in the performance of its duty in conformity to the Federal Constitution, that State is entitled to the same immunity from infraction of its laws and sovereignty by the President of the United States and all officers of the General Government, civil and military, as from its own citizens, and as the United States and their Government are from the Governor and other officers of the State. That is my position. The absorption of the sovereignty not delegated by the Constitution to the General Government, and consequently reserved to the States, or any portion of it, by the President or Congress, would be revolutionary and destructive of our system, as would be the absorption by the States of the sovereignty, or any portion of it, delegated to the Government of the United States. The encroachment of either upon the other would be equally unauthorized and criminal, and the persons engaged in making it punishable for parallel offenses by their respective judicial tribunals. There is a common and reciprocal duty and right between the Government of the United States and the States, to respect the powers and rights of each other and to defend their own. It is the highest obligation of every citizen to support and defend both against all assailants, though they be the officers of the other, and with its colorable authority. Mr. President, [Mr. POWELL in the chair,] it is clearly and imperatively the duty of you and myself to defend the reserved rights and sovereignty of Kentucky against the encroachments of Abraham Lincoln and his party, as it is to defend the limited sovereignty of the United States against the assaults of the rebels. To fail in either would be equally delinquent and criminal. Whoever, and by whatever command, has resisted by an array of force the execution of the laws of Kentucky, has committed the offense of treason against that State, and should suffer the penalty denounced against the crime. The President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and generals high in command have moved armed bodies of men into Maryland, Delaware, Kentucky, and Missouri, to resist and defeat the execution of the election laws of those States, and have themselves, by the power of the sword, driven their free citizens from their own polls, and themselves virtually appointed the minions of executive power to seats in the House of Representatives of Congress and to State offices. Those high functionaries thereby committed treason against those States, and the most important and imperative duty of their authorities and people is to have those great delinquents arraigned and punished for their crimes by the judgment of the courts of the States against which they were committed. The punishment of Federal officers so high in authority for the commission of treason against the States, by the just and firm execution of the law in their civil courts, would be an example of the most salutary influence. To suppress the rebellion by force of arms, and to punish by the due administration of the law its most guilty authors, and also the great violators of the Constitution of the United States, who profess to be acting under its authority, and who have committed treason against States, would effect more in the support and preservation of constitutional liberty, and to vindicate the capacity of the people for self-government than the performance of any other duty or work.

But to the objection that the proposed amendment of the Constitution would infringe the right of the States to manage their local and domestic affairs, it may also be answered that slavery concerns all the States as well as those in which it exists. If there be truth in this position, it may be replied that there is no important property interest, pursuit, or institution in any State that does not, directly or indirectly, concern the people of every other State; and that argument would require the Constitution of the United States to be so amended as to give the Federal Government power over all of them, which would establish a perfectly consolidated Government and virtually annihilate the States.

There are many matters, the control of which is left by our Government wholly and exclusively with the States, and over which the people would not have confided to Congress and the President a particle of power when the Constitution was formed, that much more closely and momentously concern all the States than the continuance of slavery in some of them. Religious faith is one. There is intrinsic antagonism between Romanism and Protestantism. For the first half century after the colonies became a nation the former was so weak in comparison with the latter that any great disturbance by conflict between them was impossible. But in the last thirty years Romanism has made great increase on Protestantism in the United States, both by immigration and propaganda. In Europe the fiercest and most implacable contests that man ever made with man has often occurred between these professors of the same Christian religion, and about it. There is no reason to hope that they will not be reproduced both on that continent and in the United States. The Federal Government has no power to interfere in any way with the subject of religion, although it has recently by its military officers made such interference, in violation of the express prohibition of the Constitution. The entailment of real and personal property, the principle of primogeniture, a system of railroads and other internal improvements in the several States connecting with the systems of other States—all these are subjects of domestic and local concern within every State, of which it has the exclusive management; and yet each one more nearly, and with larger interest and greater sympathy, would concern the people of all the other States than does slavery in the slave States the people of the free States.

The commerce, the social intercourse, and the material prosperity of the people of each State require that its mediums of travel and commerce should connect with those of all the adjacent States. Our general system of government is based upon the principles of popular equality and the equal distribution of property, upon the death of its owner, among all his children and heirs. The whole people of the United States have an indirect but essential interest in the maintenance of these principles in all the States; and a policy of self-isolation, or the establishment of entails or primogeniture in one, and especially in many, of the States, would be seriously hostile to those principles, and very repugnant to the people of the other States. The questions of the religious faith of the people of each State, whether all phases shall be tolerated, whether Romanism or Protestantism shall dominate, whether any and what form shall be recognized by law and have exclusive privileges as the religion of the State, whether Mormonism, Deism, or Atheism shall be established and exist in one or many States, and other modes of intercommunication and trade in each State to connect with those of all the others, are matters of much more real interest to the whole people of the United States than the continuance of slavery in the slave States can be to the people of the free States. The matter of religion is more apt to grapple strongly the passions and the imaginations of mankind, and the other subjects their selfishness and prejudices, than the existence of slavery in communities of which they are not members. Slavery, in this day and generation, has for the people of the United States a fictitious but an absorbing interest; in the future, under altered circumstances, the others, and especially religion, may still more strongly possess them. If this proposed alteration of the Constitution be accepted it will be a precedent, and may establish a principle that may carry those other domestic concerns, and still others not now thought of, into the domain of an encroaching and centralized despotism, and which would be a very great stride. If it were conceded that the power to amend the Constitution, as established and regulated by the fifth article, would by its terms and letter authorize the proposed change, it would be in fatal conflict with its intent and spirit, and therefore, according to a universal rule of construction, void and of no effect. It never was the purpose of those who made it to subject many of its great principles to be expunged by the exercise of this power of amendment. The power to amend is but the power to improve, and any alteration to be legitimate should be an amendment. To this it may be said that as there is no certain test by which this question of amendment can be tried it is necessarily decided by the amending power. Granting this argument to be sound, still there is another and very important question connected with this power of amendment. Does it import the power of revolution? Of making such essential change in the nature, form, powers, and limitations of the Government as would be revolutionary of it—of its important structure, of its characteristic principles, of the great and essential rights and liberties assured by it to the citizen? The true and precise question is, does the proposed change, or amendment, carry a revolutionary principle and power? I hold that the framers of the Constitution did not intend it to be, and that it is not in its nature or in fact, a revolutionary power; that there is a boundary between the power of revolution and the power of amendment, which the latter, as established in our Constitution, cannot pass; and that if the proposed change is revolutionary it would be null and void, notwithstanding it might be formally adopted. It would not be a part of the Constitution, and would consequently have no effect. An amendment proposing to abolish all the popular elective features of our Government, or that Representatives should hold their offices for life; that the place of Senator should be hereditary, coupled with a title and the privileges of nobility; that the President should be a king, and transmit his crown and throne as in England, would be revolutionary, and out of the power of the pale of amendment. Neither the legislative, executive, nor judicial branch of the Government could be swept away under the guise of the exercise of this power of amendment. The States and their governments are as essential and indispensable parts of our compound system of Government as the United States and the Federal Government, and could not be expunged by this power of amendment. The retention by the States of their exclusive rights, and the right to ordain, manage, and control them, independent of all control or interference by the United States Government any more than of a foreign power, is a great and essential feature of our system, and it cannot be revolutionized, destroyed, by this power of amendment. If it can take cognizance of slavery, it may of every other local and domestic concern of the States. That would be revolutionary, and is therefore out of the domain of amendment. The power of amendment can only be made to embrace the forms and the provisions and principles of secondary importance.

If the principle involved by the proposed amendment be sound, and it, if formally adopted, would be valid and obligatory, then in the same mode the terms of the members of the House could be extended for seven years; Senators could be metamorphosed into hereditary nobles, with titles, and the President into a monarch; and any other changes, utterly revolutionary and destructive of our Government and the popular freedom it establishes, could be made. No, sir, this power of amendment does not carry the power of revolution, in whole or in part, to be executed in solido or in detail, to burst forth at once in full-grown proportions, or to be cautiously developed from time to time and by gradual accumulation, like Mr. Lincoln's war policy, until the whole work is consummated. Neither the subversion of our free and popular Government, nor any of its great distinctive and essential features, or of those preëxisting and vital rights and liberties to secure and perpetuate which to the people were its object and its mission, is within the legitimate scope and operation of the power of amendment. That would be in both aspects, not amendment, but destruction and revolution.

Nor, sir, is the present condition of the country and the people at all propitious or fit to enter upon the most grave and important work of amending, altering the Constitution of our Government, the paramount law which regulates and controls within its orbit the constitutions, laws, and administrations of all the States and every official act of Congress, the President, and of every other officer of the United States. The revision of the work of the preëminently great and patriotic men who put together that wonderful political structure, so admirably adjusted and balanced, so novel yet so complete, so free and yet possessed of all the necessary and proper powers and vigor, is one of the most delicate and important tasks which those who are to perform it can possibly undertake. They ought to be free from all sectional prejudice and excitement, and bring to it calm and unperturbed reason and broad and true patriotism and statesmanship. The condition of the country should be fixed, that of settled and stable repose, that any changes and modifications might be safely and wisely adapted to its permanent relations, interests, and tranquillity. Who can foresee how materially different its situation may be at the earliest day when the proposed amendment would take effect from what it now is? Changes that might now be innoxious or proper and salutary may then be malapropos and mischievous. Such might be their nature and consequences in the circumstances of the country when the war closes.

But now, when the calmest and most far-seeing mind cannot conjecture with any reliable confidence, much less certainty, what will then be the United States, what will be their circumstances and exigencies, and what may be the intervening revelations of the workings of their Government, of its weaknesses and defects, and what reforms, if any, it may need, now to enter upon its reformation, its change, would be premature, rash, and would most likely result in evil, and possibly great evil. There is every probability that when the war is closed modifications of the Constitution will then be highly necessary and proper; but their nature, extent, and the features and powers of the Government in which they may be required cannot be possibly divined. Now to make any might mar rather than improve.

But when to this consideration, the unsettled condition of the country, is added the present state of the mind and passions of the people, nationally, sectionally, and individually, the position that now is not the proper time to intermeddle with the Constitution cannot, with any reason, be controverted. No man is free from apprehension and excitement, and with vast numbers it approximates frenzy, mania. Sectional opinions and prejudices were never before so rife and extreme. Hatred to slavery and slave-owners by the members of the Republican party generally has demoted them. They are wholly incapable of any fair and just consideration of the rights of slaveholders, in relation not only to that property, but all their other rights individually and collectively as slaveholding States. Extreme aversion and prejudice with both of those classes of the people have usurped the place of reason and truth. Neither entertains for the other any sentiments of kindness, fraternity, charity, or justice. I have no belief that there is in either House of the present Congress, or that there would be in the Legislature or convention of any one of the States, a single member whose mind and passions are so little affected by the present condition of public affairs as not to be disqualified for the delicate and difficult work of revising and altering the common Government of all the States and all the people of the United States. I believe with the most of them that unfitness would exist to such an extent as to make it impossible for them to deliberate and act, not only impartially and justly for their adversaries in politics and their sections, but also wisely and safely for themselves and their own States.

But, sir, if the country and the people were in a suitable condition to enter upon this work of revising and altering, with the purpose to improve, a constitutional Government made by the great men, so ripe in experience and wisdom, so broad and unselfish in patriotism, and so truly devoted to liberty regulated by law, and yet so diffident of their competency to the task, the mode adopted is not the best one. The principles and points that would demand consideration will not be one, but many. Their proper examination and settlement would require the freest and most unreserved interchange of opinions and views of the wisest and most virtuous men of each and all the States selected for this special work, and meeting together in common convention for its performance. Casual Congresses, assuming and presuming to initiate and lay out this work in single and separate patch-pieces, would promise but little of wisdom or good; and the simple acceptance or rejection of their recommended propositions, by as many local Legislatures or conventions as there are States, representing the sectional interests, opinions, prejudices, aversions, partialities, and all the weaknesses and errors of their several States, would hardly eviscerate from such assemblies any additions to the Constitution formed by Washington and his compeers that could be truthfully denominated amendments.

The best mode of reaching truth and principle, policy and safety, in any changes of the Constitution would be a convention, in which every State and all its leading interests should be represented; and the presentation of important facts, opinions, and views that concern them all, should be made to the entire representation of the people of the United States. The assembling of men together, face to face, who are local representatives, to unfold directly to each other matters of so much importance, that have close connections, and necessarily extensive antagonism, and that ought as near as possible to be satisfactorily compromised, harmonized, and settled, is unquestionably the best mode. If the Senators and Representatives of each State were to be isolated and convened in them, and without any comparison of views with those of all the other States were to act on all subjects of legislation, it could not bear any comparison with the existing mode. It is true that in the continuing and never-ending business of making laws for the United States, those objections would apply with a vastly increased force. But in the momentous and most difficult task of altering the Constitution in this perturbed and fearful time, and adapting it to an extent and condition of country and a trial and laboring of the Government that was not anticipated by the men who framed it, the same considerations ought to have the effect utterly to forbid this single or any other amendments in the proposed form.

Another objection of overruling weight is that no revision of the Constitution in any form ought to be undertaken under the auspices of the party in power. Its leaders have always been hostile to the compromises on the subject of slavery, and the protection which it guarantees to the owners of that property. From a much earlier day than secession was thought of in the South, those leaders had determined on the destruction of slavery; and, if they could not succeed by any other means, even to revolutionize the Government to effect it. They did not bring on a general war to that end, though they had long assailed it in every other form; and as soon as the rebellion broke forth they quietly decided, if possible, to make it the occasion and to furnish the means of the overthrow of slavery. Mr. Lincoln had been an extreme abolitionist from early life; and it was that consideration that procured him the nomination of the Chicago convention. When he and the chiefs of his party in Congress, at the commencement of the war, unanimously declared that their purpose and policy were not to attack slavery, or any other rights or institutions of the insurgent States, but only to vindicate the authority and laws of the United States over the rebels, they were dissembling, and then lying in wait to make an onset on slavery. They knew that their purpose could be effected only by breaking over constitutional guarantees, and by the power of the Army to subdue all opposition to their scheme. There is no right of person or property that the President and Congress has not outrageously infringed and trampled out, under and by the agency of the iron heel of military despotism, to subjugate or awe every person disposed to offer even legal and peaceful resistance to their flagrant abuses and usurpations of power. As they progressed, and met with impunity in their nefarious work, their objects were enlarged. They determined not only to consummate the destruction of slavery, so that it could never be restored, but also to continue themselves and their party in place and power. The first they consider substantially as an accomplished fact; and they are, and have been for more than a year, moving with increasing energy and boldness toward the other as their now paramount object. They affect to adhere to the forms of the Constitution, while they utterly disregard not only its spirit but also its express provisions and all the liberty and protection which it assures to the citizen. They have devised the boldest and most revolutionary measures under the guise of law and executive administration as the machinery of their operations. The first in time was the erection of West Virginia into a new State, and her admission into the Union in palpable violation of the Constitution, so admitted and avowed by many of their leaders both in and out of Congress; and attempted to be justified by them on the ground that the country was in a state of rebellion and revolution, and the Constitution of no obligation whatever. The President took the official opinion of the Attorney General, which was that the measure was without constitutional authority, and yet he approved it.

Amendments to the Constitution—Mr. Davis.

SENATE.

After the congressional elections in the fall of 1862 it was apparent that if those which were to take place in the other States in 1863 were to be decided by the free suffrages of their people, Mr. Lincoln and his party would be in a minority in the present House. The success of their projects and the retention of power by them made it necessary that they should have the majority in the House as well as in the Senate. He therefore ordered the military authorities to interfere and overthrow the freedom of elections, and to depose the State laws and officers for conducting them in Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland, and Delaware, to the extent of securing a majority for him in the House. In that way four supporters of the abolition policy and other measures of the Administration were returned from Missouri, of whom three have been reported by a Republican committee to be sent back to the people, on account of such interference, and in the other no contest was made, or the returned member would probably have shared the same fate. In the first district of Kentucky the military imprisoned one of the candidates, who was a true and loyal Union man, solely because he opposed the abolition measures of the President and his party; and so managed the election by excluding large numbers of legal voters from the polls, all over the district, as to return a radical abolitionist. In the Covington district there was such a general interference by provost marshals and other military officers in the canvass, and at the most of the polls during the election, as to leave but little doubt that the returned member was chosen by the coercion of that power. In Maryland and Delaware the military officers of Mr. Lincoln assumed the entire direction and control of the elections, except in one district in Maryland. They prescribed new and strange oaths for voters, and would not allow many to vote who were willing to take them, and at some polls would not suffer the supporters of the opposition candidate to exercise their right of suffrage, and restricted it to the friends of the abolitionist. They ordained new regulations in conflict with the State laws, and deposed and banished to the military headquarters at Baltimore, and there imprisoned, judges who refused to disregard the State laws for their government, and to execute the orders of those military usurpers. These outrages and armed overthrow of the laws of those States regulating their elections clearly amount to treason, and would upon all the considerations of justice and policy subject their authors to the declared punishment for that crime in the civil courts of the State in which they were committed. The appointment of Lincoln, by his military agents, of men to fill these seats in Congress were as true in fact, as certain in fact, and more atrocious because in violation of a written constitution, than any appointments which Cromwell or Louis Napoleon ever made to civil office by their military power. The President in this way defeated the election of eight, and probably ten, of his political opponents, and elected that number of friends in their stead, which made a relative difference in the party strength of the House of sixteen or twenty, and secured to him and his measures and party its majority. To that extent he was equally a usurper with Cæsar, Cromwell, and Bonaparte.

But Mr. Lincoln has long since imbibed other views and projects of personal ambition. A desire for reelection has seized upon him. It now possesses all the mind and heart and soul that he has. He is no statesman, but a mere political charlatan. He has inordinate vanity and conceit. He is a consummate dissembler, and an adroit and sagacious demagogue. He has the illusion of making a great historical name for himself in connection with the total abolition of slavery in the United States. He also loves power and money. He has long foreseen that in his desire for reelection he would have several competitors from his own party. He is not fierce or revengeful, or even boldly audacious and radical; and though not marked by any sense of benevolence, humanity, or justice, he does not possess positively the opposite qualities, and, though a radical, is not reckless or rash. He is, and always has been, as uncompromisingly opposed to slavery as the most ultra radical, but preferred to overthrow it with some show of legal and constitutional authority; and that it should be effected gradually, and not by sudden and violent change. Such were his first and individual views and policy in relation to slavery; but being rather of flexible but still obstinate nature, the pressure of the bold and more energetic radicals has pushed him pretty well nigh to their extreme position. As this "marshaled him the way he was going," he is well disposed to accept it, and if it promise to aid him materially in his purpose of a reelection, he would not hesitate to take it with alacrity. But he understands that most of the radicals prefer other men to himself, and while he must manage to satisfy and win them if possible, and especially as their second choice, he must hold on to all the moderate men of the Republican party, and by some show of conservatism win others outside. This keeps him very busy at his favorite game of "playing for all the pockets."

But he regards, and with much truth, that his personal, official, and distinctive party consists of the office-holders and seekers, contractors, and those seeking contracts, whose numbers are greater than our armies in the field. To those praetorian, not cohorts, but legions, he was determined to add others in his own especial interests. Hence he issued another edict, the effect of which was to demolish all the constitutions and governments of the rebel States, and among them Tennessee and Arkansas and other States, whose constitutions have not been changed in a particle within many years before the rebellion; and to authorize one tenth of as many people as voted in them at the last presidential election to reconstruct and to carry on their State governments. But he prescribed as the indispensable condition that all men who took part in the reconstruction must renounce their negro property, and take an oath to support his war policy as embodied in all his proclamations and the laws of Congress passed by his party. He pledged his faith to support and defend these spurious State governments by the power of the United States armies and navies. All their elections were to be under the surveillance of the President's military subordinates; and consequently none but his minions and tools could vote or hold office. The reorganization of those States is to be virtually by him and for all his purposes. They were designed to be dependencies and he the autocrat. The world never witnessed a more lawless and daring political enterprise, and, except in the feature of blood, it comes up to the measure of the greatest usurpations. The people of the States are the only legitimate power to construct or reconstruct their civil governments; and Congress, and not the President, is the authority to admit them primarily, or secondarily, into the Union, and to guaranty to them republican forms of government. Mr. Lincoln seizes upon all this power. Under this presidential autocracy, old, or eastern, as well as West Virginia, Louisiana, Arkansas, Tennessee, and other rebel States have been or are to be readmitted into the Union, and to take part with the other States in its government. By the present ratio all Virginia east, west, and rebel, would be entitled to eleven Representatives in Congress. The new State has three, and it is a question what portion of the residue the few counties of the other division of the State within our military lines can rightfully have, and a yet more difficult one what number of electoral votes in the presidential election will be the right of those few counties. The new State having but three for her Representatives and two for her Senators, if those few counties can elect the residue for the whole of the remaining State, and also for its two Senators, the new State and a small fractional part of the remainder of the State would cast together fifteen electoral votes. That vote by those counties would give them a very undue and unconstitutional weight over the people of the other States in the presidential election. If that will be permitted may depend, I presume, upon the problem whether it would be necessary to reelect Mr. Lincoln. To effect that object I believe a separate State could and would be organized out of East Tennessee, and two in Maryland, one upon the eastern and the other upon the western shore, without the least regard to constitutional difficulties. When Louisiana is readmitted she will be entitled to seven electoral votes, Tennessee to ten, Arkansas to five, and all Virginia to fifteen. So that by the organization of these four "rotten-borough" and unauthorized States, there would be secured to Mr. Lincoln not only thirty-seven electoral votes in the presidential election, but, what may be even of more importance, that number in the Republican nominating convention at Baltimore. I take it for true that these illegitimate States, being the progeny of Mr. Lincoln, will support him when and where and anyhow they can. They will also be ready to vote for this proposed amendment of the Constitution.

But Mr. Lincoln is a cautious and far-seeing man. He has had still another provision made, first and mainly for his own personal success, subordinately for that of his party. The Territories of Colorado and Nevada have already, at the present session, been admitted as new States into the Union; and the chairman of the Committee on Territories has told us, and no doubt truly, that Nebraska will also be admitted. Thus there will be admitted three more new States, each with one Representative and two Senators, having an aggregate of eleven electoral votes and an equal strength in the Baltimore convention. I believe, both on principle and policy, that no Territory ought to be admitted as a State until it has a population equal to the ratio of representation. That ratio is now 127,000. By the census of 1860, Colorado had a population of 34,277; Nebraska, 28,841; and Nevada, 6,857; making an aggregate of 69,975, and only 6,474 more than half the ratio. I have heard of no special increase in Nebraska, but have learned from men living in the other two Territories that there has been considerable recent emigration into both. But from all the information that has reached me, I have no belief that their aggregate population is as much as 127,000.

Thus by military interference at elections, the destruction and reorganization of States, the admission of new States with but a small fraction of the ratio of population, all by infraction of the Constitution, and in opposition to right, justice, and policy, and chiefly by the power and under the supervision of Mr. Lincoln, a great and dangerous strength has been accumulated to him as President to be exercised to promote his own selfish and ambitious views in the first place; and secondly, to continue his party in power to enable it to protract the aggrandizement of its leaders, the pecuniary advantages of its masses, and the complete consummation of its most wicked and destructive policy and measures.

Before the rebellion the ultra-abolition party was not large, and though pestiferous was not able to have inflicted great injury upon slavery. The southern members of Congress when they abandoned their places voluntarily surrendered their Government and all its vast power into the hands of the abolition party and their allies, the Republicans. The potency of this combined party for large and permanent mischief was born of the rebellion, and would have perished with it if the rebellion had been suppressed within the first eighteen months. As that had created its strength they were cause and effect, and must live or die together. The sagacious leaders well knew this truth, and so managed Mr. Lincoln during the whole of that time as to make him the unconscious instrument to protract the war. Heatlength awoke to the perception of his true position and part, but then he as well as they had objects which could only be secured by the continuance of the war, since which that has been a common object with them. If it were yet to be brought to a close within a reasonable time the Constitution and liberty might be saved, but amid great peril, to which every hour adds and may soon leave the task hopeless.

Our own Government has become so abused and perverted, so unjust and oppressive to all who will not bow to those who administer it in unquestioning submission, so fruitful and general a source of evil and practical despotism, that hundreds of thousands and millions of the most loyal people of the United States are in doubt whether it as administered or the rebellion is the greatest national scourge. The assaults, wrongs, and oppressions of both on the border slave States is such as to be passing them, as it were, between the upper and nether millstone. The greatest good that could now fall to the lot of the people of those States would be the speediest suppression of the rebellion by all constitutional measures and means, and by the expulsion from power of the party that has possession of the Government and is ruling the country and so recklessly rushing both upon ruin. I look for the consummation of the first to the continued efforts of our brave and numerous soldiery and the submission of the rebels. For the second I still rely upon the peaceful remedy of the ballot-box, applied by the sovereign power of the United States; and if it were applied so as to produce that great change, I believe that the cessation of the war, the submission and reconciliation of the rebels, the reconstruction of the Union, and the vindication of the laws and Constitution, with renewed guarantees and strength, would all speedily ensue. But if the dominant party can continue their power and rule, either by the will or acquiescence of the people or the exercise of the formidable powers which it has usurped, I am not able to see any termination of the present and still growing ills short of the ordeal of general and bloody anarchy.

RAILROAD TO NEW YORK.

SPEECH OF HON. L. D. M. SWEAT, OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

April 2, 1864.

The House having resumed the consideration of the bill to declare certain roads military roads and post roads, and to regulate commerce—

Mr. SWEAT said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Sincerely believing that the principles involved in the bill now under consideration are unwarranted by the Constitution and the laws of the land, as well as by the facts of the case, I feel impelled by a sense of duty, from my earnest convictions upon the subject, not to let this opportunity pass without at least making a few suggestions in vindication of the vote which I shall give. In times of war, excitement, and alarm, we are apt to be absorbed in the present and blinded to the future, and this is one of the great dangers we are now laboring under as a people. As one of the most distinguished and ablest of our public men once said upon a scheme of legislation similar to this, "Great and sudden changes in opinion on important political subjects are the usual forerunners of revolutions in States." This is emphatically so when the force of Government rests on common sentiment. The fear is that we, in our legislative action, may be too much influenced by the excitement produced by the distracted condition of the country to consider calmly any question of a political nature which may come before us. The magnitude and importance of the principles involved in this proposed species of legislation demand the earnest, thorough examination and consideration of this House.

Gentlemen who have spoken on this side of the House have seen fit to appeal to the magnanimity and generosity of the other side in behalf of the rights of New Jersey, her Legislature, courts, and citizens. Sir, I have no such appeal to make. I address myself to the facts of this case, and to the Constitution and the laws as applicable to them. Magnanimity and generosity I think are not demanded by the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company of me or of any other member of this House. My first impression of the unsoundness of this proposition now before us has gained in reading the report made by the chairman of the committee to whom this matter was referred. My attention had not been called to it except cursorily and incidentally until I took up the report and read it, and I must say I am astonished to find that a question involving such unprecedented and unwarranted demands for congressional interference has found a foothold in this House; and while I have the utmost respect and regard for that committee, collectively and individually, I must say I think they have made a report which cannot be sustained by the facts in the case, nor by the law as applicable to those facts.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] said to us yesterday, "Woe be to any corporation or State that raises its hands against the power and majesty of this great Government." But precisely here is the issue. I deny that New Jersey or the corporation interested in this question, existing under the laws of that State, have raised their hands against the Government, and I would caution the gentleman against the danger of acting upon a supposed and unfounded state of facts, and against the danger of being led, in these days of extreme legislation, to ignore the rights of the people and the just and true distinction between the rights and powers of the States and those of the Congress of the United States.

A disposition to make this a party question seems to have manifested itself in some quarters, but I deny that there is any party consideration that ought to influence this House in the disposition of the subject now before it, and I think that he who permits himself to be governed by any such motives can be neither an honest man nor a safe legislator. I have no feeling with reference to it except to see the right prevail.

Previous to 1830, when the first charter was granted to the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, it is well known that the whole country had settled down upon the idea that Congress had no power to interfere with the railroad system in the States. The question had been fully considered under all the Administrations from that of Jefferson to Jackson, and the public mind acquiesced in the doctrine that the power now claimed in the bill before us did not exist in Congress.

To show that such was the understanding of the previous Congresses I need only to call the attention of the House to the fact that in 1806 by Jefferson, in 1817 by Madison, in 1822 by Monroe, and in 1828 by Jackson, specific recommendations were made to Congress to have the Constitution so amended that Congress should have the power to legislate on subjects similar to the one before us. But their recommendations were not acted upon, and the Constitution was not amended. Such being the state of public sentiment at that time on the question of internal improvements, we find that the State of New Jersey, in the year 1830, granted a charter to the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, and that in 1832, after the union of this company and the canal companies, the Legislature passed a supplementary act, giving to this railroad company exclusive franchises, of which I will more particularly speak hereafter. They did this under the sanction of the fixed sentiment of the country, produced by the action of previous Congresses, and by the clearly expressed opinions of Jefferson, Monroe, Madison, and Jackson.

Now, it may be, sir, that any allusion to those distinguished men, or to the jurists of the country who have commented on this supposed power of Congress, will pass by as the idle wind. But, sir, I do not believe the time has yet quite come which John Randolph once predicted would come, when a member, who should rise upon this floor and quote the Constitution of the United States, would be called to order. I hope that hour has not yet come; but if I can judge anything from the indications of the times, we are fast drifting toward it. What are the facts? By section two of the act of March, 1832, of the Legislature of New Jersey, it was enacted:

"That it shall not be lawful at any time during the said railroad charter to construct any other railroad or railroads in this State without the consent of said companies, which shall be intended or used for the transportation of passengers or merchandise between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, or to compete in business with the railroad to which this supplement is relative."

This shows in clear and unmistakable language the meaning of the Legislature; and by a supplementary act, passed in 1854, this construction was most deliberately confirmed.

"By the preamble of the act of 1854 it is recited that by reason of existing contracts between the State and the companies as set forth in their acts of incorporation, and other acts in relation to the said companies, they are possessed of certain exclusive privileges which prevent the construction, except by their consent, of any other railroad or railroads in this State which shall be intended or used for the transportation of passengers or merchandise between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, or to compete in business with the railroads of the said companies. And by the first section of the act it is enacted that it shall not be lawful before the 1st day of January, 1869, to construct any other railroad or railroads in this State, without the consent of the said joint companies, which shall be used for the transportation of passengers or merchandise between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, or to compete in business between the said cities with the railroads of the said joint companies, or that may in any manner be used or intended to be used for the purpose of defeating the true intent and meaning of the act passed March 2, 1832, or of this act, which intent and meaning are hereby declared to be fully and effectually to protect, until the 1st day of January, 1869, the business of the said joint companies from railroad competition between the cities of New York and Philadelphia."

And as the chancellor of New Jersey well said: "It is difficult to conceive of a more express engagement on the part of the State, or of a clearer recognition of the exclusive rights of the companies than is contained in these statutes. Whatever doubts may be entertained as to the construction of the contract, there can be none as to the fact of making it."

At the time this company was incorporated nobody raised a question as to the true intent and meaning of the Legislature. Under this charter, Mr. Speaker, I contend that the State of New Jersey made a solemn contract with the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, and that both the Legislature and the company were bound thereby. If there is any gentleman upon this floor who is disposed to controvert this position, I would thank him to put any questions to me touching that point. I repeat that as early as 1832 the Legislature of New Jersey made a solemn and deliberate contract with the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, and confirmed it in 1854, giving them certain exclusive privileges. It is in the usual form of a contract. It is that species of contract which is made by every State in the Union every year. No one then denied that the State of New Jersey had a right to make this contract. It was so understood by the Legislature. It was so understood by the company. It has been so understood both by the Legislature and the company from 1832 down to the present time, and it has been so understood by the people throughout the country who knew anything at all of the subject of New Jersey's legislation. Does any gentleman on this floor question the right of the State of New Jersey to make this contract? She had a right to make contracts before she entered into the compact forming the Union. I am not aware that she ceded away that right to Congress. If so, when, where, and how was it done?

Some gentlemen, however, complain that the State of New Jersey had no right to grant an exclusive charter. I think that is the position taken by the learned gentleman from the Syracuse district of New York, [Mr. DAVIS] on the ground that it takes away the right of subsequent Legislatures to pass any adverse measure. Now, on this question of whether one Legislature has a right to pass a bill in derogation of the rights of any subsequent Legislature I have simply this to say: I have never known the question to be raised until it was by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS]. "It is an inherent right of sover-eighty." State Legislatures are every year giving away that which they cannot recall. When a State makes a donation, it passes property from its hands, and the fee vests in the grantee; and you might as well say that the Legislature which does that this year is derogating from the power of a subsequent Legislature. Whenever a Legislature permits a railroad, for instance, to cross or occupy land where the tide ebbs and flows, or in any way alienates the public domain, it gives away what it has exclusive jurisdiction over; but still it is a grant which it cannot revoke; and it has not been, for that reason, considered as really in derogation of the rights of any subsequent Legislature. The plain and simple answer is this: while the State Legislatures have the right to make contracts and to grant charters with exclusive privileges, they have not the right to break such contracts. And why? Because the Constitution of the United States, which I am to-day, and always have been, ready to stand by, says in so many words that no law shall be made impairing the obligation of contracts. As a distinguished jurist has said on this subject, it is the Constitution of the United States, and not legislative action which derogates from the power of any subsequent Legislature. This is the limitation. It is in the Constitution which prevents a subsequent Legislature from revoking an exclusive franchise granted by a preceding Legislature.

But while I say this, I do not contend that the Legislature of any State can absolve itself from its duty and obligation to provide for the public use necessary highways and means of communication from place to place, and if public necessity requires it the Legislature of New Jersey may take away the franchises of the Camden and Amboy railroad; but this can only be done by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, which is an inherent right of the States, and not of the General Government. But if franchises are taken away under the exercise of this power and condemned for public use, it must be upon the same conditions as are prescribed for the taking away any other species of private property, to wit, the condition of making a just and reasonable compensation therefor. But the facts in this case do not justify even the Legislature of New Jersey (which alone has the power) in taking away the franchises of this company.

In regard to the policy of granting exclusive franchises, I might agree with the gentlemen who have spoken on the other side, were the question presented anew to-day, for the considerations which would govern me now are very different from what they were in 1832, when the charter was granted in this case. It is not sound and wise policy in these advanced days of railroads and other avenues of communication, which are no longer doubtful experiments, to grant exclusive privileges to any railroad company. But you must bear in mind the time when this road was chartered. I think the Legislature was wise in granting exclusive privileges to this company as early as 1832, as an inducement to invest private means in what was then considered a hazardous undertaking. I think the Massachusetts Legislature was wise in granting an exclusive charter to the Boston and Lowell Company. In 1830, when the railroad system had scarcely commenced in this country, which has since enriched it more than all other influences in the way of internal improvements, the Legislature of Massachusetts thought fit to grant a charter to the Boston and Lowell Railroad Company with the exclusive right of transporting freight and passengers from Boston to Lowell. In a suit subsequently brought by that company against other companies, which, it was supposed, had infringed on their rights, the courts of Massachusetts sustained the right of the Legislature to grant these exclusive privileges. And although the courts did not grant an injunction against these companies, it was on the ground that they had not interfered with the exclusive rights of the company; the same reason precisely on which the New Jersey court refused to grant the first injunction applied for in this case.

How stands the case, then? We have a contract made between the Legislature of New Jersey and the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company.

No one denies the right of the Legislature to make that contract. Every one admits that the contract cannot now be broken, because the Constitution comes in and forbids it. On these points there has been no denial from 1830 down to the present session of this Congress.

Under this state of facts, and with the understanding which prevailed throughout the country in regard to such questions, we find a charter given in 1832 to the Camden and Atlantic Company, one of the petitioners for the bill before us. The road of this company turns at a right angle to the railroad to New York, and extends from Philadelphia down to the Atlantic shore. This charter was granted in 1832, some twenty-two years after the charter was given to the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company under which it has always acted. It was intended for purely local purposes, and its results have been the growth of a small village between Camden and Atlantic City, and the establishment of the latter as a watering place.

In 1854 a charter was granted to the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company (the other petitioner for legislation) to build a road from some point on the Raritan bay east of Keyport, in the county of Monmouth, to the village of Toms River, in the county of Ocean, and thence through the counties of Ocean and Burlington to May's Landing, in the county of Atlantic, thence through the counties of Atlantic and Cape May to Cape Island, on the Atlantic ocean.

This proposed route, under their charter, would traverse the Eastern Shore of New Jersey, from Raritan bay to Cape Island, a distance of one hundred and twenty miles, more or less, and was intended for local traffic and the development of the Eastern Shore portion of that State. This road, if continued through to Cape Island, according to the terms of their charter, would cross the Camden and Atlantic nearly at right angles, about forty miles from Philadelphia. It was built in this direction some twenty miles; and there their work stopped till 1861, I believe, when those interested in it again commenced extending the road; but instead of continuing it according to the line prescribed under the charter, they deviated westerly, and were in the process of making a connection, by the way of Atsion, with the Camden and Atlantic road at Jackson, some twenty miles nearer Philadelphia than the place of crossing it under their charter, when the first application for an injunction was made by the Camden and Amboy Company. I here call your attention to the answer which they made to this application for an injunction. I quote from the opinion of the chancellor:

"The Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company and the President and other officers of the company, by their answer, among other things, admit that at the time of obtaining from the Legislature their act of incorporation no person interested in the application for said road had any intention of constructing a railroad to transport passengers or merchandise between the cities of New York and Philadelphia."

"They deny that any agreement has been made, or is intended to be made, for the transportation of freight or passengers between the cities of New York and Philadelphia. They admit that they and the Camden and Atlantic Railroad Company have in view the construction and perfecting, by means of their respective railroads and a convenient connection between them, of a continuous and convenient line of railway communication across New Jersey, from the city of Camden to Port Monmouth, but they deny that they or any of them have in view the continuation of said line, at either end thereof by steamboat transportation to the cities of New York and Philadelphia, for the purpose of using the same for the transportation of passengers or merchandise in a manner which will violate any contract between the State and the complainants, or any provisions of the acts of the Legislature referred to in the complainants' bill. They also deny that any contract or arrangement made by them is calculated or intended to form a continuous line of railway communication between the said cities, to compete in business with the business of the complainants, contrary to their vested rights. They admit that it is possible, if not prohibited by law, that a line of communication by railroad and steamboat between the cities of New York and Philadelphia might be opened, but they say that their railroad is not a public highway and cannot so be used without their concurrence and consent, and as they have made no arrangement whatsoever so to use the same, and do not intend any unlawful use of their road, such use, if unlawful, cannot be made, and if attempted, can be restrained by the courts. They also deny that they intend in any way to violate the chartered rights of the complainants, or that they intend during their existence to violate any of the alleged exclusive privileges of the complainants. And the defendants, all and each of them, declare that it is not and never has been their intention, by the construction of their railroad or its connections with the Camden and Atlantic railroad, or otherwise, to interfere with the complainants' chartered rights by competing with the railroad of the complainants by the transportation of passengers or merchandise between the cities of Philadelphia and New York, or otherwise."

The injunction was not granted, because by the answer of the defendants it did not appear that they had interfered, or intended in the future to interfere, with the exclusive privileges of the complainants, to wit, of transporting passengers and freight between the two cities. The fact that they had deviated from their chartered rights and were actually in the process of connecting their two lines of road, was not sufficient to authorize the chancellor to grant the injunction prayed for by the Camden and Amboy Company. The determined purpose of the Raritan and Delaware Bay Company to accomplish their object in utter disregard of the established rights of others, can be seen in no way more clearly than by noting their course immediately after the first hearing before the chancellor, where they had, under oath, disavowed any intention of interfering with the franchises of the Camden and Amboy Company:

"The application for a preliminary injunction to restrain the connection between the defendants' roads was denied on the 13th of August, 1862. The junction was formed and the roads thus united went into operations in September, 1862. The route is continued by means of steamboats between Port Monmouth and New York and between Camden and Philadelphia, which run in connection with the road so as to form a complete and uninterrupted line of travel and transportation over the roads between the cities of New York and Philadelphia. In eleven months, commencing with November, 1862, there was transported over these roads between Camden and Port Monmouth, and mainly between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, fourteen thousand tons of freight and seventeen thousand six hundred passengers. A small portion of the freight consisted of munitions of war, and nearly the whole of the passengers were soldiers, carried over the road for the United States Government. The transporting of merchandise from city to city is carried on by the agency of transportation companies, who have established offices for the reception and delivery of freight in each city, from which offices goods are regularly shipped over the entire route. Daily regular freight lines are thus established. The route is advertised—the attention of merchants and shippers is directed to it as a new and expeditious route, and their patronage solicited. The business of transporting way freight and passengers is conducted by the railroad companies in their own names."

It was in proof that the Raritan and Delaware Bay and the Camden and Atlantic Companies had made contracts with each other for a continuous line between the two cities, by boats crossing the Delaware river and running between Raritan bay and New York city. The chancellor says of these contracts:

"Taken in connection with the other evidence in the cause, they are obviously designed to promote the formation of a through route for the transportation of merchandise between the cities of New York and Philadelphia. Neither company has a right to permit its road to be used for such purpose. They cannot effect by combination what neither can do lawfully. Nor can they effect by the agency of others what they may not do themselves. The companies control not only the railroad line across the State, but the boats at either terminus upon the Raritan bay and the Delaware. The Camden and Atlantic Company are under stipulation to furnish boats upon the Delaware. The boats upon the Raritan bay are owned in whole or in part by officers of the company, and are used in connection with the regular daily lines upon the road."

Upon the second hearing before the chancellor an injunction was granted restraining the two companies from competing with the Camden and Amboy Company in the transportation of merchandise and passengers between the cities of Philadelphia and New York.

Under this state of the case the friends of the Raritan and Delaware Bay and Camden and Atlantic Companies come here and ask Congress to do what? To make appropriation in aid of their road? No. To build a road through New Jersey through Federal agency? No. They ask you to authorize them to do jointly what no one pretends can be done by either of the companies separately. They ask you to override the Legislature of New Jersey, the solemn adjudication of her courts, and the chartered rights of her citizens. They ask you, in short, to legalize illegality.

Upon what grounds do they ask for this extraordinary interference of Congress? Let us examine them. Is it upon the ground that Congress has the right to establish post roads? No. The Constitution confers this power expressly on Congress, and therefore this cannot be the reason of the proposed legislation. Is it upon the ground of military necessity? If so, my answer is that under laws now on the statute-books the President has the power to use these or any other railroads in the country if the military necessity to do so exists. By an act approved January 31, 1863, it is enacted:

"That the President of the United States, when in his judgment the public safety may require it, he, and he is hereby, authorized to take possession of any or all the railroad lines of the United States, so that they shall be considered post roads, and part of the military establishment of the United States."

This power then exists, and hence there can be no necessity of further legislation upon this ground.

In considering the bill before us, therefore, we are compelled to abandon the "military necessity" point, upon which some seem to have relied, and must look for some other necessity for the bill, and some other power in Congress to pass it. If these roads were actually needed for military purposes, and there were no law authorizing the Government to use them, I would say, God speed this bill, for I would have all possible facilities granted for military purposes; but, as I have just shown, no such necessity exists for our action.

The friends of this measure are therefore compelled to find some other provision in the Constitution by which to justify themselves in granting the request of the petitioners, and it is claimed that the power is contained in that section of the Constitution which says that "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States and with the Indian tribes," and it is upon that point that I address myself to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS.] I listened with the closest attention to his remarks, first, because I consider him an able and sound lawyer, and secondly, because I have the highest regard for him personally and believe that the views he entertains are honest views, and that he would not advocate anything which he did not believe the interests of the country required. But his whole fallacy, I think, can be traced to the point of a misconception of the true meaning of the Constitution, which says that Congress shall have power to "regulate commerce between the States." With all due deference to him, and others whose opinions may now differ from mine, I contend that no such construction of the words "to regulate commerce between the States" has ever been placed upon them until the present time. Such was not the meaning attached to them by the framers of the Constitution, as appears by the action of the First Congress in the year 1789, composed in part of men who aided in framing it, and such has not been the construction given to it by the distinguished statesmen of our country, such as Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, and others, nor have our jurists or our courts ever given the interpretation now contended for. For want of time it will be impossible for me to read many authorities, which I would like to do. Without undertaking to comment upon it, I will read a portion of the message of Mr. Monroe, returning the bill "for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road," with his veto, to the House of Representatives, in which it originated. He says:

"A power to establish turnpikes with gates and tolls, and to enforce the collection of tolls by penalties, implies a power to adopt and execute a complete system of internal improvement, a right to impose duties to be paid by all persons passing a certain road, and on horses and carriages, as is done by this bill, involves the right to take the land from the proprietor, on a valuation, and to pass laws for the protection of the road from injuries; and if it exists as to one road, it exists as to any other, and to as many roads as Congress may think proper to establish. A right to legislate for one of these purposes is a right to legislate for the others. It is a complete right of jurisdiction and sovereignty for all the purposes of internal improvement, and not merely the right of applying money, under the power vested in Congress to make appropriations, under which power, with the consent of the States through which this road passes, the work was originally commenced and has been so far executed. I am of opinion that Congress do not possess this power—that the States individually cannot grant it; for although they may assent to the appropriation of money within their limits for such purposes, they can grant no power of jurisdiction or sovereignty by special compacts with the United States. This power can be granted only by an amendment to the Constitution, and in the mode prescribed by it.

"The substance of what has been urged on this subject may be expressed in few words. My idea is, that Congress have an unlimited power to raise money; and that in its appropriation they have a discretionary power, restricted only by the duty to appropriate it to purposes of common defense, and of general, not local, national, not State benefit."

Again he says:

"The territory contemplated by the Constitution belongs to each State in its separate character, and not to the United States in their aggregate character."

And upon another occasion he used the following language:

"For every act requiring any legislative sanction whatever, the State authority must be relied on. The condemnation of lands, the establishment of tolls, laws for the protection of the work when finished, must be authorized by the State."

Again:

"In the case of the Cumberland road, passing through Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, it was thought necessary to bring the subject before their respective Legislatures to obtain their sanction, which was granted by each State, by a legislative act approving the route, and providing for the purchase and condemnation of the land. In this instance, the United States have exercised no act of jurisdiction or sovereignty within either of the States by passing acts for the protection of the road, or to raise a revenue from it by the establishment of turnpikes and tolls, or any other act founded on the principle of jurisdiction or right. Whatever they have done has, on the contrary, been founded on the opposite principle—on the voluntary and unqualified admission that the sovereignty belonged to the State, and not to the United States, and that they could perform no act which could tend to weaken the power of the State, or to assume any to themselves."

Similar views were expressed by Mr. Jefferson, in his last annual message in 1808, and on other occasions. In Mr. Madison's veto of the bill to set apart and pledge certain funds for internal improvements, he says, among other things:

"The power to regulate commerce among the several States cannot include a power to construct roads and canals and to improve the navigation of water-courses, in order to facilitate, promote, and secure such a commerce, without a latitude of construction, departing from the ordinary import of terms, strengthened by the known inconveniences which doubtless led to the grant of this remedial power of Congress."

Seeing that no such power existed in Congress, he suggested the only possible remedy, an amendment of the Constitution.

General Jackson said "such a power had never been exercised in a single instance."

I quote from the opinion of Mr. Justice Grier, in the Newark Bridge case. He says:

"Congress has the exclusive power to regulate commerce, but that has never been construed to include the means by which commerce is carried on within a State. Canals, turnpikes, bridges, and railroads are as necessary to the commerce between and through the several States as rivers. Yet Congress has never pretended to regulate them. When a city is made a port of entry, Congress does not thereby assume to regulate its harbor, or detract from the sovereign rights before exercised by each State over her own public rivers. Congress may establish post offices and post roads; but this does not affect or control the absolute power of the State over highways and bridges."

And to the point that roads, bridges, and other internal improvements belong to the States, I cite the following authorities: 9 Wheaton, 203, Gibbons vs. Ogden; 11 Peters, 133, New York vs. Milner; 14 Howard, 574, Veasie vs. Moor; 20 Howard, 92, 93, 94, Withers vs. Buckley.

But admit, for the sake of the argument, that Congress has the power under the Constitution to pass this bill, it is admitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] that it should be exercised only in cases of the clearest necessity. Now, what is the necessity in this case? I wish to call the attention of the House to some facts bearing upon this point; and in order to do this we must have an inside view of the railroad system now in operation in the State of New Jersey. Judging from mere outside rumors, I should have supposed that, by some means or other, New Jersey had become sacred ground, on which no citizen of another State could place his foot, except under heavy penalties. One might have supposed that it was a celestial empire on a small scale, into which no outside barbarian could be permitted to enter. But there are some facts pertaining to the system of internal improvements in New Jersey which I think the House ought to know. I call attention to a few of them.

I undertake to say that the State of New Jersey has expended more money for railroads than any State lying between Washington and the Canada line, except New York, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania, and that the facilities for transit across it are equal to those of any other State.

The following table, prepared from the census report of 1860, shows the number of miles of railroad built and the money expended therefor in the States referred to:

	Miles.	Cost.
Maine	472	$16,576,385
New Hampshire	656	23,268,659
Vermont	556	23,336,215
Massachusetts	1,272	58,882,328
Rhode Island	107	4,318,827
Connecticut	603	21,984,100
New York	2,701	131,320,542
New Jersey	559	28,997,032
Delaware	136	4,351,789
Maryland	380	21,387,157

From which it appears that in 1860 New Jersey had expended more money for railroads than either of the States mentioned, except New York and Massachusetts, and during the last decade the percentage of increase of population in New Jersey was greater than in either of the above-named States.

Let us now examine for a moment the charge made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that New Jersey interferes with the free passage of commerce and travel across her territory. His position has no foundation in fact. New York city has a passage across New Jersey by eight railroads radiating in all directions, as follows: the Northern railroad from Jersey City to Piermont; the Erie railroad from Jersey City to State line, and continued thence; the Morris and Essex road from Hoboken to Hackettstown, and now completing to the Delaware; the New York Central, and Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western from Jersey City to Scranton; the New Jersey railroad and Trenton road from Jersey City to Philadelphia; the Camden and Amboy railroad from New York to Philadelphia; the Raritan and Delaware Bay road, chartered to run from New York to Cape May, along the Atlantic coast. This system of roads connects New York with every part of the country lying west of that city. With Philadelphia it has two railroad connections besides the Delaware and Raritan canal, which bears steam propellers of four hundred tons burden, and with the coal region of Pennsylvania it has two railroad connections besides the Morris canal extending from Jersey City to Easton.

Then Philadelphia has transit across New Jersey by the West Jersey railroad from Camden to Cape May, with branches to Salem and Bridgeton, embracing all South Jersey, the Camden and Atlantic railroad from Camden to the Atlantic coast, the two railroads to New York, and the Belvidere and Delaware railroad, which, with the roads to Trenton, connect the city with the entire Delaware river to Belvidere, and a connection is now forming at that place with the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western railroad leading to Scranton and northeastern Pennsylvania.

With such liberal provision for the commercial necessities of these two great cities by railroad lines reaching in every direction across the State it cannot be said with truth that New Jersey interferes with the free passage of commerce or travel.

And then the most important of these connections were earlier by many years than any other railroad connections which those cities had with other portions of the country. The Camden and Amboy railroad was completed so as to form a line in connection with steamers from New York to Philadelphia as early as December, 1832. The line by Trenton and Jersey City was completed December, 1838. The Delaware and Raritan canal in April, 1835. No other railroad led from or to those cities for ten years and more after these dates. The New Haven, Harlem, and Hudson River roads were not in operation till 1843 or 1849. The Erie not till 1850. No other railroad led out of Philadelphia (except perhaps the Philadelphia and Wilmington road) till 1844 or 1846.

The encouragement given by New Jersey to her capitalists by securing to them for a definite period freedom from competition did not obstruct but promoted railroad facilities.

But it is said that the local fares are less, the company discriminating in favor of the citizens of New Jersey. The local fares in the vicinity of New York at one end of the line, and of Philadelphia at the other end, are less than three cents per mile, it is true. The object of this is to promote the growth of the towns and villages near those cities by inducing men engaged in daily business in the cities to settle on the line of the road, and thereby create a daily travel, commonly called excursion travel. This is the policy of all railroads. This policy leads them to sell annual and quarterly commutation tickets. Certainly those cities ought not to complain of this; nor ought any one to complain of it. It is the true policy of all railroads, and results in great good to the community. The daily travel into and out of New York by persons doing business there while living in the vicinity within a range of twenty or thirty miles is enormous. It is a great public benefit. It promotes the health of the families to live in the country towns, and enables them to live at a much cheaper rate; and the railroads profit by it at even low rates of fare.

Again it is said that according to the report of General Meigs the railroads failed, in January last, when the Potomac was blockaded by ice, to forward necessary forage for the Army. The real difficulty was not with the railroads, but with the Government, in not returning the transportation cars of the company. Some of them were sent south of the Potomac; some of them were detained here. Had the railroad company had their cars they would have transported all the forage delivered to them. (See the dispatches annexed to the report, showing that the difficulty was want of cars.) When the Potomac was blockaded by the enemy in 1861-62 the railroads carried all the Army supplies without interfering with their regular business. (See the report.) Their rolling stock is no doubt much reduced by destruction and appropriation to Government service. Every effort is made to renew it; but the scarcity of labor in that branch of industry renders it almost impossible to procure new cars. Had the cars been ready at Philadelphia to receive the forage it would have been transported across the Delaware. The ice did not prevent it there. The Raritan and Delaware Bay railroad would have had the same difficulty to encounter, if any existed. But no complaint at all is made that the New Jersey roads did not carry everything delivered to them. They did, in fact, carry everything as fast as delivered. The difficulty was at Philadelphia, and this side of Philadelphia, and it arose from the cars not being returned from Washington. And the obstruction, whatever it was, was a single instance in three years. The cold was almost unprecedented, not likely to occur soon again. It was soon relieved, showing its necessarily temporary character. With even the small amount of forage accumulated at Washington the Army supply was continued. Its failure was only apprehended.

The Quartermaster General's suggestion about an interior line of railroad, crossing on bridges above tide-water, is met by the consideration that there are such lines already.

The Northern Central road, which is connected with the Washington Branch at Baltimore, extends from thence to Harrisburg and connects with the North, East, and West, Canandaigua, Elmira, New York, and Pittsburg, by means of the New York Central, the Erie, the New Jersey Central, and the Pennsylvania Central railroads.

If the friends of the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company wish to have that road extended, if they have such patriotic feelings that they wish to connect New York with the middle States and the more remote South, I will tell them how they can do it without infringing on the rights of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company. Under their charter, they have a right to extend it along the shore, through Delaware and Maryland, and so on to Norfolk. In fact it was called at one time the Delaware Bay and Norfolk Air Line Railroad. They need not be shut out at Cape May. Let them go on and comply with the provisions of their charter, and extend it, if they please, further south.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] said the other day that the chancellor of New Jersey had decided in the first place that the Raritan road was a legal structure from Camden to Port Monmouth, from the west to the east line of the State, and decided in the next place that no passengers or freight could be taken over that road from Pennsylvania to New York.

Now, in answer to that, I beg leave to say to the gentleman that the chancellor of New Jersey, as I understand him, never made any such decision. He decided not to grant the first injunction because the defendants came in and said in their answer that they never intended to compete with the Camden and Amboy road in carrying passengers and freight. There was no ground for proceeding against them. The fact that they were in the process of building their road on a line not authorized by their charter was not sufficient to authorize the chancellor to grant the injunction first applied for, and when he denied it, it was not because he adjudged the road legal, but because they had not at that time interfered with the Camden and Amboy railroad by competing with it in the actual transportation of passengers and freight between Philadelphia and New York, and when the injunction was afterwards granted it was upon the ground that the competition in business had really commenced. The proper course to take, under the laws of New Jersey, against a railroad for violating its charter is by information, a process in the nature of a quo warranto, for the company to show cause why the road had not been built according to the terms of its charter, and why it should not be abated.

The gentleman from Ohio then quotes from the Governor's recent proclamation to the Legislature of New Jersey, and I could not help fearing at the time that the manner in which he spoke of him indicated a disposition to create some political prejudice in favor of the petitioners in this case and against the State. He spent some ten or fifteen minutes in giving a definition of sovereignty, and in assailing the Governor for saying that New Jersey was a sovereign State. Is not New Jersey a sovereign State in the common meaning and intent of the word? If he had looked at Worcester's dictionary, or Bouvier's, he would have found that a sovereign State is one that governs itself without any interference from a foreign Power. Had not the Governor a right to call New Jersey a sovereign State? In enlarging on the word sovereignty he quotes from Coleridge, telling us that he once said that "more harm had come from abstract definitions than from war, pestilence, and famine." If Coleridge ever said this, and perhaps he did, for the gentleman from Ohio is learned and poetical, and certainly ought to know, I can only say that it is one of a thousand other sayings which that writer has published, with more sound than meaning.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

SPEECH OF HON. T. O. HOWE,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

April 4, 1864.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration the joint resolution (S. No. 16) proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. HOWE said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am bound to make my acknowledgments to the honorable Senator from Maryland for his courtesy in allowing me the floor to-day. For some reasons peculiar to myself, it suits my convenience better to speak to-day than at a subsequent day, and therefore I asked of him the privilege of occupying the time which was his by the rules of the body, and he has courteously responded to my request.

Sir, I have waited for this day, and I am glad to see it. I have waited for it, I think, somewhat after the fashion that the people of Judea waited for the coming of Christ, and I am glad to see it. It has been a good while coming; but it is here.

I have read history rather carelessly, I think, Mr. President; but I have been under the impression that as I could not have been born, by any reasonable degree of diligence on the part of my ancestors, during that great era in which Christ was recruiting for his divine commission by the borders of the sea of Galilee, I should next to that like to have been born in that other era, a good deal later than that, and a good deal nearer to the time in which I actually was born—during that era in which our own forefathers recruited, under their commission, divine also, to wrest the right of self-government from the power of Great Britain. I should like to have been born then, and I have felt a little envious of the destiny that forbade it. There have been some grand opportunities since that time, some grand achievements since that time. One took place a very few years subsequently to the 4th of July, 1776. It took place, if I remember aright, on the 13th of July, 1787, when our fathers, by an ordinance of theirs, by an act of their representatives in Congress assembled, ordained that over that great territory where nestle now the magnificent States of Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin, there should never be any slavery, nor any involuntary servitude, except as punishment for crime, forever. That was an achievement in which it would have been worth the while of any of us to have taken a part. And there has been one little performance here, since I have had the honor of a seat in this body, which attracted but little notice, but was of marked significance; when the representatives of the people of to-day, here in this Legislature, actually gave freedom to no inconsiderable number of human beings who had heretofore been slaves in this very District of Columbia. That was something of an achievement.

But the purpose of to-day differs from all these greatly, and transcends them all; and to-day I am content, abundantly content, with the accident of my birth. To-day you propose to summon twenty-six million people to do, what? Not to do what three million did less than a century ago, challenge their own freedom from a foreign Power. You propose to summon them to-day to give freedom, to give freedom not to three but to four million human beings, freedom not from such a bondage as your fathers remonstrated and protested against and resisted, but from a thralldom infinitely worse than they ever dreamed of, than they ever conceived of, than they ever suffered. And that is not all you propose to do. You do not propose simply to invite this great people in this terrible time to give freedom to these four million individuals, but you propose to invite these twenty-six millions to say that no part of their number shall thenceforward forever be empowered to make a slave of any man. You propose to put up a barrier against the holding of slaves anywhere within the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States, anywhere where its flag floats, anywhere where its Constitution is obeyed. Sir, I am ambitious to put my name to that invitation, for it is going to be responded to, as I will tell you by and by.

I have had the honor now of a seat in this body three years and a little more. My friends about me will do me the justice to say that I have never yet discussed the question of slavery here. It has been before us repeatedly; allow me to say, I think a great many times too often, but I have never yet felt called upon to discuss it. I have thought there was more pressing business before us than this question of slavery even. It is here legitimately to-day. I, perhaps, might avoid now the discussion of the merits of our American system of slavery, for I am free to admit that I think I should vote to submit this proposition to amend your Constitution to the people of the United States even if I would vote against the amendment myself as one of the people, for I think the time has come when that question ought to be submitted to the American conscience, and the American conscience ought to be tried by it. I think you ought to take the sense of the American people upon the question whether they will or will not have slavery any longer within the limits of the Union; and whatever might be my opinion upon its merits, I think I should vote to submit the question to them. I think there was great justice, there was great force, in a criticism upon that clause of the Constitution which provides for its amendment, by a late Senator from the State of Oregon, (Mr. Baker,)—no longer here, no longer enacting his great part in these great scenes—when he said:

"It is not a provision that, whenever Congress shall deem the amendments proper to be passed, they shall propose them; but they shall propose them whenever they deem it necessary to propose them."

"The Constitution does but say that, when Congress shall deem it necessary to propose amendments, they shall propose them, and not when they deem the amendments necessary; that they leave to the people."—Congressional Globe, Thirty-Sixth Congress, second session, page 1382.

Upon that authority and upon that principle I think Senators who doubt or Senators who deny,

38TH CONG.... 1ST SESS.

SENATE.

Representatives who doubt or Representatives who deny that this particular amendment to the Constitution ought to be made, yet ought, in the spirit of the language I have just read, to vote to submit this proposition for amending the Constitution to the people that the sense of the people may be taken upon it. So that I might possibly avoid a discussion of the merits of this system of slavery now, but I do not wish to avoid it any longer. For once in the course of three years, perhaps, I can be indulged in telling what I think about this thing of African or American slavery, whichever you choose to call it. In my own judgment it is both African and American slavery. You cannot enslave four million Africans without making slaves of a good many Americans; and you never have done it.

Mr. President, if you look at the effects of slavery as bearing upon its victims, and with reference to their interests here alone, how will you characterize it? We of the North have very generally united to say that it was wrong. It is so easy to say that a given thing is wrong, and so easy to deny it and affirm that it is right, so easy to dispute upon a question of abstract or practical right and wrong, that I really feel some little difficulty in undertaking to prove that this thing of African slavery is wrong. If you allow me to reason from analogy by comparing it with other acts which by common consent of all civilized nations have been deemed to be wrong, I think I can establish the fact that slavery is wrong in reference to its victims.

Mr. President, if by my voluntary labor I have accumulated enough to buy a sack of flour or a bag of corn, or to put a five dollar bill in my purse, and you deprive me of it by force and violence, you commit an act which all civilized nations denounce as robbery and punish infamously. I think they are right. Nevertheless, you take only a small sum of my earnings, and you take it from me after I have voluntarily earned it. But if, instead of lying in wait until I have accumulated the sack of flour or the bag of corn, you employ that amount of force which makes me go to work, not voluntarily, not according to my will but according to yours, and accumulate the sack of flour or the bag of corn, is it any the less robbery for you to take the product as soon as it is accumulated? Is not that robbery also?

Mr. President, the crime of taking anything by violence from the person of the producer, with force or with violence, as I have said, is denounced by all civilized nations and by all law as robbery. The crime of depriving not an individual but a community of all it possesses, reducing a community to destitution, is a higher style of robbery. But slavery beats both these offenses. The system of slavery enables a power, authorizes a power to stand over a community, as it is exhibited on our continent, a community numbering four million men and women, to work them from the time they are able to work at all until they are disabled from working at all, and to take their daily earnings, to take whatever comes from their daily sweat, and apply it to the use and the enjoyment of the master or the power that makes them work. That is what slavery does.

In 1861 your census returned that you had in round numbers about four million human beings who were in this condition of slavery. It is said that the value of those slaves at that time was about $750 each; that they would command on an average that price in the markets of the United States. Now, when you say that a negro is worth $750, what do you mean by it? When a man in South Carolina buys a negro from a man in Virginia or elsewhere, and pays $750 for him, what does he mean by it? He means that the negro can earn the interest of $750 more than the cost of keeping him. That is what governs you in buying a pair of oxen, buying a cow, or in buying a machine. You think you can earn with that piece of property the interest of the money you pay for it over and above the cost of keeping the property. When you pay $1,000 for a negro or $1,000 for a pair of horses, unless you are a fancy dealer in the one or the other, you do it because you can earn with them the interest of $1,000. Four million slaves, at an average of $750 each, would amount to about three thousand million dollars. That was one fourth part of the assessed value of the United States in 1860. The assessed value of the United States, its personal and real property, including its slaves, was about twelve thousand million dollars. Three thousand millions were invested in this kind of property. One fourth of the whole productive property of the United States was in negroes, slaves, human beings. One fourth part of the product of the property and of the labor of the United States went, where?—Not in the pockets of the laborer, not a dollar of it, but went into the pockets of men who were permitted by law to own the laborer, taken by force, taken by violence. Preceding the fact of robbing by a statute authorizing it, does not take away from its moral character. It prevents you punishing it as robbery; but the moral character of the act still remains. If I am correct in this reasoning, the system of slavery as existing on this continent allowed robbery to the amount of one fourth, mind you, of the whole product, the whole earnings of the United States annually.

Mr. President, I think that is wrong. If I was the victim myself, I should think it was wrong. Standing aloof and looking at it, I am bound to say that I think it is wrong.

I have only spoken of the effects of this institution upon the economical interests of the victim. The victim has moral interests also, which, it is said, the whole system utterly disregards and violates. It is said that the slave is not educated, that there is no attention paid to his mental or his moral culture. I do not affirm the truth of this; I have heard it asserted; I have heard it denied. How the fact is I do not know. I hope it is true. It is no mercy and no kindness to the slave to educate him, to cultivate his mind. The theologians tell us that one of the chiefest and keenest torments of the damned in another world will consist in being able to behold the condition of the blessed in that world. Whether it is sound theology or not, I will not undertake to say; but it is perfectly sound in philosophy. If you ever undertake to make a slave of me, Mr. President, and succeed in doing it; if you ever doom me to the hell of slavery, I ask you in kindness to me, not to permit me any light in which I can behold the heaven of freedom. Keep that from my sight, and I may forget to damn you. Let me see that and I will damn you beyond the reach of infinite mercy. It is no kindness to the slave to educate him; it is a wrong to the slave, and it is a wrong to the master.

Sir, I want to quote to you one principle of law. It is not from the Constitution of the United States. I never met with it in the constitutions of any of the States. It is not from the higher law; if it was I would not quote it. That has been quoted here, and I think it has been repudiated. It is from the lower law. It is from the fundamental law, I think. You will find it on the foundation-stone upon which political society rests, if you will ever take the trouble to look at that stone, and it reads like this: that every State that educates its people and does not enfranchise them shall be damned.

I think also (though upon this next point I speak with great deference and diffidence) slavery is a terrible wrong upon the spiritual interests of the slave. As a layman, perhaps I ought not to speak of those interests at all, and yet I cannot help it, for I have been told and I believe that less than nineteen hundred years ago One was born in Nazareth and died near there, and was buried and rose again, and in broad daylight in the face of the world ascended into heaven, the pioneer in a great resurrection that is to embrace the world. And in reference to that resurrection what does slavery say to its victims? For years past, individuals of these four millions every year have been sent from this world to the next, and with what sort of passports do they go? You send them off, you who owned them here and worked them here; every year you shuffle off a certain number of these victims, and send them upward to Him who died that they might rise. Send them upward with this missive in their hands, "Here come the souls of a few of our slaves; we raised them, we worked them, we gave them such training as our kitchens and our stables would furnish; we now send them to you who died for them; stow them away in some of the sheds of the heavenly mansion or some of its attics; and as we are coming by and by, do not let them be found in our way; we found means for them to ride in some shape or other on our railroads, set apart special cars for them: provide special rooms for them up above." That may be a good letter of introduction to send up. I do not want to sign any such, and I am glad that I am not there to receive any such, and I was about to say that I do not want to go there until such letters stop coming.

Mr. President, in passing upon the merits of slavery, we ought not to overlook its effect upon the master; and upon this question I beg leave to speak by authority. I have been using my own reasoning heretofore. Let me now refer to the testimony of another upon this point. Every member of the Senate is familiar with it. I find it in Mr. Jefferson's Notes on Virginia:

"There must doubtless be an unhappy influence on the manners of our people produced by the existence of slavery among us. The whole commerce between master and slave is a perpetual exercise of the most boisterous passions, the most unremitting despotism on the one part and degrading submissions on the other. Our children see this and learn to imitate it, for man is an imitative animal. This quality is the germ of all education in him. From his cradle to his grave he is learning to do what he sees others do. If a parent could find no motive either in his philanthropy or his self-love for restraining the intemperance of passion toward his slave, it should always be a sufficient one that his child is present. But generally it is not sufficient. The parent storms, the child looks on, catches the lineaments of wrath, puts on the same airs in the circle of smaller slaves, gives a loose rein to the worst of passions, and thus nursed, educated, and daily exercised in tyranny, cannot but be stamped by it with odious peculiarities. The man must be a prodigy who can retain his manners and morals undepraved by such circumstances. And with what execration should the statesman be loaded who, permitting one half of the citizens thus to trample on the rights of the other, transforms those into despots and these into enemies; destroys the morals of the one part and the amor patriæ of the other. For if a slave can have a country in this world, it must be any other in preference to that in which he was born to live and labor for another; in which he must look up the faculties of his nature, contribute as far as depends on his individual endeavors to the ennoblement of the human race, or entail his own miserable condition on the endless generations proceeding from him. With the morals of the people, their industry also is destroyed. For in a warm climate no man will labor for himself who can make another labor for him. This is so true that of the proprietors of slaves a very small proportion indeed are ever seen to labor. And can the liberties of a nation be thought secure when we have removed their only firm basis, a conviction in the minds of the people that these liberties are the gift of God? that they are not to be violated but with His wrath? Indeed, I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just; that His justice cannot sleep forever; that considering numbers, nature, and natural means only, a revolution of the wheel of fortune, an exchange of situation, is among possible events; that it may become probable by supernatural interference. The Almighty has no attribute which can take side with us in such a contest."

That was written by Mr. Jefferson many years ago, and since that the truth of what he said has been illustrated by the whole history of slavery, and to-day we find that the influence of that institution upon the manners of the masters has been no less than to transform almost the whole of them into traitors against what we still say is the best Government the world ever saw. In its influence upon individuals, it has produced such a man as James M. Mason, I think out of the grandson of George Mason, if I am not mistaken in the relationship. It has produced such a man as John A. Washington out of the nephew of George Washington. In its influence upon communities, it has turned Virginia, "the mother of Presidents," into a community of traitors and rebels.

In its effect upon the master and upon the man, I think it must be conceded, then, upon all authority and upon all experience, the influence of slavery is evil and evil only. In its influence upon States I can only say this: it has placed such a State as Virginia by the side of such a State as Pennsylvania: slavery has done it. It has placed such a State as Kentucky by the side of such a State as Ohio: slavery has done it. It has placed such a State as Missouri at the side of such a State as Iowa. Missouri ought to be greater and wealthier than the State of Iowa, vastly; Kentucky ought to be greater and wealthier than Ohio, vastly; Virginia ought to be greater and wealthier than Pennsylvania, vastly; and but for the influence of slavery all these States would be wealthier than either of their rivals lying along by the side of them.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Amendment of the Constitution—Mr. Howe.

SENATE.

Mr. DAVIS. Ohio has more than three times as much fertile land as Kentucky.

Mr. HOWE. As I am reminded by the Senator from Kentucky, Ohio has more productive land than the State of Kentucky has; but Ohio is young compared with the State of Kentucky, young in years; and if freedom had existed on the other side of the Ohio river the State of Kentucky would have been a very different State from what it is to-day, in my judgment. To illustrate the effect of slavery upon the nation I had prepared some tables showing the aggregate areas of the free and the slave States; the several dates of their admission into the Union, and the aggregate of their populations in 1860. Those tables I have mislaid. I can only say briefly that these figures show that the slave States include just about the same area as the free States; they have been settled on an average about one third longer than the free States, and they contain a white population about one third as great as that of the free States. That is the result of slavery upon the nation. It is an incalculable wrong in a national and political point of view.

And now, Mr. President, what are the apologies for this institution? I have heard them. We hear them daily. That which we hear the oftenest, that which is insisted upon the loudest, is that slaves are only made of negroes or of the descendants of negroes, and that they as a race are inferior to the whites. Whether the fact is so or not, I shall not spend a moment in arguing; but I affirm this, that if in the whole catalogue of excuses that are offered for crimes and offenses, one single excuse could be found more odious than the crime itself, it is this one excuse for slavery. Admit that as a race they are inferior to the race of whites; I ask Senators, I ask men if that is a fact which authorizes you or me to enslave them? Sir, the excuse not only shames what sense of manhood there is in us who are grown up, but it shames all the manliness of the boys of the country. You never hear in a community of boys any purpose of inflicting violence by a strong one upon a weak one but that the whole community cry out to him, "Take one of your size;" and I say to slaveholding communities, if you will make slaves, make them of your equals, take men of your size. Because they are weak, therefore enslave them! Because they are weak, I tell you therefore make them strong. That is the commission you have; that is the duty that is charged upon you. Weak! Just behind me I see another race that is said to be somewhat inferior to the lords of creation. Now, I do not affirm the truth of it; it is said so; and is that made a pretext by any one of you for oppressing them, or for petting them? Which? Inferior, Mr. President! Is it necessary for me to tell the American Senate that the whitest of men are made still a little lower than the angels? And do you think the angels regard that as a reason for binding fetters upon them, for deserting them? Or, on the contrary, is it the reason why they are busy in our behalf to build us up as fast as they can (and God knows how slow they get along with the work) into the likeness of angels ourselves? Inferior! Inferior! Need I tell the American Senate that when our race was dead in trespasses and sin God sent His Son here? And for what? To bury man, to work him, to sell him, to buy him, to make money out of him? No. He sent Him here to stretch Himself upon the cross and to die for us; die that we might be saved, die that we might behold in His example and catch from that example some lesson of that magnanimity which the great and strong are bound to show to the weak, which the superior is bound to show to the inferior. If, therefore, you will find a warrant for slaveholding, you must find it elsewhere than in the fact of their inferiority if you establish that fact ever so conclusively.

The Senator from Delaware told us the other day how universal had been the system of slavery. Is there any other rascality that has not been pretty universal? And is the universality of a wrong a reason for continuing it, for persisting in it when you see how wrong it is? If you want to go to heaven you had better get out of the broad road in which everybody travels, get into the strait and narrow way which is not crowded because there are so few going in it. If you want to indulge in practices which will take you through safely, take those which are not universal, take those which have been observed by the few, and the good, and the right.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator is giving advice about forsaking the broad way and taking the narrow path. I wish to know if he desires to follow him that walks therein.

Mr. HOWE. I think that was a good thing, but I did not hear it. [Laughter.] I will give him credit, however, on trust. I have heard it urged by the defenders of slavery a great many times that it was necessary to the cultivation of certain crops, and there was a time when I myself rather thought that there were very important crops in this country which could not be cultivated without black labor; but I never believed there was any crop God ever allowed to be cultivated that was necessary to be cultivated with slave labor. I have thought, however, that there were certain latitudes within this empire of ours that must be cultivated by black labor. I have got over that. I deny all that gospel. Sir, I went to Vicksburg last August, after Vicksburg was in our possession; I went into the trenches there which our men had dug and which they occupied; I saw and stood in the trenches on the sunny side of those hills into which not our northern field laborers alone, but our northern lawyers, clerks, students, all classes who went out there, went into in the morning and came out of the next morning, staying there the twenty-four hours round, doing their work there. I saw men who went into the Army and went down there students pale from study; I found them there bronzed and hardy and rugged working men. I have got over the notion that there is any latitude under the Constitution of the United States that cannot be cultivated by the people of the United States, black or white, white or black.

But if I am mistaken on this point, I never believed that it was necessary to own black men in order to have the work of black men. Do you say that if you release the authority of the master the slave will cease to work? What makes him work while you own him? Is it your authority? Does he work from a sense of duty to you because you have bought him and paid somebody else for him? Not a bit of it. He works because the State commands him to work. The State commands him to work for this man, and in obedience to the State he works for him. He works for him knowing that he can get but his daily bread from the produce of his labor. Do you think that when the State withdraws that command, and instead of telling him to work for you, tells him to work for himself and have the benefit of all he earns, he will cease to work? Not a bit of it. There is no philosophy in that; there is no truth in it. It has been tried, and it has been found to be false.

But it is said that the emancipation of these slaves would be fatal to the relation existing between the two races in the States where the two races are. I think I have heard my very distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] say over and over again that it would lead to a war of extermination; that one race or the other must be exterminated. I ask, why? I demand to know why. If freedom be given to the black men of Kentucky or of South Carolina, may not their labor still be necessary for the State of Kentucky or of South Carolina? Do you say they are going to commence the work of massacre and slaughter the moment you give liberty to them? Do you say that while you bind them to the necessity of laboring for you for your benefit, they submit to that law in peace and in quiet, but the moment you emancipate them and give them the privilege of working for themselves and enjoying the fruits of their own toil, then they are going to turn marauders and murderers? That is not to be insisted upon; it is not to be believed; it is a libel upon humanity, black or white.

But, sir, they tell us the slave is happy; that he is kindly treated. I heard my friend from Kentucky not long since tell how kindly he treated his own slaves. Do you think I doubt that? Do you think I distrust that? Every kind man, of course, will treat his slaves kindly. Every wise man, whether he be kind or not, will treat his slaves kindly. Do you not think I treat my horses kindly? Do you not think I like them? Why, sir, I have imperiled my domestic happiness sometimes by calling them "darlings" when my wife thought I ought to address such language only to her. [Laughter.] Is that a reason for making slaves of men because you do not abuse them? That is not an excuse; that is not a justification.

Mr. President, in whatever aspect I look at slavery, my verdict is that it is unutterably wrong, an evil and an evil only; and in whatever aspect I look at it I must say it is without any possible justification or excuse. I cannot say, as I have often heard it said, that it is the sum of all villainies. Bad as I have found it to be, bad as I believe it to be, I think I know of a villainy that transcends it, infinitely almost; that transcends the guilt of slavery as much as slavery transcends the guilt of freedom; and that is, this rebellion, on which I wish to say a few words.

Mr. President, we have been struggling with this rebellion for three years; and it is one of the saddest facts I know of in history, that, although we have pretty generally come to concede that in law these rebels are guilty of treason, yet there is to-day a large body of the people, standing almost in the very blood the rebellion has shed, who affect to believe that, after all, this rebellion is one of the respectable kind of rebellions, a pretty decent thing; that if it cannot be justified there is a great deal of excuse for it. I tell you that sentiment is very prevalent throughout these loyal communities and these loyal States to-day.

I hold that no such guilt as is personified in this rebellion has been allowed to stalk abroad on the face of God's earth since He allowed the earth to stand, as this same rebellion is. Either you who palliate it are right or I am; and if there be no sort of palliation or excuse for that which you are constantly attempting to palliate or excuse, you have a heavy responsibility to settle for your efforts in that direction.

After struggling with it for three years, after expending our thousands of millions of money and our thousands upon thousands of lives and our rivers of blood in the effort to crush this rebellion, I was shocked, unutterably shocked to hear the other day a Senator, in the employ of this Government of ours and paid out of its Treasury, straining himself to complain of it the other day, out of a decent regard to loyalty and finding no word in the English language that he dared to use in denunciation of it stronger than to say it was not "wise."

Sir, a Representative from one of the loyal States of the Union, paid by your money, a couple of years since, standing in the House of Representatives, representing a district of that State which is represented here by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE] discussing the merits of this rebellion, said:

"You have utterly, signally, disastrously—I will not say ignominiously—failed to subdue ten million 'rebels' whom you had taught the people of the North and West not only to hate but to despise. Rebels, did I say? Yes, your fathers were rebels, or your grandfathers. He who now before me on canvas looks down so sadly upon us, the false, degenerate, and imbecile guardians of the great Republic which he founded, was a rebel. And yet we, cradled ourselves in rebellion, and who have fostered and fraternized with every insurrection in the nineteenth century everywhere throughout the globe, would now, forsooth, make the word 'rebel' a reproach."—Appendix to Congressional Globe, Thirty-Seventh Congress, third session, page 55.

An American Representative in one of the Halls of your own Legislature used this language in reference to this very rebellion of which I am speaking.

I beg leave to read to the Senate an extract from a speech made by Earl Russell at Blair Gowrie on the 26th of September last. Speaking of the relations of the Crown to the confederate States, he uses this remarkable language:

"Well, then, it was said that these confederate States were rebels, rebels against the Union. Perhaps, gentlemen, I am not so nice as I ought to be on the subject. But I recollect that we rebelled against Charles I. [a laugh] we rebelled against James II, and the people of New England, not content with these two rebellions, rebelled against George III. [a laugh and laughter.] I am not saying now whether all these rebellions were justifiable or whether they were wrong—I am not saying whether the present rebellion in the southern States is a justifiable insurrection or is a great fault or is a great crime, but I say that the mere fact of rebellion is not in my eyes a crime of so deep a dye that we must renounce all fellowship and communion and all relationship with those who have been guilty of rebellion. [Loud cheering.] But, certainly, if I look to the declarations of those New England orators—and I have been reading lately, if not the whole, yet a very great part of the very long speech by Mr. STANER on the subject, delivered at New York—I own I cannot but wonder to see these men, the offspring as it were of three rebellions, as we are the offspring of two rebellions, really speaking like the Czar of Russia, the Sultan of Turkey, or Louis XIV himself, of the dreadful crime and guilt of rebellion."

There, by one of your own Representatives in your own Legislature, and there, out of the mouth of a minister of Great Britain, and before the British people, this rebellion with which you are now struggling is likened to that in which your forefathers engaged, and that in which their forefathers engaged against Charles I and James II.

Sir, what was the rebellion in which those men engaged to depose Charles I? Against what authority or government did they rebel? The authority of the king, who claimed to govern, not by the election of his subjects, not by their choice and selection, but by divine right and by the accident of birth, and who claimed for the measure of his authority—what? The right to appoint himself, as he did, members of one House of the law-making department of his Government; the right to appoint every judge; the right to appoint every administrative and executive officer. If the members of his Parliament disaffected him, he dismissed them at his pleasure. He convened them only when he wanted them. He kept them no longer together than they would subserve his purposes. When a member of the House of Lords displeased him, he refused to summon him to his seat. He declared war when he chose to make war. The fact of war he made the pretext for levying taxes which his Parliament had denied to him; and when, against all these assertions of power, one of his own subjects appealed to the courts to redress a wrong committed by the Crown, or by the agents of the Crown, he dismissed judges who would not agree to decide in his favor, and he appointed judges who would agree to decide in his favor.

It was against such authority in such hands that that rebellion was waged; and yet they did not resort to that rebellion until they had tried every means to avoid it, by appeals to Parliament, by appeals to courts, by appeals to statutes, by appeals to reason. For twenty years and more the people of Great Britain struggled by every possible peaceful means to prevent the exercise of these prerogatives, and to redress the wrongs that were occasioned through their exercise, before they resorted to force.

Against what did your own forefathers rebel—your fathers and mine—whom a degenerate Representative in Congress likened to the men who have made this rebellion? Let them speak for themselves. I am not asserting any more than did Earl Russell that all rebellion is guilty. I know it is not. I know that revolution has been employed as an instrument of reform. I know it has often been so employed. I know that in some cases it is necessary to be employed. I regard it myself as that sort of volcanic agency, so to speak, by which the under-layers in the social stratification are upheaved into the light of liberty and equality. But, sir, everybody must concede, what all philosophy and all experience teach, that revolution, rebellion, war, are the most frightful remedies that were ever employed or can be employed, and therefore they should be applied only to the most desperate diseases. But when a people are subjected to a wrong which they cannot endure, and a wrong which they cannot correct by any other instrumentality or any other means, undoubtedly rebellion may be resorted to, and undoubtedly rebellion should be resorted to. Your forefathers resorted to rebellion only under those circumstances and with those limitations. They laid down the very conditions upon which rebellion might be justified in these well-considered words:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such forms as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that Governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and, accordingly, all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government and to provide new guards for their future security."

And then, having laid down these conditions upon which alone a resort to rebellion can be justified, they proceeded to file that terrible indictment against the Government of their king. It is too familiar to the Senate to justify me in reading even extracts from it; but there is scarcely an act of arbitrary power known to the history of Governments that is not charged in that document upon George III.

In the light of these examples let the guilt of this rebellion, with which we have to deal to-day, be tried. Were the men who made this rebellion oppressed by the Government of the United States? Nobody asserts that. The men who made this rebellion administered the Government themselves. Senators went out of this Chamber to fight the authorities of the United States; ministers went out of your Cabinet; officers in your Army and Navy deserted their colors and betrayed their commands; clerks went out of your bureaux; your own agents, your own employes, paid by you to protect your interests, abandoned their trusts and took up arms under the authority of a governmentalism to you and alien to them, until they made it to overthrow your authority. There was not a single act upon your statute-book of which they complained; not a single act of the Executive of which they complained; not a single judgment in any one of your courts of which they complained. Every department of the Government had acquiesced in every demand they had made.

There was then no oppression on the people who made this revolt. There was nothing to complain of in what the Government had done. Did they make this rebellion to correct the form of Government? Sir, you heard and I heard a late Senator from Kentucky, who is now in arms against the authority of his own State and of his own country, declare here on this floor that this was the best form of Government which the wisdom of man ever devised. Nay, sir, you heard another Senator, representing the State of Texas, who went out of this Chamber and out of the employ of the people of the United States to make war upon them, declare:

"So devoted a friend of the Union am I that when (as I know it must be, because I see no disposition to save or to prevent it,) the eight cotton States have withdrawn from this Union, as they will in the next two months do, and meet in convention to adopt a federal form of government for themselves, and to establish a foreign department, I for one shall advocate the adoption, without crossing a t or dotting an i, of the same old glorious Constitution that was ratified by the old thirteen States."—Congressional Globe, second session Thirty-Sixth Congress, page 74.

So, then, it was not the purpose of this rebellion to redress any wrongs which its authors had sustained under the Government, nor to correct the form of the Government itself. They approved of the form of the Government, and they themselves guided its administration. Against what, then, did they rebel? A President had been elected. That was the act of the people. Of that they complained. With the election of the present incumbent they were not satisfied. The election of Mr. Lincoln was known to be obnoxious to them as the election of Mr. Breckinridge was known to be obnoxious to those who voted for Mr. Lincoln. The men who preferred Mr. Breckinridge had the same right to vote for him and enjoyed that right as fully as others, who opposed Mr. Breckinridge, had the right and enjoyed the right to vote for Mr. Lincoln.

But is the election of a President of the United States a cause, a justification, or an excuse, even, for rebellion, for all the evils and all the woes of revolution? Sir, if the man elected President in 1860 had been as ambitious as Jefferson Davis, if he had been as false as Franklin Pierce, if he had been as faithless as Floyd, if he had been as vainglorious as Toombs, if he had been as spiritless as Buchanan, if he had been stained with every crime and with every excess, still his election would have been no cause for rebellion; and why? For the simple reason that the term of a President is very brief, and the measure of his authority is very restricted. He is harmless if he is ever so vile. His ability to work mischief is extremely limited; and the term in which he can do anything, good or bad, is limited to four years. I put it to the Senate, or to any one who is disposed to palliate this rebellion, if they believe that our forefathers would have declared for secession from the British empire if they by four years could have terminated the reign of George III? Do you think revolution would ever have been resorted to to depose James II, if by four years or ten years endurance his reign could have been terminated by an election of the people?

I was surprised to hear a Senator, who usually speaks with a great deal of accuracy, speaking on this point some days since, use this language in reference to the President:

"I can very readily imagine a condition of things in any country on the face of the earth when a Government, the President, or, if you please, the ruling power, the Executive, had become so obnoxious to the people and was pursuing a course so diametrically opposed to its interests, that it might be necessary in the Senate of the United States or in the House of Representatives, or in either or both, to say distinctly from the place which we occupy, 'I, from this place, call on the people of the United States to resist this outrageous exercise of power.'"

I undertake to say, no such necessity and no such occasion will ever occur in the history of this Government under its present Constitution. The President, as I have said before, is one of the most harmless agencies ever employed in the affairs of Government. No matter what may be his personal character, he is as harmless as the marshal of a district or the sheriff of a county. He is but a mere agent of the people to obey their law, to execute their express commands embodied in positive enactments; and when he goes one inch outside of the express authority of law, he has not the slightest protection any more than the constable of a town. If he withholds a debt from you or assaults you, he is amenable to the same corrections that you are if you withhold a debt from another or assault another. If he commits any crime or misdemeanor he may be removed from office at any time. He is at all times at work simply for the people who employ him, and he is utterly powerless except as he is executing their expressed will. But while he is executing the will of the people of the United States, while he represents these twenty-six million people, then he is a power—a power which, until within a few years, there was no power on earth that dared to gainsay; and if we are true to our form of Government, he will in a very short time again become a power that no potentate on earth will dare to withstand. When acting in obedience to the people of course they cannot desire to resist him at all. When acting in defiance of them there can be no more necessity for their resisting with force than there is for the stockholders of a railroad or of a bank to employ force against their superintendent or cashier. To employ the terrible agency of revolution to depose or resist a President of the United States, whose term is so brief and whose authority is so limited, would be the most monstrous insanity I can well conceive of. The man who would do it or recommend the doing of it you may expect to see sometime washing in aqua fortis to remove freckle, or burning his barn to expel the rats.

But, sir, I ought to say that the President elected in 1860 was not of the character I have supposed or indicated. He was not a bad character. He was not a vile man. On the contrary, a more senseless man has not occupied the presidential chair since your Government was organized. He was stained by no crime. He was stained by no excess. A more kindly or a more genial nature you rarely find than his. I venture to say further, that when history undertakes to criticise the administration of the present Executive, if it finds fault with him at all, it will be that he has dealt with this monstrous rebellion with too much tenderness, and not that he has dealt with it with too much tyranny.

What, then, was the occasion of the rebellion? I heard the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] say the other day that if the fugitive slave law of 1850 had been faithfully executed he did not believe the rebellion would have occurred.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Amendment of the Constitution—Mr. Howe.

SENATE.

Sir, I am sorry to say the fugitive slave law of 1850 has been faithfully executed. I am sorry to say it, because it was not a statute fit to be enacted or fit to be executed. It was a monstrous outrage. I do not speak of it now in the sense of its being a violation of the Constitution. I believe the courts decided otherwise. I hold myself, as a lawyer and as a man, and I would make an affidavit of it if I was called upon to do so, that it is a gross and palpable violation of the Constitution; but that it violates the Constitution of the United States is the very least of its defects. It violates your constitution and mine. It violates every dictate of humanity. It violates every sense of right, every sense of decency. I speak in no passion. I am not going to try to prove this or illustrate it. I speak from long-established conviction. I ask any candid man to read it and look at its provisions, and point out its parallel in iniquity in the statute-books anywhere. But monstrous as it is, it has been executed throughout all the States of this Union wherever they have tried to execute it. It has been executed in Wisconsin, executed in Massachusetts, executed in New York, executed in Ohio. One of the last acts of the late President of the United States was to pardon a citizen of Wisconsin who then lay in jail for a violation of one of the provisions of the fugitive slave law of 1850.

The Senator who made this statement seemed to complain of the people of the North because they had not discharged the duty which, as he says, and which others say, the Constitution imposed upon them of returning fugitives from labor.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator will allow me a moment, as he seems to be quoting from what he supposes to be some remarks that I made, and as I have a copy of those remarks before me, I will read to him just one sentence of what I did say:

"Had political abolitionists refrained from intermeddling with the just rights of the South in regard to slavery there would have been no secessionists."

The fugitive slave law was not mentioned in that connection.

Mr. HOWE. I took down the words as I understood them to fall from the Senator; but certainly I accept the correction. Nevertheless, I think the argument has frequently been made by others. I do not propose to go into any discussion of the merits of that fugitive slave law. I simply state the fact here that that law was executed. Infamous as it was in its provisions, it was executed. I will say here that the Constitution ought to be vindicated by a single word. It imposes no duty upon you or upon me to return any fugitive from labor. It commands you not to interfere with the owner who comes to take him, but it does not tell you to take him back, nor furnish the owner any aid whatever in taking him back. But you have seen the whole power of the United States employed in the rendition of fugitives from slavery under the law of 1850; your Navy employed and your Treasury depleted to pay the expenses of taking back persons who have escaped from slavery. I declare, sir, if slavery had been that sacred fire which used to be kept burning in the temple of Vesta at Rome, and we had been the virgins who guarded it, our vigilance could not have been greater than it has been over the slaves of southern masters. That is the fact. I do not brag of it. I state it.

A few years ago a man by the name of John Brown, with, I think, twenty-one others, made a little expedition into the State of Virginia for some purpose or other. As I understood from him, his purpose was to give freedom to a few slaves, or to a good many slaves, in the State of Virginia, in violation of the law of that State. He failed in that enterprise. He and his twenty-one compatriots were arrested. They were thrown into jail. They were indicted, I think, for treason against the State of Virginia. They were tried, one after the other; and I believe every man of them was hung. They were convicted of treason; and so, I suppose, I am estopped legally from denying that they did commit treason, estopped by the verdict of the jury, or by the judgment of that court. Nevertheless, I will say they did not intend to commit treason. They meant to leave the government of Virginia just as it was. They did mean to take some property, or that which the laws of Virginia recognized as property, away from that State. But they did not mean to overthrow or assail the sovereignty of the State.

I am not justifying John Brown's raid, but I am telling you what happened when that raid was made. They were arrested, as I have stated. They were tried in their courts—well enough. They were found guilty—I do not complain. The judge said they must be hung—I do not complain of that at all. The executioner proceeded to hang them—very well; it was the exercise of the right of Virginia. But this is what I wish to call attention to. You say we of the North have not been true to our constitutional obligations. There was a little petty raid. Admit that the motive was just as bad as human motive can be, and that the purposes of the men engaged in it were as bad as human purpose can be. And what happened? You saw the Governor of Ohio and the Governor of New York and the Governor of Pennsylvania, those three great States, tender to the State of Virginia the militia force of those several States to aid the Commonwealth of Virginia to hang John Brown and his twenty-one compatriots! Can you tell us we are not faithful to our obligations under the Constitution to this institution of slavery when three great northern loyal States actually volunteered to furnish a militia force to help to hang twenty-two men who made an attack on the institution of slavery? Do you tell us after that that we have not been true to our obligations under the Constitution? I plead the general issue. We are faithful. We are too faithful.

I am not justifying John Brown; I am not condemning Virginia for hanging John Brown; but I would rather have been hung when John Brown was than to have been the Governor that hung him; and I am rather inclined to think, if I were permitted to choose, I would rather have been hung with Brown than to have been one of the Governors who offered the militia force of their States to help execute those men.

Sir, if they had really committed treason against Virginia, not connected with the subject of slavery, if John Brown and his twenty-one men had actually gone down to depose Henry A. Wise or whoever was Governor of Virginia, and abolish its Legislature and take possession of its government, if they had gone there for the palpable work of treason, genuine treason, and the Governors of those States had volunteered to help hang the men, what would you have said of them? Would you not have said it was unutterably shameful to muster the military force of these great States to aid another State execute its justice upon twenty-two culprits? I do not speak of it now to complain of these States; but I speak of it as an answer to the assertion made here that we did not come up to the requirements of the Constitution; that we, as political communities, did less than the Constitution demanded at our hands in defense of this southern slavery.

I want to remind you of another thing that happened in this same connection. There was an investigation instituted here in the Senate about this raid. There was a man, my namesake, living in the city of Boston. I have known of him as all Senators have known of him as being engaged in every good work, a patriot and a philanthropist, and a benevolent man. He was no relative of mine. If he had not run away I should wish that he was; but he actually left the country—as the papers said and I believe it to be true—he fled beyond the protection of the Constitution of the United States and beyond the protection of its flag for fear he might be involved in some suspicion of having been an ally of John Brown and his twenty-one compatriots; knowing as he did how relentless was the Government of the United States in punishing every exhibition of infidelity to the law of slavery; knowing as he did that in the penal code of this Government an offense against slavery was the only offense which could not and would not be tolerated.

And yet you tell us we have been false to our constitutional obligations to slavery.

But we have been accused of passing certain laws in the several States calculated to impede the execution of the fugitive slave law or some other law—personal liberty laws they are called. Well, sir, we have passed such laws. We had a right under the Constitution to pass them, or we had no right. If we had the right to pass them under the Constitution, nobody outside of our several States has any right to complain; but if we had no right to pass them, the laws are good for nothing. But let me say here that every representative of Kentucky in her Legislature is amenable for what he does or omits to do only to his God and to his constituents in that State, and he is not amenable to the State of Wisconsin or to the people of Wisconsin for what he does or for what he omits to do; and the reverse of the rule is just as true. Whenever we pass a law which impairs or infringes the constitutional right of a citizen of Kentucky, you know it is not worth the paper on which it is written; it is invalid, it is null and void, and gives you no right to complain whatever. It may show that the public sentiment in Wisconsin is a little disordered, but it can have no other effect.

But remember this revolt is not against the government of the States; it is against the Government of the United States. They did not undertake to overthrow the government of any of the individual States; they did not propose to do it, but simply the Government of the United States, and the Government of the United States never passed any personal liberty laws. But those men who went out from here to make this rebellion told you that the personal liberty laws had never done any hurt and were not the cause of complaint.

Mr. President, what had we done or what had we said to give occasion for this revolt? The form of the Government was as perfect as they could make it. The administration of the Government had been just what they chose to make it. There had been no act of which they could complain. What words had we uttered of which they could complain? The President of the United States, coming into office on the 4th of March, 1861, threatened everywhere with revolt, with war, finding himself surrounded by menace in every direction—what language did he employ toward the insurgents? I desired to read one passage from the inaugural address of the President of the United States, which I thought I had in this volume of the Globe, but I do not see it, and I cannot repeat it, and I must let it pass. Sir, you remember and I remember the language used by the President of the United States who was called upon to encounter the first effort at revolt against the authority of the United States and to break up the Union of these States. His speech was very brief, but it was very emphatic. He said: "By the Eternal, the Union shall be preserved;" and it was. He did not try to palliate, to excuse, or to extenuate. He set himself up before the world as the representative of the people of the United States, and he said that every man in and outside of the United States must respect that authority.

The language we employed in 1861 was milder than that. The threats and the taunts and the insults have all come from the insurgents, and none from the authorities against which they revolted. Let me read to you an extract from the language of one of the Senators from a revolting State. He had not then left the Senate Chamber. He was still in your employ, still under your pay. Speaking of an event which had transpired a short time before, and which had touched the sensibilities of every loyal citizen of the United States, he, here in this Senate Chamber, in the presence of the representatives of the American people, employed this singular language:

"The Star of the West swaggered into Charleston harbor, received a blow planted full in the face and swaggered out. Your flag has been insulted; redress it if you dare. You have submitted to it for two months, and you will submit to it forever."

The Government having done no act against which complaint could be made, having spoken no word that was not spoken in kindness, here was a rebellion mustered, then having gathered head in eight States; here was a man in your council chamber preparing to join it, daring you to assert the authority of the people, telling you that your flag had been insulted, and that you dared not resent it; a rebel right here in your presence in this Senate Chamber. I remember that De Quincey, in some essay of his, treated murder as one of the fine arts. I want to see the essayist who, by and by, in more peaceable times, with the light of this rebellion before him, will undertake to treat of revolution as one of the fine arts.

But, Mr. President, what was the trouble? Did they go to war for nothing? Was this revolution mustered for no purpose whatever? By no manner of means. It was for a very significant purpose. The truth about it was, and you know it, sir, there was an opinion prevailing in a portion of the States of this Union which was very obnoxious to the men who made this rebellion and who owned slaves. Your Constitution was formed for the purpose of making American opinion the supreme law. There were very few limitations put upon that opinion. As a great deal of mischief had arisen in other countries because of establishing some particular religious opinion as the legal opinion upon religious subjects in different realms, it was forbidden that you should make any law regulating worship or regulating religious opinions. It declared American opinion to be the supreme law. There was a necessity, you see, that American opinion should be left perfectly free, that every man should be allowed to think what he pleased on all subjects.

Now, it happened that the men who made that Constitution were almost united in the opinion that slavery was a great wrong. Of course they put nothing into the Constitution to inhibit you or me or any man from thinking the same; and a great portion of the people of the United States had therefore continued to hold fast to that conviction. This rebellion was employed for the simple purpose of crushing out that opinion. The Constitution had left every man free to cherish that opinion who saw fit to cherish it. It could not, therefore, be put down by law. Revolution was the only force which could put it down, and revolution was resorted to for that purpose and for no other.

Let it be remembered by whoever undertakes to speak of this rebellion hereafter, that when your forefathers had secured, by revolution and by war, the right to govern themselves, and had left opinion perfectly free among all the people of the United States, the first opinion which it was attempted to crush out by force was that of anti-slavery. Understand me, then, to assert as a fact that this rebellion is organized for no other purpose than to crush out anti-slavery opinion, and not anti-slavery action. Why do I say that such is the purpose of the rebellion? First, because there is nothing but opinion to rebel against. There was not an act of, there was not a defect in, the Government, as I have shown. There was nothing but an opinion to war against.

But, sir, you were told precisely what you must do to avoid this war. Let me read what that was. A Senator from Texas, speaking in this very Chamber, said:

"Thus I say to the different States, as the representative of my State, that within your borders there are presses and there are public speakers, and unless the newspapers have given a false account of the fact, your President elect a few months, or possibly weeks, before his nomination was a hired abolition lecturer, delivering, at $100 a lecture, lectures throughout the country, exciting the people against us. We say to those States that you shall not—that is the word I choose to use, and I reflect the feeling and determination of the people I represent when I use it—you shall not permit men to go there and excite your citizens to make John Brown raids or bring fire and steel within the limits of the State to which I owe my allegiance. You shall not publish newspapers and pamphlets to excite our slaves to insurrection. You shall not publish newspapers and pamphlets to the slaveholders against the slaveholders or the slaveholders against the non-slaveholders."—Congressional Globe, second session Thirty-Sixth Congress, page 13.

That is what you were told to do to avoid the rebellion. You were told you should do those things, and that you should not do the contrary of those things.

I desire to read extracts from two or three speeches delivered by a former Representative of the State of Georgia, who became vice president of what are called the confederate States, showing conclusively, if human testimony can show anything conclusively, that the division of this Union into two Governments was no purpose of those who made the rebellion, but it was to establish their ideas on the question of slavery as the supreme law of the whole Union; that secession was not the end aimed at, but only a means to the end; that the reconstruction of the whole Union upon slavery as its corner-stone was the declared recognized purpose aimed at by the rebels. He said, in a speech delivered at Montgomery, speaking of the constitution adopted by the confederate States:

"The new constitution has put at rest forever all the agitating questions relating to our peculiar institutions—African slavery as it exists among us, the proper status of the negro in our form of civilization. This was the immediate cause of the late rupture and present revolution. Jefferson, in his forecast, had anticipated this as the rock upon which the old Union would split." He was right. What was conjecture with him is now a realized fact. But whether he fully comprehended the great truth upon which that great rock stood and stands may be doubted. The prevailing ideas entertained by him and most of the leading statesmen at the time of the formation of the old Constitution were that the enslavement of the African was in violation of the laws of nature, that it was wrong in principle, socially, morally, and politically. It was an evil they knew not well how to deal with; but the general opinion of the men of that day was that, somehow or other, in the order of Providence, the institution would be evanescent and pass away. This idea, though not incorporated in the Constitution, was the prevailing idea at the time. The Constitution, it is true, secured every essential guarantee to the institution while it should last, and hence no argument can be justly used against the constitutional guarantees thus secured because of the common sentiment of the day. Those ideas, however, were fundamentally wrong. They rested upon the assumption of the equality of races. This was an error. It was a sandy foundation, and the idea of a Government built upon it. When the 'storm came and the wind blew it fell."

"Our new government is founded upon exactly the opposite ideas; its foundations are laid, its corner-stone rests upon the great truth that the negro is not equal to the white man; that slavery, subordination to the superior race, is his natural and moral condition. [Applause.] This, our new government, is the first in the history of the world based upon this great physical, philosophical, and moral truth."

So it is, sir, the first government in the history of the civilized world based upon that idea; and if God does not utterly forget us it will be the last, let me tell you, whether that idea be a truth or falsehood.

But it may be said they meant to base their government only, the government of the seceded States, upon that corner-stone, and leave your Government, the Government of the remaining States, to rest upon the other corner-stone of universal human equality and human freedom. They did not mean any such thing. They meant, on the contrary, that their government should absorb this. They meant that their institutions should extend over us. They meant not only to reorganize their government upon that idea, but to reorganize this Government also upon the same. It was in this very speech that this same orator undertook to detail, in guarded language, to be sure, but sufficiently explicit for any of us to understand, how he expected to reorganize the Government of these States, and to plant them upon that same corner-stone. He said:

"Our growth by accessions from other States will depend greatly upon whether we present to the world, as I trust we shall, a better government than that to which they belong. If we do this, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Arkansas cannot hesitate long; neither can Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri. They will necessarily gravitate to us by an imperious law. We made ample provision in our constitution for the admission of other States; it is more guarded, and wisely so, I think, than the old Constitution on the same subject, but not too guarded to receive them as fast as it may be proper. Looking to the distant future, and perhaps not very distant either, it is not beyond the range of possibility, and even probability, that all the great States of the Northwest shall gravitate this way as well as Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri, Arkansas, &c. Should they do so, our doors are wide enough to receive them, but not until they are ready to assimilate with us in principle."

"The process of disintegration in the old Union may be expected to go on with almost absolute certainty."

That is not all the testimony we get from this same witness upon this point of what was the real purpose aimed at by the rebellion. Speaking at Atlanta, Georgia, on the 30th of April, 1861, in the very morning of the rebellion, while I think these acts of secession had extended only to eight States, after he had concluded his speech, he was called out again by the earnest solicitation of his friends, and he came out on the platform to impart some intelligence. It was this:

"The news from Washington is very interesting. It has been stated in the newspapers, first, that the Virginia troops had occupied Arlington Heights, just across the Potomac from the President's house; and again, that Lincoln's troops had occupied that point. My information is that both these statements are incorrect. Lincoln, however, has occupied Georgetown Heights. He has from fifteen to twenty thousand soldiers stationed in and about Washington. Troops are quartered in the Capitol, who are defacing its walls and ornaments with grease and filth, like a set of Vandal hordes. The new Senate Chamber has been converted into a kitchen and quarters, cooking and sleeping apparatus having actually been erected and placed in that elegant apartment. The Patent Office is converted into soldiers' barracks, and is ruined with their filth. The Post Office Department is made a storehouse for barrels of flour and bacon. All the Departments are appropriated to base uses, and despoiled of their beauty by those treacherous destructive enemies of our country. Their filthy spoils of the public buildings and works of art at the capital, and their preparations to destroy them, are strong evidence to my mind that they do not intend to hold or defend the place, but to abandon it, after having despoiled and laid it in ruins. Let them destroy it—savagely like—if they will. We will rebuild it. We will make the structures more glorious. Phoenix-like, new and more substantial structures will rise from its ashes. Planted anew, under the auspices of our superior institutions, it will live and flourish throughout all ages."

A rebellion waged to vindicate the independence of eight States, which had declared themselves independent of the balance of the Union, to rebuild the Capitol of the United States! What interest have they in the Capitol of the United States? How happened the vice president of that confederacy to be threatening to rebuild this Capitol? If the purpose of the rebellion was to establish the independence of those States, what had they to do with the conquest of the District of Columbia? What had they to do with rebuilding the Capitol of the United States?

Preceding this speech, on the 19th of December, 1860, the State of Mississippi sent commissioners to confer with the government of Maryland on the subject of secession; and in a speech made to the citizens of Baltimore on that evening the commissioner spoke as follows:

"Secession is not intended to break up the present Government, but to perpetuate it. We do not propose to go out by way of destroying or breaking up the Union as our fathers gave it to us; but we go out for the purpose of getting further guarantees and securities to our rights, not by convention of all the sovereign States, not by congressional treaties which have failed in times past and will fail again; but our plan is for the southern States to withdraw from the Union for the present, to allow amendments to the Constitution to be made guarantying our just rights. If the northern States will not make those amendments by which these rights shall be secured to us, then we must secure them the best way we can."

Here we have the explicit testimony from the ambassador of one of the seceding States that secession is not intended to break up this Government, but to perpetuate it. They proposed to organize a new and independent government, not for the purpose of protecting their rights, but to make this government guaranty their rights. Their rights were to be secured, not by making their constitution, but by amending ours. If the northern States would not make those amendments, then they were to secure them the best way they could. Thus, by the mouths of these three witnesses, the whole purpose of secession is revealed.

The representative from Texas (Mr. Wigfall) says your abolition societies must be abolished, and Mr. Lincoln must stop lecturing. Mr. Stephens asserts that they mean to rebuild your Capitol. And the commissioner from Mississippi declares that your Constitution must be amended. All these things are to be done, too, not because your people wish them done, but because the people of the seceding States will have them done.

Sir, during the executive session of this Senate in March, 1861, your capital was garrisoned by a military force which, if I remember, numbered about twelve hundred. Such a force, of course, could not be dangerous to the capital of the confederate States, but might offer some resistance to the capital of the United States. Accordingly, Mr. Maso, then a Senator from Virginia, undertook to secure their removal. For that purpose he offered a resolution to the Senate in the following words:

"Whereas the presence of a military force, concentrated and permanently quartered at the seat of Government of the United States, is a departure from all former usage of the Government, and dangerous to the rights and liberties of the people; Therefore,

"Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate what is the number of troops of the Army of the United States now quartered in this city, the respective arms of service to which they belong, and the purpose for which they were brought here; and that he further inform the Senate when the said troops are to be withdrawn from this city; and if not to be withdrawn, for what purpose they are to be retained here; and whether it is in contemplation of the Executive to increase said force, and to what extent."

Another Senator introduced a resolution calling on the President to withdraw all your troops from all your forts throughout the several States which had seceded. But this is not all the evidence I have that secession is not the end aimed at, but only a means to the end, which end is the conquest of your Government, the subjugation of it to slavery and to slaveholding. The very first act of war was an attempt at conquest. The very first gun that was fired at your flag was fired at it as it floated from one of your own vessels in one of your harbors, going to feed one of your own garrisons. Was that to vindicate the independence of the seceded States? Was that to enable them to be let alone?

If it were true that the ordinance of secession adopted by South Carolina made her an independent State, it certainly could not have transferred to her any of the forts of the United States any more than it could have transferred the forts of Mexico. Or if it did transfer our forts it could not have transferred our troops.

But the next step of the seceders was an act of conquest. The bombardment opened upon one of your own forts, built upon land which you had purchased and paid for, and exclusive jurisdiction of which had been ceded to your Government, on which you had planted a fort with your own money, which was occupied by your troops, over which your flag floated. It was an attempt at subjugation as palpable and as unmistakable when that bombardment opened upon Fort Sumter as if it had been opened upon any one of the forts in the harbor of New York or of Boston.

There is another reason for believing that what I have asserted of the aim of the rebels is true. It is part of the terribly sad history of those times that your President elect came into this city prior to his inauguration in the night time; and for what purpose? To avoid assassination. As I understand the evidence, if he had come through upon the regular train in which he was appointed to come, this great drama would have opened with the assassination of the President of the United States. I understand that fact is established beyond doubt. I know it was alluded to by rebel Senators on this floor; and the President was sneered at for having taken steps to save the rebellion from the one act that could possibly have added to its guilt—the act of assassination. I take it, it will not be said that the assassination of President Lincoln was made necessary to secure the independence of the seceded States. By no manner of means; but it was one step toward the subjugation of the United States. That it would not have gone very far toward subjugating these States, you and I may well believe; but it is very certain that if the seceders had been willing the non-seceding States should exist at all as an independent republic, they would have allowed us a President. The assassins who gathered about the path of your President it is very manifest were only a part of the monstrous brood who for years had plotted against the life of your Republic.

Mr. President, if there were any evidence required or could be any adduced to show the groundlessness of this rebellion more than I have adduced, it may be found perhaps in the fact that it is really to-day a matter of dispute not only as to what caused the rebellion, but as to where it originated; and if any evidence could be produced, or any could be required more than I have already adduced, that the purpose of the rebellion was to crush out an opinion, and not to correct oppression, it may be found in the fact that the advocates, or the apologists of the rebellion, as often tell you that it originated in Massachusetts as that it originated in South Carolina. You hear it asserted over and over again that the rebellion originated in Massachusetts, or in New England. As to the mere matter of fact, I am inclined to think it did originate in Massachusetts, and not in South Carolina. I do think it originated in the State of Massachusetts, but I do not hold the whole State of Massachusetts responsible for it. I think the town of Westboro', if I remember the name of the place, is peculiarly responsible, for if the town of Westboro' never had given birth to Eli Whitney we probably never should have had this rebellion; but Westboro' did give birth to Eli Whitney, and the mischief did not stop there. Eli Whitney invented the cotton-gin, and the cotton-gin manufactured the rebellion a great many years afterwards. I state this upon authority, judicial authority. Let me read it. Mr. Justice Johnson, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Georgia, delivered the opinion of the court in 1807, in a case between Whitney and an alleged infringer of his patent, in which he said:

"The cotton plant furnished clothing to mankind before the age of Herodotus. The green seed is a species much more productive than the black, and by nature adapted to a much greater variety of climate. But by reason of the strong adherence of the fiber to the seed, without the aid of some more powerful machine for separating it than any formerly known among us, the cultivation of it would never have been made an object. The machine of which Mr. Whitney claims the invention so facilitates the preparation of this species for use, that the cultivation of it has suddenly become an object of infinitely greater national importance than that of the other species ever can be. Is it then to be imagined that if this machine had been before discovered, the use of it would ever have been lost, or could have been confined to any tract or country left unexplored by commercial enterprise? But it is unnecessary to remark further upon this subject. A number of years have elapsed since Mr. Whitney took out his patent, and no one has produced or pretended to prove the existence of a machine of similar construction or use.

"2. With regard to the utility of this discovery, the court would deem it a waste of time to dwell long upon this topic. Is there a man who hears us who has not experienced its utility? The whole interior of the southern States was languishing, and its inhabitants emigrating for want of some object to engage their attention and employ their industry, when the invention of this machine at once opened views to them which set the whole country in active motion. From childhood to age it has presented to us a lucrative employment. Individuals who were depressed with poverty and sunk in idleness have suddenly risen to wealth and respectability. Our debts have been paid off, our capitals have increased, and our lands trebled themselves in value. We cannot express the weight of the obligation which the country owes to this invention. The extent of it cannot now be seen. Some faint presentiment may be formed from the reflection that cotton is rapidly supplanting wool, flax, silk, and even furs in manufactures, and may one day profitably supply the use of specie in our East India trade. Our sister States, also, participate in the benefits of this invention; for besides affording the raw material for their manufacturers, the bulkiness and quantity of the article afford a valuable employment for their shipping."

There you have upon the authority of Mr. Justice Johnson the evidence of what slavery was, what the condition of those States was when Eli Whitney invented the cotton-gin. They were abandoning the southern States instead of looking forth to the conquest of these great northern States. They were fleeing to us from starvation, fleeing to us for employment; but Eli Whitney came and he invented the cotton-gin, and thenceforth, while it had before taken the labor of one man for a day to clean the seed from one pound of cotton, one man was found sufficient to clean the seed from three hundred weight of cotton in a day. The cultivation of cotton became the most profitable culture in the world; and on the eve of this rebellion you were furnished with another kind of testimony as to the progress that culture had made between the time of the invention of the cotton-gin and the time of the invention of the rebellion. A Senator speaking to you here in this Chamber, for which you paid him, but speaking in the interest of the rebellion—I read from the remarks of a late Senator from Texas, (Mr. Wigfall)—said to you:

"We will have peace; and if you do not offer it to us we will quietly, and as we have the right under the constitutional compact to do, withdraw from the Union and establish a government for ourselves; and if you then persist in your aggressions, we will leave it to the ultima ratio regum, and the sovereign States will settle that question

"Where the battle's wreck lies thickest

And death's brief pang is quickest."

"And when you laugh at these impotent threats, as you regard them, I tell you that cotton is king!"

After several interruptions the same Senator went on to say:

"Then, sir, for the third or fourth time—and I trust that I may be permitted to go on—I say that cotton is king, and that he waves his scepter not only over these thirty-three States, but over the island of Great Britain and over continental Europe, and that there is no crowned head upon that island or upon the Continent that does not bend the knee in fealty and acknowledged allegiance to that monarch."—Congressional Globe, Thirty-Sixth Congress, second session, p. 73.

The cotton-gin, invented in Massachusetts—Mr. DAVIS. New York. Whitney lived in New York.

Mr. HOWE. I think the invention was actually made in Connecticut; but no matter about that, we can settle that hereafter; we can settle it when the next rebellion comes on. The inventor was a Massachusetts man, anyhow. It transformed cotton from a mendicant, in the language of Judge

Johnson, to a king, in the language of Mr. Wigfall, a late Senator from Texas. He told you and others told you that they were exporting $250,000,000 annually of this product, cotton. They had grown immensely wealthy by it. They owned as I have told you one fourth of the whole assessed value of the United States in 1860. They had invested one fourth of the whole assessed value of the United States in slave labor, and this, besides nearly all the other personal and real property in the South, was massed in the hands of about four hundred thousand slaveholders. They really believed that they could command, could control the whole twenty-six million of white people in the United States; and the question to-day is whether they shall control them or whether the people shall control themselves. That is the question; there is no other. Remember, if you are beaten in this contest, you are the subjects, the serfs of the men who own the four million slaves; there is no escape from it. If you whip them they are your equals. You never can reduce them to anything below American citizens, because you are bound by the Constitution. You may reduce them to the grave, I know, through the instrumentality of the halter, and I trust you will not overlook that authority, but those whom you save from the halter must be citizens of the United States, and the question is whether you will maintain your position of equality with them, or whether you will allow yourselves to be reduced to their instruments and their serfs.

This is the issue; and yet I hear it said on every hand that we ought to compromise with them, ought to make some sort of terms with them. I protest against it. It is said we might have compromised with them and saved this war. I deny it as a matter of fact, but I spurn the idea if it were ever so true. Compromise with them; how? Your Government was organized for the purpose of allowing the American people to make such laws as they chose to have; the American opinion, as I have told you before, was to be the supreme law. It was dethroned a great many years ago, and you have not been governed for the last twenty years by American opinion; you have been governed by bluster, by threats, by menace. Undoubtedly, in 1861, if your President had called the Legislature together, and you had written such laws and made such amendments to the Constitution as the rebels saw fit to dictate to you, they would not have fought you. As long as you would do as you were told to do, there could be no reason for fighting you; but, sir, when you allow a battery to be planted on the banks of the Potomac or the banks of the Ashley river to dictate your legislation to you, and you make your laws and your constitutions so as to prevent that battery from opening fire on you, you are a slave, you are not a free man. When you come to make your laws not to suit yourselves but to suit others, when you come to vote not as your judgments but as your fears persuade you, it will be but a very few days after that before you will begin to dig potatoes and cultivate cotton for the same reasons.

Such, then, I find to be the cause and the purpose of the rebellion. It was not to secure the independence of slaveholders, but to subject you to abject dependence upon slaveholders. It was not to build a new capitol for a new government, but to place a new government in possession of your Capitol. It was not to frame a new constitution for a new republic, but it was to impose a new constitution upon the Republic of the United States. It was not to secure toleration for slavery within the seceding States, but to compel the adoption of slavery by the nation. If the cotton-gin had not been invented slaveholding would not have been profitable. If slaveholding had not been profitable slaveholders would not have been rich. If slaveholders had not been rich they would not have been arrogant. If they had not been arrogant four hundred thousand slaveholders would not have presumed to challenge dominion over twenty million freemen. Slavery without the cotton-gin would have been a monster wrong, but it would not have been dangerous to the Republic. The cotton-gin without slavery would have been of twice the value it has been and still would not have been dangerous to any one. Together they have proved fatal to the peace of the nation. I do not advise to destroy them both. I advise that slavery be destroyed and the cotton-gin doubled in value.

Internal Revenue—Mr. Frank.

"Jove has fixed it certain, that whatever day Makes man a slave takes half his worth away."

If four million negroes were worth $3,000,000,000 as slaves, they will be worth $6,000,000,000 as freemen. Take that immense wealth from the hands of your mortal enemies and double it in the hands of your immortal friends.

Now, Mr. President, I must not close without remarking that all slaveholders have not participated in the guilt of this rebellion. I know that very well; and if there is any class of loyal men to whom I am more grateful for their loyalty than another class, it is that class which has been true to the Constitution and true to the flag, notwithstanding the incumbrances of slaveholding. Wherever you find me a man who, in spite of his being a slaveholder, has proved true to the Constitution, I can tell you the fitting epitaph to put upon his tombstone whenever he dies, and such men I hope will be very slow to die: place upon his tombstone the epitaph that in spite of slavery he was found true to the principle of Democracy during the great struggle of 1861.

Looking at this proposed amendment, therefore, as a matter of justice to the slave, as a measure of expediency to the master, as a measure of necessity to the nation, I give all my energies and all my aspirations to the adoption of it, and it will be adopted. It will be adopted, let me tell the Senate here, by the vote of every State in the Union. All the free States of the Union have already abolished slavery within their limits. There are the States of Delaware, of Missouri, of Kentucky, and of Maryland, which still hold to some form of slavery and hold true to the Constitution. I heard the Senator from Illinois the other day express some doubt as to whether Delaware and Kentucky would agree to this amendment. Sir, I undertake to say that both States will agree to it. The State of Delaware refuse to emancipate her few slaves in a time like this, when the nation wants them, and when the nation wants to deprive the rebellion of so large a force as it has in slavery!

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to ask the Senator whether he is willing to amend the joint resolution now before the Senate providing for the adoption of this amendment of the Constitution, by declaring that it shall not be lawful for the Federal Government or any person in the employment of the Federal Government to use the military power for the purpose of securing the adoption of the amendment, or in any manner interfering with the freedom of election in the State of Maryland and the State of Kentucky, when that proposition shall come before us, so as to give them a fair opportunity to express their wishes on the subject.

Mr. HOWE. I am not sure I understand the question.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will explain to the Senator again. This is a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States by the vote of the people of the States.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to know whether the Senator and those who act with him are willing to have an amendment made to this resolution that the military of the United States shall not be used to interfere with the freedom of elections, when the people of Delaware, Maryland, and Kentucky shall pass upon the question; whether the people may be free to act without any influence or intimidation.

Mr. HOWE. I understand the question. Yes, Mr. President, show me that there is any danger of the military controlling the elections of Delaware and Maryland and Kentucky, and I am willing to put any statute upon the books that you want to prevent that. I do not want an election in those States or any State controlled by military force, and with my consent it never shall be had.

Mr. SAULSBURY. One other remark. I say to the Senator that the military did control the last special election in Delaware; that they attempted to do it in the election preceding; and I see from the papers that General Wallace intimates very distinctly that he will have something to do with the approaching election in Maryland.

Mr. HOWE. Whether in point of fact the military did control the election in Delaware or Maryland, I cannot stop now to inquire. I have occupied a great deal more time than I intended. I heard the argument of the Senator from Delaware on that point the other day. He did not satisfy me as to the fact that they had controlled the election in either of those States, or anywhere; but I undertake to say there is abundant law now upon the statute-books of every one of your States to correct any such wrong as that. You only want to enforce existing laws, and no military officer has any such power as is said to be exerted.

Mr. SAULSBURY. One other remark. I will ask the Senator whether, if we were to attempt to enforce our State laws so that the electors should have a free exercise of their right on the day of the election, and it became necessary to repel the force sent by orders from the War Department to interfere with our election, he and those with whom he acts would not proclaim that we were guilty of acts of treason in resisting interference with our rights by the military.

Mr. HOWE. No, Mr. President, whenever the courts of Delaware issue a writ in the name of the State of Delaware; whenever the supreme authority of that State issues a precept to correct any right, to redress any wrong, it will be obeyed beyond all manner of question. At some time I may have occasion to speak upon these allegations of usurpation and tyranny urged against the present Administration. I cannot stop to do it now; I have another chore on hand; but I want to say once more that the State of Delaware will not resist this amendment; the State of Delaware will adopt this amendment; her people will adopt it in the exercise of their free judgment. The Senator from Delaware shakes his head. I do not know but that he will oppose the amendment; that he will advise the people of Delaware not to adopt it; but his advice will not prevail, I humbly trust and I humbly believe. Undertake to persuade that little State of Delaware not to enfranchise her few slaves when all the rest of the Union are crying for it! Dame Partington, Mr. President, standing on the beach of the Atlantic trying to put back its waves with her mop, would be a model of practical sagacity compared with the Senator from Delaware, if he should stand on the borders of that little State and undertake to persuade her not to let the deluge of freedom, which God has commanded to sweep the continent, flow over that little patch of His pasture.

Delaware will adopt the amendment, and so will Kentucky. I heard it said the other day that it was a little doubtful whether Kentucky would adopt this amendment. Sir, Henry Clay sleeps in Kentucky, I am told. Let her people reject this proposition to amend the Constitution under the pressure of this great national necessity, and they would see the bones of the great hero rise from his grave and stalk indignantly from the borders; they would not rest there any longer. Kentucky will adopt this amendment. Every State will adopt it. I know that there are eleven States which have declared themselves independent of this Constitution and of all amendments to it. What are you going to do with them? It is a question that ought to be considered. I have considered it for two or three years. There are those Territories and communities of people. They are States, or they are not. If they are States they are going to pass upon this amendment, and every man who votes is going to vote for the amendment in every one of them. If they are not States they are not to be counted, and they are not going to vote. It is a question that you ought to settle. In my judgment, there are no American States there. I say that freely. I do not stop now to argue it. Decide the matter as you will: if they are States they are going to vote upon this amendment, and they are going to vote for it; every man who votes at all upon it will vote to adopt the amendment. If they are not States they are not to vote upon it, and their votes are not to be counted, and you still have a unanimous verdict from the States of the American Union in favor of this amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. President, I have occupied the attention of the Senate too long. One thing more I wanted to say. I think your amendment should go further than as I understand it does. I think that when the American people command that these persons shall be free, they should command that they be educated, or at least that there be no laws enacted in any State to prevent their education. I quoted from what I called the lower law a little while ago; I quoted that precept which I believe you will find there which says, as I read it, that the State which educates its people and does not enfranchise them shall be damned. I want to quote one other commandment from the same code, and it is this, that the State which enfranchises its people and does not educate them shall be doubly damned, and I conclude with that quotation.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

REMARKS OF HON. AUG. FRANK, OF NEW YORK, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Monday, April 25, 1864.

The House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the bill to provide internal revenue to support the Government, &c., commencing with section ninety-seven.

Mr. FRANK. I move to strike out from line eleven on page 136, down to the word "cents" in line thirty-four on page 137, as amended, as follows:

For each sale of not exceeding one hundred shares of stock, or less when the par value is $100, one dollar; exceeding one hundred shares, for every additional one hundred shares or fractional part thereof, at the rate of one dollar for one hundred shares; when the par value exceeds $100 per share, so much thereof as at the par value shall amount to a sum not exceeding $10,000, one dollar; exceeding the sum of $10,000, for every additional $10,000 or fractional part thereof, one dollar; for each one hundred shares of stock, or less when the par value is fifty dollars, twenty-five cents; exceeding one hundred shares, for every additional one hundred shares or fractional part thereof, at the rate of one dollar for one hundred shares; for each sale of gold and silver bullion, sterling exchange, uncurrent money, promissory notes, stocks, bonds, or other securities, not exceeding the sum of $10,000, one dollar; exceeding the sum of $10,000, for every additional $10,000 or fractional part thereof, one dollar.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Upon all sales of stocks, bonds, gold and silver bullion and coin, sterling exchange, promissory notes or other securities, one tenth of one per cent. on the amount of such sales, and of all contracts for such sales.

Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment because I think it is the general opinion of this House that the tax proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means on sales of stocks and bonds is altogether too small. The amendment offered by the gentleman who has charge of the bill makes the tax one hundredth of one per cent.; a mere nothing. The amendment which has been read by the Clerk makes the tax one tenth of one per cent. on the dollar. The man who purchases $1,000 of stock or bonds legitimately can well afford to pay a dollar to the Government. To the men who sell and buy large amounts of stock from day to day in the market possibly it might be a large tax; I grant that it would be; but the emergency of the case and the necessity of the Government are such that parties who deal in stocks can well afford to pay a large tax. It is well known to us all that we must be taxed. I ask any gentleman of this House if it is not a fairer proposition to put a tax upon these sales of stock than upon the lands or other property of the country?

The tax I propose to impose would yield a revenue of five or ten million dollars and perhaps fifteen millions. It will work no hardship upon any man who purchases stocks legitimately, having the money to pay at the time of purchase. If it be said that it would work hardship on those who deal in stocks from day to day, the "bulls" and "bears" who make their "corners," I would simply remark that I think it would be for the best interests of the country if all that business could be blotted out. I believe that if we are to have a panic in this country in our financial affairs it will grow out of the operations of these stock dealers. I believe that if the effect of this tax should be to cut up that entire part of the business by the roots it would be for the benefit of the country. I hope my amendment will be unanimously supported.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Reciprocity Treaty—Mr. Kellogg.

HO. OF REPS.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

SPEECH OF HON. F. W. KELLOGG,
OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 25, 1864.

The House having under consideration the joint resolution authorizing the President to give the requisite notice for terminating the treaty made with Great Britain on behalf of the British provinces in North America, and to appoint commissioners, to negotiate a new treaty with the British Government, based upon the true principles of reciprocity—

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to consume the time of the House this morning, and shall be brief in what I have to say on the question before us, but I cannot be altogether silent when my constituents are so deeply interested in the decision which we may come to on the joint resolution now under consideration. The fifth article in the reciprocity treaty provides that should either party be dissatisfied with it at any future time they may, at the expiration of ten years from its ratification, abrogate it altogether by giving one year's notice of a desire to do so. The resolution before the House directs the President to give such notice to the British Government, and I am in favor of its immediate passage. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] provides for the appointment of commissioners by the United States and Great Britain, provided the British Government consent, who shall confer together and endeavor to amend the existing treaty to the satisfaction, if possible, of all the parties concerned.

This amendment is open to many objections, and I greatly prefer giving notice to the British Government in the manner prescribed by the treaty itself. If on receiving this notice the British Government, who are as deeply interested as we are, should propose to appoint commissioners, I am sure no one would have any objection. A year will afford ample time for negotiation; but, if more should be necessary, Congress, at its next session, could provide for such an emergency; and I do not see how any harm can follow the adoption of this resolution and action upon it by the President. The British Government will have no right to complain of us for taking this course, and I do not believe they will. On the other hand, we need not expect to secure their favor and good will by suffering this treaty to remain in force, for the Government and the people of England, with a few honorable exceptions, are alike unfriendly to us. From the very commencement of this rebellion they have not tried to conceal the joy they feel at the prospect of a possible dissolution of the Union and the consequent destruction of the Government of the United States. Hating slavery heartily, and engaged in preaching a crusade against it in every part of the world since the commencement of this century, they have notwithstanding that fraternized at the first opportunity with a body of men who have taken up arms for the express purpose of extending and perpetuating it, and shown their willingness to tolerate that or the slave trade either if they could thereby secure the dismemberment and ruin of this Republic. They have shown their sympathy with the rebellion in public meetings and in Parliament, giving every possible encouragement to the rebel leaders, and aided them in fitting out ships-of-war in their ports to prey upon our commerce till they have well-nigh driven it from the ocean. They have recently organized an association in Manchester for the express purpose of procuring the recognition and securing the independence of the rebel confederacy; and we may judge of its popularity and influence from the fact that the names of its officers alone fill five columns of the New York Times, and many of them are noblemen and men of distinction in the British empire. The colonies on our borders, who are directly benefited by this treaty, have displayed the same feeling of hostility toward us that pervades the mother country, and it is no fault of theirs if we are not now at war with England.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] has drawn a pleasing picture of the Canadas and of the friendly feeling of the people for the Government of the United States. He assures us that the denunciations of our country which we hear of daily do not come from the people of Canada, but from rebels and refugees who reside there and who control the public demonstrations in favor of the rebellion, and of which we complain. Sir, I wish these statements were true, but they are not, as all who have traveled in the Canadas within the last three years can testify. They have no friendly feeling for us, and no wish that we may be successful in this terrible struggle for national honor and national existence.

But I should not have alluded to the hostile feeling of England and her colonies toward us had not the gentleman, [Mr. DAVIS] who preceded me in defense of the treaty, attempted to explain it away. I do not ask for the abrogation of this treaty because England and her colonies have not been as friendly as they should be, but because I wish to protect our own interests and build up our own country in preference to a foreign one. I am opposed to it because it confers no benefit at all in comparison with the injury it inflicts upon our farmers and our manufacturers, and upon American industry everywhere, and because we may expect these interests will be injured more and more from its operations with each succeeding year.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] assures us that the evils we complain of are not caused by the treaty itself, but by subsequent colonial legislation; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] puts in the same plea in its favor. Sir, I am aware of the fact that the legislation of the colonies has been of an unfriendly character for several years past, gradually excluding our manufactures from their markets by imposing such duties that their export on our part was unprofitable. But I cannot excuse it as easily as they do. They admit that such legislation violates the spirit if not the letter of the treaty. But if they can do so with impunity to our injury, what is it good for, and why should we desire to prolong its existence? The gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] assures us, however, that they do it only because they are obliged to, and that the Canadian government expressed their regret that they could not admit our manufactures on the same terms they did five years ago. But that was impossible. They must tax imports heavily, because they must have money to pay the interest on the enormous debt which they have incurred in the construction of ship canals and railways connecting the lakes with the ocean.

Mr. Speaker, we are in the same situation, though from different causes, and cannot trade with the Canadas on the same terms we did five years ago. We must have such a modification of this treaty as will adapt it to our altered circumstances, or have none at all, and place the colonies on the same footing in regard to trade that we do the mother country. We have been compelled to raise large armies to suppress a most wicked and infamous rebellion, and in that way have created a national debt which will be a burden to us for a generation to come. To preserve the honor and credit of the Government we must increase our duties on imports and raise hundreds of millions of dollars annually by a direct tax upon the industry and business of the country. Such is our present condition that we cannot afford to admit colonial products duty free as we have done, and I am surprised to hear that any member of this House should be in favor of doing so. But the gentleman from New York professes to believe that it is for our interest to do so, and that if we should take a broad and comprehensive view of our relations to our neighbors we should see that it would be better to deal with Canadas as we do with Ohio, and place no restrictions on her trade whatever. Sir, this may be so, but my vision is too limited to discover it, and my view of it not so broad and comprehensive as to induce me to admit Canada, a part of the British empire, to the privileges enjoyed by a sister State whose interests are identified with our own and must be forever.

The argument that New York may derive some benefit from this trade is not worth considering in the settlement of this question. Her prosperity depends upon that of our common country, and you cannot separate the one from the other. It seems impossible to me to present a good argument in favor of this treaty, and I doubt if any serious defense of it would have been attempted but for the ship canals of Canada. These great avenues from the lakes to the ocean afford great facilities at this time to the business men of Chicago and other lake ports for the shipment of their grain to the European markets. Other canals of vast magnitude are already projected in the Canadas; and should this treaty continue in existence they will soon be completed. But if they are useful to us to some extent in time of peace for commercial purposes, they are of immense value to England in a military point of view for the protection of her colonies in the event of hostilities with this country at any period in the future. Under the provisions of the treaty of 1814, neither Power can have a ship-yard or naval depot on the lakes, and England will never need one. The commerce of the West will keep her immense canals in repair so long as we are at peace, and pay the interest on the cost of their construction.

In case of a war with this Government, her gun-boats could pass through them to the lakes and penetrate the very heart of our country, burning the towns and cities on our lake shores and annihilating all their commerce. The trade of Chicago would be utterly destroyed, and a hostile fleet might lay alongside her wharves and levy contributions at their pleasure.

Mr. Speaker, I was sorry, to hear the distinguished gentleman from Chicago [Mr. ARNOLD] defend this treaty with so much earnestness, and express a wish for the speedy construction of more canals through the Canadas. I have listened with great pleasure to his denunciations of slavery, and hope I shall live to join with him in thanksgivings to God for its abolition throughout the Republic. I agree with him in giving a hearty support to the Administration and to the policy which is to make it memorable in history forever; but when he proposes to purchase the right of way through a foreign country to carry off the grain grown in the West, I must disagree with him, however much I may dislike to do so. His policy would not only build up and make more effective those vast military works which are of such importance to the English Government, but it taxes one branch of our industry for the benefit of another, which I believe to be unnecessary and unjust. Not more than twelve per cent. of the grain shipped from our lake ports passes through these canals, yet for the poor privilege of using them to that extent we must admit Canadian products free of duty to the manifest injury of those branches of our industry with which they come in direct competition.

Our wool-growers and lumbermen suffer more severely than any other class of our citizens, and are too numerous to be overlooked in the settlement of this question. In the production of wool Michigan is now the third State in the Union, and in the manufacture of lumber she is probably the first. Wisconsin is largely interested in the lumber trade, and the farmers of every part of the country are turning their attention more and more to the growing of wool for our own consumption. In 1863 our manufacturers imported seventy million pounds of wool, and the most of it came in duty free. Our farmers consider this just cause of complaint, and for months past petitions have poured in upon us from every quarter of the country praying Congress to impose heavy duties on all wool of foreign growth, and I hope we shall not adjourn without doing all we possibly can for their protection.

Sir, I wish we could tax every pound of foreign-grown wool which comes into our country; I hope we shall at no distant period, though we cannot do so now. Canada furnished nearly two million pounds to our manufacturers in 1863, of a quality much like that which we produce, and coming directly in competition with it; but all that must come in free under the stipulations of this treaty. This may seem to be a small matter now, but the high prices wool must command hereafter will stimulate its production everywhere, and if this treaty remains in force our imports of wool from the Canadas will soon quadruple in quantity to the great injury of our own farmers, while it will add rapidly to the wealth, population, and resources of our neighbors. The wool-growers East and West protest against such a policy, and we must give heed to their complaints. We have a vast country, with every variety of soil and climate, and every description and quality of wool can be grown here to advantage. A proper protection of this great staple would cause increased attention to its production, and instead of importing seventy million pounds annually we should soon grow every pound we manufacture.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] asserts that we have not lumber enough in the country for our own consumption, and likes the treaty because it enables us to obtain a supply from Canada free of duty. I do not agree with him, for I believe we have an abundant supply for all our wants for centuries to come; but we need not discuss that point now, for we do not propose to prohibit its importation, but impose a heavy duty upon it, as we do upon almost every article of foreign growth. We import about five hundred million feet of lumber annually from the colonies; and at this time, when we need all the money we can command, we ought to derive a large revenue from its sale. The lumber dealers of Canada have a great advantage over those of our own country. Their lands and labor are cheap, their taxes are trifling, the trade is very profitable, and its influence upon the growth and prosperity of the Canadas is very great.

The gentleman from Chicago [Mr. ARNOLD] spoke of the slow growth of the colonies; but I can assure him that neither Illinois or any other State east of the Mississippi has increased in population so rapidly as Upper Canada.

Highly favored by this treaty as it has been, that province has increased in wealth and population with a rapidity almost unexampled in history. I am not jealous of her growth or envious of her prosperity. There is room enough for all, and I bid her God speed in her race with us for riches and power; but I propose to legislate in favor of my own constituents, and not in such a way as to build up Canada at the expense of Michigan. Our farmers and lumbermen are heavily taxed to pay our debts and support the Government. Tea, coffee, sugar, and in fact almost every article of ordinary consumption, has doubled in value, yet they pay without complaining, and expect to go for a generation to come. But that is not all. They have turned out eagerly by tens of thousands in defense of the old flag and for the preservation of the Union. Every battle-field has drank of their blood, and the whole world has heard of their patriotism and bravery. But when the old battle-scarred veterans who survive the war return to their homes and the peaceful pursuits of industry, are they to be told that the Government in defense of which they shed their blood and periled their lives will not protect their labor and industry against foreign competition? No, sir, no; we must change our policy to suit our circumstances, now that we can rightfully do so, and not admit vast quantities of the products of the colonies duty free a day longer than we are obliged to.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken at some length of the wool and lumber interests, not merely because my constituents are directly interested in them, but because they are of such magnitude that the whole country is affected by their depression or prosperity. They are of national importance, and we cannot sacrifice them for any consideration whatever. I regret that the produce dealers in our lake ports are so willing to be tributary to and dependent upon a foreign Power. The gentleman from Chicago, who represents more of them, perhaps, than any other member of the House, affirms that the ship canals of Canada are indispensably necessary to the prosperity of the West, and when the last Congress failed to pass a bill enlarging our canals and increasing their capacity, commissioners were sent from Illinois to confer with the Canadian government about increasing the facilities for the transportation of their produce through the Canadas.

Sir, this may be right and may be best, and perhaps they understand this question better than I do. It may be that the time has come when the lion and the lamb shall lie down together, but I do not believe it, and sooner than be a party to such an arrangement with any foreign Power, I would let my grain rot on the ground where it grew, and live and die in poverty.

Sir, I know that we must have more outlets to the ocean from the West, but I would have them on our own territory, under the protection of our own Government, where we could reap the benefit of them ourselves, and where no treaties with a foreign Power were necessary. We can enlarge the canals we have to almost any extent, and build new ones till we have created ample water communication between the vast prairies of the West and the seaports of New England and New York. This will enable the farmers who cultivate those fertile regions to reach the markets of the world with their produce at a price which they can afford to pay. The producer and consumer are alike interested in cheapening the freights on the food of the people; and, next to putting down the rebellion, I know of nothing so important as the providing of these great highways for the business of the country; nothing that will add so much to the prosperity of every portion of it, and which is so necessary to the welfare of the whole people, the preservation of the Government, and the perpetuity of the Union. Congress cannot postpone the consideration of this question much longer. Food is too cheap in some sections of the country, and too dear in others, while freights are so high between the East and West that our exports to Europe are small compared with what they should be. We can equalize the cost of food so that it will be cheap enough everywhere, and increase our exports to the Old World to an indefinite extent, if we provide cheap transportation from the interior to the seaboard, and that we must do soon, whatever it may cost us.

But something more may be done by private enterprise and without the aid of legislation, State or national. The heavy duties imposed on imported goods of every description will afford ample protection to American industry, and we ought to build up manufactories enough to supply our wants as speedily as possible. There is no danger of any reduction of duties for years to come, and capital can be safely invested in manufacturing whatever there is a market for. Instead of importing vast quantities of goods from abroad in excess of our exports, and thereby building up great manufacturing cities in France and England, let us build them rather in Michigan, in Illinois, in Iowa, and other States of the West. Food and fuel are cheap, labor would be plenty, and a market would soon be created that would consume more of the products of the West than we now export to Europe. In the town where I reside we have a water-power equal to that of Lowell, in Massachusetts, and not a manufactory there worth naming. We ought to have fifty of them, and we shall in a few years, with a population of fifty thousand, which will consume all the productions of the rich and fertile country around them. What is true of this town is true of hundreds of others in the West, where we have every facility but the machinery for manufacturing whatever the country may require with its increasing wealth and population. The lazy water-fall should be set to work and forges and manufactories called into being, in those productive regions, which would give employment to thousands and create a home market whose capacity for the consumption of the products of the soil would keep pace with the growth of our country forever. If we adopt this policy and build up American interests and protect American industry the people will be prosperous and happy and our country will be powerful and independent.

POLICY OF THE ADMINISTRATION.

SPEECH OF HON. HENRY GRIDER, OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 2, 1864,

In the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GRIDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask the consideration of the committee a short time to such remarks as I may offer at present, though desultory, strictly I hope with a patriotic heart, "loyal at once to the country, the Constitution, and the truth." As the Bible is the great moral light of the Christian world, to shine upon the pathway to heaven, so the Constitution of the United States, ordained by our disinterested and patriotic fathers, is the sun that must guide our action, in this fearful crisis, to conquest, to peace, and prosperity. No other pathway can be devised by an American patriot or statesman. The Constitution has assumed great variety of meaning and interpretation with politicians, once regarded an instrument plain, conservative, and of easy application. And there is just such a variety of Union men—some intense radical Union men, even more patriotic, perfect, and pure than the Constitution itself, or than the good and great men who made it; disavowing its provisions, and stimulated to forget the solemnities by which we are bound to obey it. This is our misfortune in times like these. Nothing but dereliction of duty, want of moral obligation, produced this rebellion in the South, and is now proceeding to revolution in the North. Unity of construction and interpretation of this sacred instrument, so long consecrated to a well-defined and prudently restrained action of our Government, its grants and limitations, is only more important than unity of action. No change of circumstances, no necessity, no higher law, no war power, no violating the Constitution to save the nation, are founded in wisdom, morals, precedent, or law. This is the shifting of conscious weakness or guilt to shun the justice of severe reprobation.

The plain, indisputable truth is that the Constitution and the Union are now as they always have been, since good and wise men adopted them, having been ordained by the people to form a more perfect Union. The Constitution is vital, and the Union unhurt, except so far as their practical operations are obstructed by the wickedness and arms of the rebels, or perverted by the revolutionary assumptions and dangerous administration of the party in power, without the sanction of constitutional authority. The States are always members of the Union by the Constitution, with all their rights. Suppress the rebellion, and the Constitution and the laws resume their operation, the Union remains, and all our institutions are unimpaired, and only call for an Administration that does not war upon the confessed, adjudicated, cherished, constitutional rights of the States and the citizen. Sir, the Constitution is the great ligament that binds the States in Union; there is no other legal tie; destroy one and you destroy both, and the nation too. No matter how you do it, whether by rebellion and arms, or by reckless acts of revolution; one bold and lawless, the other insidious, selfish, and wicked. Mr. Webster said upon this very subject:

"The Constitution and the Union! I place them together! If they stand, they must stand together; if they fall, they must fall together!"

It is a great mistake and false assumption that Congress or any department of the Government can do everything to suit the policy of a party. Party legislation is dangerous to the liberties of the people without the strictest regard to constitutional grants and limitations, especially in a crisis like this when a frenzy has seized the party mind, and when other beacon lights, not the Constitution, are hoisted to guide our ship of State in this raging storm. I scorn your war power, I denounce your application of higher law, I deprecate your false international rule, your military necessity, or "the indispensable necessity" of the Executive "in his opinion!" These are all scape-goats to bear off your sins. They are mere floats cast upon this great flood of revolution, to bear up sinking men for a time. They are not the ark, the great ark of old, where only there is safety. The Constitution is that ark.

Sir, if you persevere, I most solemnly fear it will not only lead to bankruptcy, but, still more fearful, to disintegration. But I trust never. Let us have "one Constitution, one Government, one people," and one flag. The tenth article of the Amendments to the Constitution defines your powers:

"The powers not delegated to the United States are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Have you not countervailed these provisions, usurped authority not granted, transcended the limitations placed upon you? Do you claim to stand for authority upon the book of American Constitutions? Repeat as much as you please the cry of military necessity, or any other "refuge of lies," the Constitution is the rule of our action, and our constituents and the country have sworn to support it. I fully concur in the remarks of Judge Thomas, speaking against your confiscation bill, (now in Kentucky adjudged unconstitutional.) Said he:

"No man can desire more earnestly than I do the suppression of this rebellion and the restoration of order, unity, and peace. But there are two things I cannot, I will not do. I will not trample beneath my feet the Constitution I have sworn before God to support. I will not violate, even against the rebels, the law of nations as recognized and upheld by all civilized and Christian States."

The Executive's letter to Colonel Hodges, of Kentucky, frankly admits there was a time, since this rebellion, when the policy adopted by the Administration as to slavery and the orders conservative of slavery were constitutional. The Constitution has not been altered or amended. How then can a directly opposite policy, not conservative but destructive of slavery, be constitutional or lawful now? Can it be? As soon as it became, in the opinion of the Executive, "indispensable to the preservation of the Constitution" that he should adopt a measure "otherwise unconstitutional," that measure then became "lawful." If lawful, then constitutional. So the same measure may be both constitutional and unconstitutional, dependent only, to give it complexion, upon the opinion of our President, or the standpoint from which it is viewed. This is the logic. Where, then, do you go to know the rights of the citizen? To the Constitution? Not at all; but to such necessitous events as, in the opinion of the President, make things otherwise unconstitutional and unlawful constitutional and "lawful." So, therefore, according to this interpretation, the Constitution is as fluctuating as the events of this world, and as variable as the opinions of our President in relation to them. The question and control of slavery does not come under the grants to the Federal Government, but is reserved exclusively to the States. Still, if what is "indispensable" in the opinion of the Executive can make a measure "lawful" and constitutional, might he not form an opinion that the freedmen and contrabands ought to be cared for, and (as a bill is now pending to effect this in the South) that half the citizens' lands in Kentucky should be sold or furnish homesteads for the freedmen or contrabands which may claim to be free? That is the assumption and the argument.

Judge COLLAMER says, if we are constrained to use

"More of power, more of force, than the Constitution provides, or than is limited by the Constitution, the moment we do that, or are constrained from our supposed necessities to do it, we acknowledge before the world that our institutions are insufficiently founded. We should, therefore, particularly in a period like this, carefully consider and sacredly regard all the provisions of the Constitution. It is vain and idle in us to war against a part of our people because they have made war upon the Government, if we at the same time have to sap the foundations of the Government by stabbing through the vitals of the Constitution."

The present policy might not be so fearful if you were not so over-righteous and self-confident; if you could be persuaded or hear remonstrance; your zeal has frenzied your brain; you hate a man who says he is for being governed exclusively by the Constitution, in peace and in war, as bad as the Jews hated the Samaritans. This is all wrong. Cannot you abate your fiery zeal, take the second sober thought, and come back upon the platform and principles to which we can all subscribe; where we can act together with one heart and one mind, all in unity, and wield all the undistracted force of the Government in all its majesty and power? We stood together there once, and if you had not renounced the statesman to put on the partisan, with a view to accomplish what the Constitution interdicts, we would have been together yet. The country before this would have been relieved and in peace; but you have entered upon a crusade against the Constitution, its institution, the rights of the States and the citizen; you are making the pillars of our temple of liberty tremble, and its very corner-stones are crumbling away under your touch. You have the power. I charge all the responsibility upon you. Think! Repent of your errors to save our country, and relieve suffering millions, and make them blessed. I read you Mr. Crittenden's resolutions. We all voted for them, (the House and Senate.) The Administration was for them; the press was for them; the Army was for them. We did not hear then the partisan devotion going up from this Hall, in thanks to God, "We have got an abolition Army too." Yes, all the nation was for them:

"The existing civil war, forced upon the national Government by the disunionists, should not be waged on the part of the Government in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation or purposes of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of any of the States, free or slave, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired, and as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

This resolution has been utterly abandoned, and the whole power of the Government is applied now in the spirit of oppression, conquest, and subjugation for the purpose of overthrowing the rights and established institutions of the States, loyal slave States, but not to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union. The Government has assumed other and opposite principles; other purposes are to be accomplished than the suppression of the rebellion, purposes against the highest forms of law, in conflict with all usage, principle, or precedent. You have woefully changed. There is, in one sense, no Republican party now. That party avowed in its platform its opposition to the extension of slavery, but gave a solemn pledge that it should not be interfered with where it existed. The President reaffirmed the sentiment:

"I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in States where it exists. I believe I have no right to do so. I have no wish to do so. That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of States, and especially the rights of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend."

That declaration was right. The country believed it, relied upon it, and rallied to arms under its inspiration. How far different now. How changed. These republican principles are abandoned, and we have a fiery abolition party ignoring these principles, and fully, most radically, adopting the abolition principles of the strictest sect and of the old school, indorsing the complete nullification of the laws and constitutions of the country, State and Federal. Nobody denies that the Federal Constitution, article the fourth, section third, warrants slavery, and upon this the wisdom of the country has founded the fugitive slave law; but now the first is disregarded, and the latter is overridden and in process of repeal. This party, now tied together by place and patronage for electioneering purposes, too common with all parties, in my judgment, are for the suppression of the rebellion, but upon the condition that slavery "must be wiped out." Thus they are not what they so arrogantly announce, unconditional Union men, but conditional Union men. What will they do if they fail to wipe out slavery? Will they be for the disintegration of the Union under the old radical abolition flag so largely represented in this House? Let us hear from them.

The gentleman from Lancaster, Pennsylvania:

"This talk of restoring the Union as it was, and under the Constitution as it is, is one of the absurdities which I have heard repeated until I have become sick of it. There are many things which make such an event impossible. This Union never shall, with my consent, be restored under the Constitution as it is."

Another gentleman of the House is quoted to have said:

"In the case of the alternative being presented of the continuance of slavery or a dissolution of the Union, I am for dissolution, and I care not how quick it comes."

The abolition press, James Watson Webb:

"If the Republicans fall at the ballot-box we shall be compelled to drive back the slaveocracy with fire and sword."

Garrison:

"I have said, and I say again, that in proportion to the growth of disunion will be the growth of republicanism. The Union is a lie. The American Union is an imposture, a covenant with death and an agreement with hell. I am for its overthrow."

This feeling is revived; all belonging to this Administration of the old school, disunionist and abolitionist, drink it in like water; it is called the life of the nation, and the Constitution and Union are contemned so the abolitionists succeed.

Mr. JULIAN, of the House, says:

"Should both Congress and the courts stand in the way of the nation's life, then the red lightnings of the people's wrath consume the recreant who refuses to execute the popular will; not even the Constitution must be allowed to hold back the uplifted arm of the Government."

Such is the radical political spirit of the times, all revived by these men, in times so appalling when all is at stake; not even the Constitution must be permitted to hold back the uplifted arm of Government to save the nation's life. This is truly startling to the true, sober patriot. Is it not the essence of revolution, and needs but a blow to make it rebellion? What a fearful change! What moral dereliction! But hear from their pulpit. Read Dr. Bellows:

"It is no longer a war in defense of the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws; it is a war to be carried on no longer with the aim of reestablishing the Union and the Constitution with their old compromises. God means not to let us off with any half-way work. I am now convinced, and I consider it the most humane, the most economical, and most statesmanlike, now to take the most radical ground possible; to assume that this is a war for the subjugation or extermination of all persons who wish to maintain the slave power; a war to get rid of slavery and slaveholders, whether it is constitutional or not."

Thus you see extermination and perjury maintained in the pulpit; not one whisper of "peace on earth and good will to men." Wendell Phillips says.

"No man has a right to be surprised at this state of things. It is just what the abolitionist and disunionist have attempted to bring about. There is merit in the Republican party; it is the first sectional party ever organized in this country. It does not know its own face, but calls itself national; but it is not national; it is sectional. The Republican party is a party of the North pledged against the South."

So you see from the stand-point of politics, the press, and the pulpit, at a glance where we stand, the prospect and condition of the country. Whatever you may call those in power, it is easily inferred there is a settled purpose, while they would subserve their purposes in putting down the rebellion, their paramount object now is to extinguish slavery without the slightest regard to the Constitution, to the rights of States, or of loyal citizens. I quote these things, not factiously, but with mortification, feeling it my duty to my friends and my country to show the temper and tendency of the men in power. The Senate have already decided the negro shall have a vote with the white man. The House has decided all lands sold for taxes, or confiscated, shall be made by law homesteads for the negro, the South subjugated or exterminated, and their State governments held as Territories until reorganized by one tenth of the voters, and these perhaps late emigrants and free negroes. This is the policy.

Mr. Chairman, can you not see in all this why there is such an aversion on their part to conciliation, to any mention or hearing of one syllable about peace, no matter how it comes or where it may originate? Sir, I am for peace, an honorable peace any time to stop this war. War is always a curse; and a peace consistent with the integrity of the Union, the operation of the Constitution and laws of the land in all their force every where upon American soil and under our Federal jurisdiction, is just what was the object of the war; and peace upon these terms would thrill with joy every philanthropic and patriotic heart, and bow the nation in thanksgiving and praise around the throne of God. Why this coyness about peace? Do you fear without war you cannot accomplish your purposes, cannot wipe out slavery if this war terminates? Must you have the war and the power of the Government both to accomplish your purpose? Suppose the war ceases, or your power ceases; then how are you to succeed? You must get clear of the Constitution, its grants, its limitations, its warranties, its compromises, or continue the war to override them, if you are determined to wipe out slavery. There is but one other way left to separate you from slavery, and that is disintegration while you have the power! And this would be consistent with your first lessons in the old school of abolition. But you have possibly considered these things, all of them. The issue you make has been prophesied. Mr. Clay said, in 1851:

"The great issue before the country is this: shall abolitionism put down the Union or shall the Union put down abolitionism? With them the rights of property are nothing; the deficiency of the powers of the General Government are nothing; the acknowledged and incontestable powers of the States are nothing; civil war, a dissolution of the Union, and the overthrow of a Government in which are concentrated the fondest hopes of the civilized world are nothing. A single idea has taken possession of their mind, and onward they pursue it, overlooking all barriers, reckless and regardless of all consequences."

Sir, what said General Jackson about the abolition power now revived and organized?

"The abolition party is a disloyal organization; its pretended love for freedom means nothing more nor less than civil war and a dissolution of the Union. Honest men of all parties should unite to expose their intentions and arrest their progress."

The measures of the Administration, so far as they mark a peculiar party, are in pursuance and in conformity to the views of the most ultra abolitionist, with some exceptions, in House and Senate; and of this party, by the wise and great just passed away, terrible denunciations have been uttered by such as knew them best. Mr. Webster said:

"Let these infernal fanatics get possession of the Government and they will treat the decisions of the Supreme Court with contempt; they will make laws to suit themselves; they will lay violent hands on all that disagree with them; they will bankrupt the country and finally deluge it in blood."

Much of all this evil has resulted from changing the policy and purpose of the war, or adding to the original purpose of the war. Our policy ought never to have changed; the necessity for it was a fiction, and worse. It has protracted the great evil, increased the flood-tide of blood being poured out on the battle-field, and disheartened the gallant and brave that did and would again volunteer at the first tap of the drum. Had the Crittenden resolutions been pursued, we should have no conscription, no arming of slaves, no onerous taxes, no dread of bankruptcy. These are the fruits of your policy and your change. The dread evil is still lingering on and is to be pressed till the full consummation, and the last negro that survives the camp, the field, and starvation, is to be free and brought to the polls. This is to be done in the South and in all border States that do not become demoralized and relinquish their constitutional rights. The emancipation of slaves in the District of Columbia, without the consent of their owners or a vote from the people, fixing your own value on them without their concurrence, and paying for them out of the Treasury, with large incidental expenses for contrabands, was your beginning. The confiscation bill aimed at slavery; the additional article of war passed, so as to make it a high offense for an officer of the Army to return a runaway slave, and refusing to make it a like offense to entice away a slave. This law was against all Federal and State authority; nullifies the statutes of Kentucky and the fugitive slave law. The acts of the Legislature of Kentucky (see Revised Statutes, page 634) provide against the abduction of slaves, or by any means seducing them or removing them from their owners, or exciting them to insurrection, and punishes these offenses with (upon conviction) imprisonment. If the State was left to the exercise of its civil jurisdiction it would not so outrage all right; but martial law and military enforcement overwhelm State authority. Your conscript bill and its amendments enlisting slaves as soldiers, and a series of successive like unconstitutional acts, for which you are responsible and the country will hold you to an account, all aim at the extinguishment of slavery; and, in fact, well known in point of expense, delay, and other embarrassments, calculated to encourage and excite the South, injure and mortify the truly well-trying loyal border States, and retard the attainment of peace, if not finally defeat the suppression of the rebellion, except at the cost of blood and treasure fearful indeed, and unequalled in the annals of time. In Kentucky (see article seven, title Militia)—

"The militia of this Commonwealth shall consist of all free, able-bodied male persons (negroes, mulattoes, and Indians excepted) resident in the same, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years."

These are the militia of Kentucky, and in the eighth section of the Federal Constitution, in regard to organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia employed in the service of the United States, it is expressly reserved to the States "the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia," &c., both of which constitutional rights were denied under the conscript bill, as I understand it. Article second of Amendments to Federal Constitution provides:

"A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed."

Here is a guarantee to the State to regulate and arm her militia; to the people, citizens, residents of the States, not slaves, not non-residents. Who does not know that the laws of Kentucky prohibit and have a right to prohibit slaves from carrying or bearing arms? Is there nothing in State laws, nothing in usage, nothing in precedent, nothing in acquiescence? From the foundation of the Government, when and where were slaves enrolled as the militia of the country?

Sir, I raise the question, and I insist that as the State has the only power to say who shall constitute her militia, and has excluded negroes, although the Federal Government is entitled to the quota from States drawn from her militia, yet she cannot say who the militia are. Very much depends upon the enrollment by the State, the usage of the State, and the meaning of the terms used at the time the constitutions were ordained, both Federal and State. When they were formed, does any one conceive or pretend that slaves were meant and included under the term militia? They looked to the enrollment in the Adjutant General's office to find out who the militia were. They found no negroes there. This was the meaning and application then, its true meaning and application now. I do not deny they can be used by the Army as property, but I deny they can be used as militia. None but citizens can constitute militia. Slaves are not citizens. Must we not know what militia means and where they are recorded? I know they are persons, but this is no argument; so foreigners are persons, but they are not citizens. Females are persons and citizens, but they are not enrolled and constitute no part of the militia. The Federal Government can "raise and support armies," "provide and maintain a navy," but this is a general power granted and incident to the existence of all governments; but our Government, knowing that the main defense of the nation depends upon her citizen soldiers, her militia, has provided explicitly for the very crisis upon us, and other clauses but come in aid of this great power and sacred trust. Section eight, fourteenth specific grant:

"Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

This is what we are supposed to be doing; this is what we first did; and under this clause of the Constitution, in my judgment, it requires a radically false interpretation to embrace slaves. It never was intended or meant by the framers of our constitutions; and the intent of the authors of the instruments, especially in a doubtful case, is always the best manifestation of their meaning. Take this, however, altogether, and it seems to me there is no doubt. This, too, is sufficiently shown from our history, that after our Government has existed almost a century, had three wars, foreign wars, no new enrollments have been ordered, no new militia fiat has been pronounced, no slaves enlisted. Heretofore those taken in the Army as laborers and servants, when lost by the casualties of war, have been paid for by the Government as property. This distinction has always obtained and would now remain undisturbed, if the men in power had not decreed in their hearts "slavery must be wiped out," no matter what are the suggestions of usage, history, and the provisions of the Constitution. But if you put the slave in ditch, or camp, or fort as a laborer or waiter, and you put him in the field as a soldier, how is it by the one case he is made free, in the other he is not? This freedom, of course, is all of grace; but where is the rule to distinguish by authority or constitutional law? I know of none. It is not the want of negro soldiers that has produced this boldest strike at slavery. No, it will do the Army more harm than good; it will diminish rather than increase it of reliable troops; but the present policy has decided upon it, I suppose upon Mr. JULIAN's policy. He says:

"Cases may arise in which patriotism itself may demand that we trample on the most vital principles of the Constitution, and this has been done already by the present Administration under the exigencies of the war."

This is honest, but abominable.

This sentiment is fearfully, but I fear hopelessly, rebuked by Judge COLLAMER, even in the Senate:

"I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate, unless I am compelled to do so at some stage of this business, by making any remarks about the Constitution of the United States. I think it is a subject almost of derision here; with many gentlemen it is a subject of derision. As it is so in a great measure, and a man is sneered at for mentioning the Constitution, and if he has a decent respect for it and for his own oath he is called a timid man, (or, as we say in the West, tender-footed,) not rough-shod, and ready to trample even the Constitution under his feet."

Again, Mr. TRUMBULL:

"Sir, it is of a piece with a declaration that I have heard sometimes in this Chamber, and have always regretted when I heard it, and that was that it mattered not whether a thing was constitutional or not. Sir, this Government cannot be saved, constitutional liberty cannot be saved, unless we save it under the Constitution. We are fighting for liberty, regulated by law, for constitutional liberty."

Your enlisting and drafting the slave is against law, and a crying injustice to him. Your bounty and pay to the owner is a mockery to a gentleman and kind friend of the slave. You depreciate the property, fix yourself a pitiful and niggardly price, so depreciated without his consent or concurrence, and hypocritically and falsely assume you have paid, or offered to pay, for the slave as property. No such thing. It is like a man who wants my house and lot in town. He first comes and burns down my improvements, and then drives me off the premises by force, and afterwards promises to pay me, and boasts of his kindness and generosity. Is this the liberty we are fighting for? No! no! we are fighting for liberty regulated by law, for constitutional liberty. The Constitution and laws of the land warrant slavery; this no one denies; but it so shocks the piety of these holy Puritans I will quote an explanation for them. This is about the truth upon this subject:

"Religiously considered, slavery is not to be regarded as a divine institution, like the sacrament of the Lord's supper or the marriage covenant, but as a providential condition of society, recognized and regulated by the Holy Scriptures, and as such to be tolerated by Christian people where it exists by law, always acting in strict conformity to the inspired precept concerning it. This is according to the course pursued by Christ and His apostles, and this is the view given by every standard commentator on the Bible. Slavery politically considered is an institution of our country which each State has a perfect right to tolerate or repudiate at pleasure. Any interference in the matter on the part of one State or section of the country toward another is a breach of covenant between the parties which every Christian patriot and citizen should deplore and rebuke. If the principles contained in these two propositions had been duly regarded, who believes this nation would now be involved in such a terrible conflict?"

If the abolitionist and secessionist had both regarded these propositions, how peaceful, prosperous, and happy would our country now be! But it is said slavery was the cause of the war. This is not philosophic nor true. A want of religious principle and political integrity was the cause of the war, and although the unrestrained passions may have been excited by the agitation of slavery, slavery was not the cause; the agitation was; and if there had not existed this cause of agitation, some other cause would, especially amidst sectional and foolish jealousies, mingled with bad feeling, envy, and malice. Nothing can override these passions, so injurious, but self-respect, high, unselfish, moral principle, and the restraints of the law and the Constitution; and these must be enforced by good and loyal men, both against the rebels and the abolitionists, and the Government thus preserved in all its glory and majesty.

The border States have been peculiarly exposed and embarrassed, injured and insulted by invasions and raids by the rebels. Adhering to the Constitution, the laws, and the flag of our country, the border States had a right to look for the respect and protection of their legal and constitutional privileges; they did not dream that to suppress the rebellion the rights of the loyal would be assailed, or that the Constitution was so feeble that its supremacy must be upheld only by a violation of its own provisions. Such, however, has been the policy to which they have been subjected by the Government since the purpose has been fixed to extinguish slavery, in not only the disloyal but loyal States. If it has not been done

Policy of the Administration—Mr. Grider.

HO. OF REPS.

outright, it has been done, and is doing, indirectly. Mr. Webster again:

"I have often, Mr. President, expressed the opinion that over slavery as it exists in the States this Government has no control whatever. It is entirely and exclusively a State concern. And while it is thus clear that Congress has no direct power over the subject, it is our duty to take care that the authority of this Government is not brought to bear upon it by any indirect interference whatever."

In view of that, what do you think of your policy, your recent policy, your indirect, repeated interferences? The baggage wagons of the Federal Army have traveled the pikes and roads in Kentucky filled with slaves received or seduced into the Army line, and under the new article of war and military ascendancy the owner was peremptorily refused his property; property belonging to men, women, and children. This was indirect interference, indirect emancipation, and by the laws of Kentucky a felony. Mr. Fillmore, I believe, ordered out the Army to enforce the fugitive slave law; but now the whole Army is encouraged to resist its execution, and some of them do it most effectively. And while this is the state of the case it is true, as the President says:

"All the members of Congress swear their support to the whole Constitution, to this provision as much as any other. To the proposition, then, that slaves whose cases come within the terms of this clause shall be delivered up, their oaths are unanimous. And should any one in any case be content that his oath should be unkept?"

Go unkept! Why, sir, it is one of the purposes of Congress to violate if they can, and repeal the fugitive slave law. Go unkept! Have not the officers of the Army retained by force servants from their masters? Have they been dismissed, even reprimanded? Not one of them; but others, that choose not to subserve the purposes of military interference with slavery, have been peremptorily discharged without charge or notice or trial.

I hope there will soon be some just consideration of this great subject and great danger. Sir, when the great battles of the war are fought, our arms successful, and you take the subjugated South as your Territories, to be reorganized into free States by men sworn to support the proclamation, by emigrants, many of them foreign, and free negroes; when raids, guerrillas, and drilled bands are everywhere in the country, upon hill and dale, mountain and valley, spoiling you of your substance, resisting your authority, then you will have trouble to control your Army by that time mostly, (according to your policy,) emigrants, foreigners, and slaves. You had better now teach the Army some lessons of order, that private property is to be held inviolate, unless, in fact, you intend literally a war of extermination. You will have millions of contrabands on your hands not operatives; you will but be able, after the ravages of war, to furnish subsistence to favored citizens, the speculator, the covetous, and the Army; and your contrabands taken from comfort and home, will be permitted in their abandoned nakedness to starve. You are going in your policy upon a big scale, a wholesale dealer. How is it now in its incipency? Let us hear from the Boston Recorder, a religious journal:

"We are indignant at this shameless northern cupidity with its long, sharp shears always open, ready to clip the fleece of black and white alike, so that it can fill its own sack with the proceeds."

Again:

"The plan adopted in the Southwest to work the plantations with hired freedmen needs overhauling. The blacks have no liberty to select their own place of labor; they are compelled to work on the estates where they are at the rate of seven dollars a month, and half of this in kind at the price fixed by their employers. This is only the semblance of freedom, and this remuneration most meager, less than the fourth of a dollar a day, and only half of that in cash. This is enriching the new race of northern planters at an altogether disproportionate rate. We hear of large fortunes accumulating in the hands of many of our people who are overseeing these plantations, and are expected to be back again in a year or two like nabobs returning from the Indies."

Same paper:

"It will require the utmost vigilance on the part of this (the freedmen's) and all other associations for the relief of freedmen in the coming summer and fall to save them from the certain destruction that awaits them from the heartless cupidity of money-gathering adventurers and traders. The Mississippi valley is swarming with these unprincipled men."

These good shepherds (not of Israel) have gone down there, taken possession of the pastures, property, and country from their original owners, to guard the sheep, especially the black sheep, from the wolf. All the promptings of abolition philanthropy! Why do not these shepherds let the wolf (the master) have the sheep? Simply because they want to rob the sheep of his wool and eat him themselves.

You are by force pressing your party purposes, distracting society, pouring oil upon fire, fixing up the African in our midst for starvation, misery, demoralization, and extinction; and then proposing the iniquity by an amendment to the Constitution. I shall consent to no such legislation. My constituents look to no such scheme. Kentucky, although submitting to the slave draft, desires no such hasty and rash action forced upon her. She has answered as a State; she has answered by districts. If she would, she could not emancipate in less than six or seven years. She has all the constitutional power, but she does not move. No, sir; this is not the time. Let us put down the rebellion, or otherwise get peace, become calm, restored to amity; and if ever done, when it is done let it be done "decently and in order," as the Constitution was adopted, by statesmen and patriots, not as partisans and zealots; done in the fear of God, invoking His favor. Sir, whenever done by the commanding voice of the constitutional majority of the United States, with a view to the good of the whole country, Kentucky will never be found recreant to her duty, her fame, or her loyalty. But she will ask it to be done right, right to her citizens, right to her slaves, before ever she consents to its ratification, or to surrender the trust committed to her hands by the providence of God. Her slaves must be indemnified, cared for better than they are now, have food and raiment, and such advancement as they need and are competent to receive, not permitted to go back into barbarism; and if removed, given all the advantages of arts, science, and literature they are competent to receive, and especially, as they have now, the everlasting gospel of God, bearing upon its messages of love the golden gates of a holy religion, always open, inviting them to enter through to the great temple of eternal rest.

Mr. Chairman, "this is a dark and gloomy day, big with the fate of Caesar and of Rome." I am not in despair, but I am gloomy even amidst the recent victories of our arms under our indomitable leader. For we must survey and be appalled at the dread necessities of this terrible strife. But when I remember the high-noon of our prosperity, when I think of the illimitable domain of our country in all its exuberance, when I take my stand-point upon our mountain heights, and view our valleys and hills, infinite in resources and infinite in production, when I think of our commerce with every people upon every sea, and our great rivers and lakes; when I calculate the millions of our increasing population, enlightened, prosperous, full of energy, every one happy (aside from the war) from the humblest place to the highest official; when I tell you this is the land of our fathers, a land consecrated by their blood to religious liberty and constitutional freedom; why should I even in this crisis despair? I will not despair. I may be despondent, but I will hope and trust. But who can but be uneasy when we hear the partisan utterance in this Hall, as I have said, devoutly thanking God, "We have an abolition Army too?" When we see partisan zeal in the House invoking partisan power in the Army; when we have six or eight cases of contested elections brought before the House in all their perplexities and uncertainties, predicated upon the allegations of military interference with the freedom of the citizen, the right of suffrage at the polls; this, the highest and dearest right of an American citizen, underlying the base of our political fabric—symbolized more than all other rights by the banner of the country floating free! free! gloriously free, in the breeze!

Military interference was not charged in the third congressional district; it was discouraged. I know, by some of the military and politicians; the majorities at the last and preceding election show it; being about the same, not quite so large as the last time for the successful candidate. Certainly there ought to be none, for every man should bow with deference to the legal, loyal, undisturbed votes of the sovereign people, ascertained by law through the judges and civil authorities appointed by our courts. No molestation by any military array at the ballot-box. I speak of general principles and not of particular cases. I trust military interference in this regard is over forever in this country. It ought to prostrate any party or policy that would permit it; its tendency is fatal and ruinous. How would it be in our coming elections, pregnant with results so fearfully important and of infinite consequences to this country and the whole people? Let elections be left to the civil authorities to judge, govern, and determine by the laws, officers, and agencies of the States. Let not the specter of military tyrants haunt the sanctuary of an American freeman in the exercise of his highest privilege and most patriotic duty. When this shall obtain, then not only may we be in gloom, but the dark cloud of utter hopelessness and despair settles over the land, and the goddess of liberty, elevated over this temple, dedicated to constitutional freedom, with wailings and tears of deepest anguish, yields to the fell spoiler of military despotism. Why, sir, last week, not in the House, military despotism was boldly advocated by Wendell Phillips; the reconstruction of the rebel States upon the basis of the loyal blacks, the country to be kept in Territories twenty years, and the Government to be trusted with a military despotism. There is not only a fearful war, but fearful revolution of settled usages and principles of the Government in progress. May God avert them from utter ruin.

But I may touch most briefly some few other subjects. Passing over the momentous questions of arrest without warrant, martial law, and denying the right to the writ of habeas corpus where the civil authorities can execute the law, I beg leave to suggest a few things, more recently revived upon the public mind, settled, as I suppose, in the first article to the Amendments of the Constitution, and the usages of this Government: Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; and these two rest upon the same principle. Whoever objects to either is retrograding in principle and policy. The right to exercise these privileges is consistent with our very nature and endowments, consistent with the assumption that we are rational, capable of self-government; that we have the capacity to discriminate between truth and falsehood, between good and evil, and have transferred none of our high rights and privileges to others, but may write, read, and determine upon all subjects for ourselves, both as it regards men, morals, principle, and policy. It is too late to question this right or interfere with its exercise. The most arrogant tyrants ought to blush to assail it. It is a long-settled principle. Kent's lecture, 24:

"It has become a constitutional principle in this country that every citizen may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments upon all subjects, and that no law can rightfully be passed to restrain or abridge the freedom of the press."

Blackstone, 152:

"Every freeman has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public. To forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press."

None but tyrants desire its suppression or destruction, and none others try it. Speech and reason are the very characteristics of man; deny him the right of free speech and you take from him one of the prerogatives that God and the Constitution have both given him. It was upon these great principles unfettered, and the honesty and intelligence of the people, Mr. Clay announced, "Truth is omnipotent and public justice certain." Free speech, a free press, and free suffrage! When these constitutional rights are overwhelmed and gone our liberties are gone too, and we are all slaves. The right of free speech must, for the sake of its efficiency, be subject to liberal parliamentary not party order. Kent, page 17:

"The liberal communications of sentiment and entire freedom of discussion in respect to the character and conduct of public men and of candidates for public favor, is deemed essential to the judicious exercise of the right of suffrage and that control over their rulers which resides in the people of the United States."

Sir, this tendency to arbitrary dominion prevails everywhere; it has entered the sanctuaries and temples of religion; and men have been sent forth "breathing threatenings" to reorganize the ministry as well as States. Ministers have been deposed from their pulpits, (not Rev. Mr. Bellows, whom I have quoted,) and others installed, according to the papers, over their congregations without the consent of the minister or the congregation. True, ministers are not to speak evil of the rulers of their people; they are to be subject to the powers that be, like other citizens. These things are done without a hearing, and with less courtesy than Agrippa bestowed upon Paul, for Paul was permitted to speak for himself and be heard. I do not deny you can operate upon the disloyal traitors, their aiders and abettors anywhere; but not upon all, nor any, without any reason; upon mere suspicion or report, without notice or trial. Nor do I contend the pulpit is the appropriate place for political and partisan edification. Still it is perfectly safe if its labors are devoted to abolition or even disunion. I will be excused to quote once more upon this subject, showing the sacredness of this right. Free speech is only dangerous to arbitrary power. Mr. Webster said:

"It is the ancient and undoubted prerogative of this people to canvass public measures and the merits of public men. It is a home-bred right, a fireside privilege. It hath ever been enjoyed in every house, cottage, and cabin in the nation. It is not to be drawn into controversy. It is as undoubted as breathing the air or walking on the earth. Belonging to private life as a right, it belongs to public life as a duty, and it is the last duty which those whose representative I am shall find me to abandon. Aiming at all times to be courteous and temperate in its use, except when the right itself is questioned, I shall place myself on the extreme boundary of my right and bid defiance to any arm that would move me from my ground! This high constitutional privilege I shall defend and exercise within this House and in all places; in times of peace and at all times. Living I shall assert it; and should I leave no other inheritance to my children, by the blessing of God I will leave them the inheritance of free principles and the example of a manly, independent, and constitutional defense of them."

I have voted to sustain these principles; I have voted against the expulsion of members for the exercise of this right in the expression of their opinions. Why not expel them, I am asked; you expelled two members last Congress? Because these gentlemen exercise the common privilege of a high constitutional right; those had themselves quit Congress, and had actually and in fact joined the rebels. These exercise a constitutional right. Those were confessedly guilty of actual treason. This is the difference, this is the case; nor did I stop to inquire whether I agreed or disagreed with their opinions nor trace up their antecedents, who they had voted for, or with whom they had cooperated. These things have nothing to do with my duty in this House. Last Congress and this I have voted with gentlemen, or gentlemen have voted with me, to enforce the laws, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion, and see if I could resist that avalanche of ruin that is rushing furiously from the heights of party and power to bury in its pathway the best earthly hopes of humanity, and stay it if I could by theegis of constitutional law. Sir, if the country does not understand me, my constituents do. My fidelity to them shall reciprocate their confiding generosity to me. I stand upon the platforms of our State Legislature, upon the avowed principles of the Democratic Union party of Kentucky and the district convention—adopting these—that honored me with their nomination and their votes.

Mr. Chairman, the third congressional district of Kentucky has seven border counties, patriotic, enlightened, and brave. They have been overrun, imprisoned, and robbed all over the district by rebels. Have had our own Army, too, in our midst more than once, joyfully and thankfully relieved from the rebels by them; but mortified and injured by the illegal and unjust conduct of some of our troops, recklessly using subsistence and quartermaster's stores, without giving any or sufficient vouchers, seducing servants of patriotic, loyal men to leave, or retaining them in camp, to carry them off against the remonstrance of their owners. Yes, sir, according to the statement of my colleague, literally "robbing American citizens of their property"—doing it under the stars and stripes, the emblem of our majesty and glory, and the badge of our honor and justice! Guerrillas, too, have plundered the stores of money and goods, burned, consumed, and carried off their stock and subsistence. Families found wandering from home, hunting from the hand of neighbor or friend, the bread to save from imminent want. But they still cling in their hearts to the flag of their country, their soldiers in the field, the Constitution and the Union. They felt that God and the flag was their refuge and strong tower; at the first call of the country, the gallant men of this border district had grappled their muskets and their sabers to defend their homes and firesides. Ordered South, leaving home, wife, children, and friends exposed, many have died in the camp, and fallen gallantly and gloriously in the field. These noble men, Kentuckians, with their compeers in arms, have held up and sustained the honor of our country and glory of our flag all victories—at Vicksburg, Fort Donelson, at Shiloh, and Stone River, Chickamauga, Perryville, Mill Springs, everywhere!

Kentucky, this district, has paid her taxes amid her desolated fields and farms, and despoiled of her substance; has furnished her quota, recruited at first under the reign of the rebels, without murmur or complaint in this distracted struggle, and still stands committed to the Constitution and the Union against all aggression from the rebels or abolitionist either, knowing they must survive together "one and indivisible." Yet, strange as it is true, the Representatives of Kentucky and others have, with a becoming and respectful zeal and fidelity, now three sessions, been asking for a law at this House by which the citizen can be paid for what they have actually furnished the Army, and have utterly failed so far. Sir, this refusal by delay, under the circumstances, amounts to repudiation. I will not rest under this charge of injustice and dishonesty before the country and my constituents. I appeal to the record, the votes, bills, and the speeches there. I charge it upon the majority of this House, upon the abolition rule that prevails here. There rests the injustice; there rests the responsibility.

What shall I say in conclusion? Who will show us any good? What shall the future bring forth? Truly, everything seems in peril! Truly, this is a time to try the competency and wisdom of the people, and I repeat what I have said before: no change of times can change our duty touching fundamental, unchanging principles. A bad Administration will test our deliberation and coolness in looking upon radical errors and yet keeping ourselves in the right; waiting in suffering and wrong for redress by the results of future constitutional agencies, let us keep in the right, not be misled, neither favoring the rebels nor the abolitionists, nor run into faction or nullification; but stand like men, firm from principle, by the Government and the institutions of our fathers. The Government is a constitutional Government, and belongs to those who ordained it, the people! There is no prerogative higher than the Constitution gives belonging to any. Let the people at the polls, in solemn and determined duty, change the administration of public affairs, bring them in subordination to the elementary rules of the Government, and, with confidence and hope, renew our pledges under God to our Government, its Constitution and laws. And in patience and perseverance struggle by all lawful and honorable means to preserve it amidst all the assumptions and distractions with which we are surrounded. And may God help us and the great end be fully and speedily accomplished!

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

SPEECH OF HON. E. WHEELER,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 14, 1864,

On the joint resolution (S. No. 16) proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to present an amendment to the resolution, which I shall offer at the proper time.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Add to the resolution the following:

Provided, That this article shall not apply to the States of Kentucky, Missouri, Delaware, and Maryland until after the expiration of ten years from the time the same shall be ratified.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I regard this as the most important question that has come before this Congress, and desire to discuss it without regard to party feelings or prejudices, looking at the present condition of the country, looking to the future of this country, to what I believe to be the general good of the nation, and that only.

I have voted during this session to reject this resolution for the reason that I wished an opportunity to offer and have discussed the proviso I have offered exempting the border slave States from the operation of this constitutional amendment till they should have time to gradually abolish slavery themselves. I have now come to the determination to vote for the resolution, even if the proviso is not adopted. I hope the proviso will be carefully considered and calmly discussed and adopted as a part of this resolution. I shall give as briefly as possible the reasons why this proviso should form a part of the resolution, as well as some of the reasons which have induced me to support this resolution.

Most of those on the other side of this House who have discussed this measure, as well as some other important measures before this House, have spent a large portion of their time in denouncing their political opponents, charging them in general terms with sympathy with the rebellion, and alleging that the Democrats without exception are doing everything in their power to embarrass the Government in the prosecution of this war; in fact, broadly insinuating or directly charging that the leaders of the Democratic party are traitors to their Government, or that they are designedly aiding, encouraging, and sympathizing with the rebels, and are thus guilty of treason. I respectfully submit that this is not the proper way to unite the North and all parties in the North in support of the constitutional authorities in putting down rebellion. Such style of speech may increase the bitterness of party feeling, may, if believed, create strong prejudice in the minds of the unthinking against the Democratic party, may increase the vote of some particular party organization, but does not tend to induce men to cheerfully bear the burdens necessary to the support of war, does not incline men to risk their lives in battle, or to voluntarily contribute their means to reinforce our Army or to relieve its suffering heroes, especially when men see that, however much they may sacrifice, unless they abandon their party preferences and unite with the party claiming all the patriotism they are liable to such abuse, liable to be charged with treason and all other abominable crimes.

Again, some going still further, say they do not wish the support of the Democrats in Congress, that the country is able to get along without such support, and seem to prefer that every one should act on the dictates of a party spirit instead of according to the dictates of his own conscience and judgment. And this same class denounce as treasonable every opinion that does not coincide with the doctrines now promulgated by their own party, and hint that the expression of such opinions should be prevented by force. Again, I suggest, that such a course is not dictated by patriotism, but simply by a fierce party spirit. It does not tend to draw to the support of the Government that large class who do not belong to the party in power, and which has heretofore so nobly sustained the Government in this time of its greatest trial, but it tends directly to stir up party strife; tends, as far as it has any influence, to drive into opposition to the Government men who but for such abuse would cordially sustain it; and tends directly to produce civil war, mobs, and riots. The Government now needs the moral and material support of all parties. True patriotism would dictate at this time a moderate, prudent, and conciliatory course on the part of those in power toward political opponents. A large class of men believe they can sustain the Government and help prosecute the war effectually without joining the Republican party. They may not believe it necessary to declare martial law in the North where the civil law can be enforced, nor to restrict free speech, nor abridge any of the rights of the citizen. They may be able to see ample power under the Constitution to prosecute this war without violating any of its provisions or violating existing laws. They may claim the right to express their opinions in regard to the measures or policy of the Administration, and although such measures or policy may not in their judgment be for the good of the country, still they have sustained, and will sustain, the Government against a common enemy at every cost and under all circumstances.

It must be admitted that there are many of the Democratic party in this House whose speeches have tended, if they were not so designed directly, to inflame party feeling and destroy the confidence of the people in our Government, especially when they assert, as some have done, that this war, and all the misery and suffering and horror attending upon it, were brought upon the country by a trick of the Administration. The extremes of the two parties here have sometimes seemed like the opposing parties in a street row, one howling at the other "Copperhead!" "Traitor!" and the other shouting back "Abolitionist!" "Fanatic!"

This Administration may be accountable for prolonging the war in consequence of not appreciating in the first place the magnitude of the rebellion, and in consequence of not prosecuting the war with vigor, but is not chargeable with being the cause of the war. The war was commenced by the South without justification; they had not been oppressed or deprived of any constitutional rights, nor was there any good ground to fear any oppression or injustice toward the South on the part of the Government which would justify revolution.

Then the cause of the war was the commencement of hostilities by the South. It is true that the leaders of the rebellion could never have brought the majority of the southern people to war against the Union except for the animosity and hatred existing among the masses of the South against the people of the North. It is also true that such hatred and animosity never would have existed but for the intolerant zeal of New England abolitionists against slavery, and attempts to interfere with that institution in a manner not authorized by the fundamental law of the nation.

In discussing this proposed amendment there are but two prominent and important questions to be disposed of. First, whether we have the constitutional power to make the amendment; and second, whether, conceding the power, it is expedient at this time to do it.

As to the constitutional power there can hardly be a doubt. When the States ratified the Constitution they assented to all its provisions, the power to amend in the mode therein pointed out among the rest. They gave their consent in advance to any amendment which should thereafter be adopted according to the provisions of the instrument. And when such amendments are adopted by three fourths of the States, the remaining States are as much bound by the instrument as amended as though they had voted for such amendments, and as much bound by it as they were by the original instrument.

Neither can it be said with any justice that this is not a proper subject of amendment. It is a subject contained, recognized, and provided for in the Constitution, and if not a proper subject for amendment or prohibition by amendment, it is not a proper subject for the original instrument. The recognition of slavery by the Constitution was undoubtedly the result of a compromise, and was consented to by the framers thereof from the fear that it would not be adopted without such recognition, and that the Republic, without a constitution, would be broken up and the nation destroyed, and with the confident hope and expectation that slavery would in some way and in a comparatively short time be abolished. Has not the time now arrived to realize that hope?

If the southern people had remained faithful to the Constitution, no considerable body or party would have advocated an amendment of the Constitution so as to prohibit slavery. That doctrine of the Democratic party, that however much any individual in his private judgment might be opposed to the institution of slavery, and although he might believe it was a curse morally and physically to the country in which it existed, still that under the compromises of the Constitution it was a matter to be regulated by the States themselves—this doctrine would have been the prevailing sentiment of a very large majority of the northern people of both parties; and if the South had faithfully sustained these compromises no influential party of the North would ever have been found to advocate this amendment, but the conservative men of all parties would have united to sustain the Constitution unchanged, and have left it to each southern State to retain or get rid of what any one might think to be an evil in its own way.

But the South have not done this. They have, without any just cause and with the most flimsy excuse, by their State Legislatures or conventions, passed ordinances of secession from the Government. Long before the commencement of actual hostilities they armed their partisans, and by force in some places prevented an expression of popular will against secession or compelled an expression in favor of it. They seized nearly all the principal forts, arsenals, arms, munitions, and property of the Government of every kind within their reach. They seized vessels of the Government or of citizens that could be of use to them. During the time all this was going on, and for a long time prior to this, traitors in high official positions were plotting to destroy the Government which their oaths of office bound them to defend and protect. They were placing the Army and the Navy beyond the reach of the Government, so that not a single effort could be made to sustain the laws by force or defend the Government or its property. All the materials of war were placed within the reach of rebels. If at this time the Executive of our nation, at the first symptoms of treason and rebellion, had promptly and energetically used the power of the Government to sustain the law, if instead of the senseless cry of no power to coerce a State the Executive had enforced the law, had coerced the traitors as Jackson would have coerced them, the rebellion would have been nipped in the bud, and all the horror, misery, and suffering of this most terrible civil war would have been avoided. Instead of this the rebellion culminated in the commencement of actual hostilities, the attempt by armed rebels to seize the capital and destroy the Government. All this they have done with the avowed purpose of protecting and extending the institution of slavery.

And now it is no more than even-handed justice that their crime should result in the destruction of this very institution they sought to perpetuate and extend. They are entitled to no sympathy from any party of the North. After their commencement of civil war; after the commission of such crimes, the greatest known in the history of the world, no one can be bound now to regard with tenderness their interests, feelings, or prejudices. No party can with justice now be asked to refrain from discussing the justice, the policy, and the economy of their peculiar institution. No party can now be required to refrain from an effort to amend the fundamental law of the nation, so as to make it conform to the original intention of its framers; so as to conform without exception to the great principle of universal liberty and the self-government of man. If ever the term manifest destiny could be applied to any event or condition, it can now be to the abolition of slavery. The sentiment of the whole civilized world is against it. The rebels by resorting to force to break down our Government gave to it a death-blow from which it can never recover until the world again relapses into barbarism. The necessary consequence of this war, with the immense loss of life and the suffering brought home to almost every fireside, has been to arouse, to extend, to deepen, and intensify the hatred of the northern people toward slavery, which if not the cause was made the excuse by the South for commencing the war, which feeling will continue and increase with the masses until this blot upon republican institutions is forever wiped away. If the North does not fail in sustaining the Government and destroying the rebellion (and I believe in the vocabulary of this nation there is no such word as fail) slavery must be almost wholly destroyed as the necessary result of this war.

It may also be true that a large portion of the other property of the South will also be destroyed, but this is one of the necessary results of the crime of rebellion, in which, to a great extent, the comparatively innocent must suffer with the guilty. And after any of the southern States are brought within the power of the Government in reviving their suspended State governments and placing them again in harmony with the national laws, this same hatred of slavery will induce the reckless and visionary, who are too apt to have a controlling influence in times like these, to adopt every subterfuge, every theory of State suicide, of reduction of States to Territories, of consolidation, of the violation of the reserved rights of States, and any wild and visionary doctrine which will enable them in Congress to control the subject of slavery; however much such doctrines carried into practice will tend to subvert the well-settled principles of our Government, however much they may violate the plainest provisions of our Constitution; these violations of the Constitution in behalf of emancipation, these practical usurpations of the rights of States by the national authority for the purpose of preventing the reestablishing of slavery, will not end there; they will form precedents for any party in power in accomplishing other objects, and the loose construction or the open violation of the plainest provisions of the Constitution will become the rule instead of the exception.

Under such circumstances, in this condition of things it is the duty of every man, of every party, to aid in so changing our Constitution as to end forever this cause of agitation, so as to take from the radicals all motives and excuses for the violation of and breaking up the foundations of our Government, which in their frantic efforts to hasten the emancipation of the black race there is now danger of their doing. While we are not now restrained by any implied obligations or any claims upon our forbearance or sympathy, let us aid in so establishing our national charter as to do away with all cause of war hereafter. Let us do legally what is sure otherwise to be done illegally, and which if accomplished in any other way than in the constitutional manner, might result in disaster, might cause other usurpations of the rights of States, thus causing conflicts between other States and the nation, and perhaps end in civil war among the northern States.

But while we are trying to accomplish this great object let us not do injustice to any part of the Union. The border slave States have remained true to the Government. A majority of their people, sufficiently large to control their State governments, have faithfully, earnestly, and effectively helped to sustain the Government in its greatest trial and its greatest peril. We are not called upon to punish in any way the people of those States. Let us do nothing which will look like making a crusade directly against them. If they are slaveholders they are not rebels. Let us reflect that if those States had gone into the rebellion; if the majority of their patriotic citizens had not stood by the Government when their peculiar situation would seem to have drawn them into opposition; if their love of the Union had not been stronger than their interest and sympathy with their slaveholding brethren of the South, how much more equal the struggle would have been, and how much more uncertainty there would have been in the issue!

For these reasons let us do some justice to them, and pay some regard to their feelings, and not by this amendment hastily and rudely break up the condition of society and labor there; but rather by exempting them for a certain period from the operation of the article proposed by this amendment give them time to gradually make the change, and to accomplish this change in their own manner.

It is objected by those who oppose this amendment that it raises distinctly the issue of the abolition of slavery in this war, and shuts the door to any compromise or reconciliation; that it commits us to the policy of prosecuting the war until the rebels are conquered, or until a final separation takes place. In my opinion that issue is already practically before us. We have got to conquer the southern armies or submit to the destruction of our Government. A mere separation will not end the difficulty. We shall be subject to a renewal of war, to a further secession of States now in the Union, until we come to anarchy and subjugation by foreign Powers. The rebels have never shown any disposition to a compromise, but on the contrary have repelled all efforts of their northern friends in that direction with scorn and contempt. Under such a state of feeling it is idle to talk of conciliation. When the armies of the rebels are broken and dispersed, when the power of the Government is established in the States which have attempted to secede, it will then, and not before, be time to talk of conciliation.

I do not believe the adoption of this amendment would prolong the war one day. If I could believe there was any possibility of the South submitting, disbanding their armies, and again acting under our Constitution as it is, there could be no question as to the policy of the Government in allowing them to do so; there could be no sound policy or humanity in carrying on this terrible war and fighting merely for the destruction of slavery. But there is no prospect of this. The rebels are determined to fight to the bitter end. The North cannot do otherwise than fight to maintain the integrity of the nation; they cannot end the controversy except by conquering the southern armies, by conquering the whole southern country, (not exterminating the people.) And when this is done slavery is destroyed. It is impossible to return to slavery slaves once actually freed by military operations. And the more stubborn and prolonged the resistance the more complete the destruction of the institution.

This, then, is the kind of abolition I would favor. Amend the Constitution so as to prohibit slavery, and give Congress power to carry that prohibition into effect. As the States that have pretended to secede have voluntarily relinquished the protection which the Constitution gave to their peculiar institution, do not attempt to force that protection upon them against their will. But at the same time give the loyal slave States time to abolish slavery in their own way, with such regulations and restrictions as their Legislatures shall choose.

It is of course idle to speculate as to the future condition of the southern States. I think I can see that at no distant period they are to be brought into subjection to the Government against which they have rebelled. In accomplishing this end undoubtedly the character of the population there is to be materially changed, not that the southern people are to be exterminated. But the emigration from the North and from Europe, which will surely follow the return of peace, and the substitution of free for slave labor, will change entirely the character of the majority of the people that will have the controlling influence in those States. Enterprise, industry, and economy will develop the immense natural resources of the country; and when this is done we can scarcely conceive the advance that will be made in those States in wealth, population, and material prosperity, and we have no reason to doubt that equal advances will be made in intelligence and morality.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

SPEECH OF HON. G. DAVIS,
OF KENTUCKY,IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 6, 1864.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes—

MR. DAVIS said:

MR. PRESIDENT: I intend to say something of the condition of the Treasury and the state of the finances in connection with this bill, and I would have been gratified if the chairman of the Committee on Finance had himself thought proper to have given us such an exposition. Particularly what was the aggregate amount of the appropriations at the last session of Congress, of expenditures of the year for every service up to the present time, and their estimated amount for this quarter; and what amount of deficiencies of former appropriations have already been voted, and what additional amount will be needed to be voted during the present session; what total amount of money will be necessary for the next year's services; what has been the product of the existing internal revenue and tariff laws; and what the bill under consideration, and the tariff bill passed a few days since by the House, are estimated to yield; what is the amount of the recognized public debt, and what portion of it bears interest, and the rates of interest; and what that large unrecognized and unascertained debt, consisting of claims of every description in favor of the States, of the citizens, of foreign Governments, and foreign subjects, may approximate.

All these are matters of great public concern upon which the Secretary of the Treasury and the chairman of the Finance Committee should give to Congress and the country all their information.

Mr. President, those in office and power have been practicing altogether too much reserve and secretiveness in the operations of the Government and the Army. In our affairs with foreign Governments this reserve is eminently proper in many matters, and in relation to most unsettled questions; and also as to military plans and enterprises before their denouement. But in our country the people are the true and only masters, the Government and the governors are theirs, and it is for their good that they were created and are permitted to continue and to operate. The governors have legitimately no separate interests from them, nor can they properly or safely have any State or even army secrets which their masters, the sovereign people, have not the right always to know, by calls through their Senators and Representatives. The extent to which the Army authorities have gone, during the past twelve months and more, in sequestering news, information of important events, and punishing men for their publication, has been absurd, illegal, oppressive, and cruel; and itself should receive condign punishment. The pretext that important information would thereby be imparted to the enemy is not only false but ridiculous. During the whole war the enemy has showed himself to be generally well and fully informed concerning the strength and movements of our armies and his own, the result of battles, great and small, the number of killed, wounded, and prisoners, of both sides, and new movements and operations; and he would be presumed to have and he has usually shown himself to be in possession of pretty accurate information; and yet about all these matters our authorities have been vexatiously throwing a great deal of concealment and mystery, and mostly bravely assaulting and stopping a few obnoxious newspaper presses, and imprisoning their editors and correspondents for telling a great deal less about them than what the enemy knew.

The object is not to withhold knowledge from the enemy; the authors of the system well know that could not be done; but while reverses are fresh and startling to prevent them in their full and naked truth from reaching our own people, and having their natural effect in producing discontent for the blundering management of their affairs, and a purpose to change their rulers. And when they are at length tardily given by our own authorities they are generally neither full nor reliable—less so than as given by the enemy. The people have a right to be informed by those whom they intrust with office how they transact their business, and it is only they who are incompetent to be charged with it, or who have sinister purposes, that endeavor systematically to withhold that knowledge; and this is a wrong and an outrage to which they should never submit.

I propose to state now some general facts as to the present amount of the public debt and the condition of the Treasury, and what will be their probable condition at the end of the next fiscal year, the 30th of June, 1865; and I get almost all these facts from the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury. In his annual report, dated 10th December, 1863, he represents that the public debt on 1st July, 1862, amounted to $508,526,499; and from that date to 30th June, 1863, the end of that fiscal year, its increase was $390,266,682, making an aggregate of $1,098,793,181. In the same report he estimates the addition to the public debt during the present fiscal year, closing the 30th June instant, at $535,356,861; making a grand total of $1,634,150,042.

But, Mr. President, on the 13th of May last the Secretary published a synopsis of the public debt up to that date, a copy of which I have before me, in which he exhibits its various classes, and an aggregate of $1,726,248,441; and yet it does not comprehend items that amount to many hundreds of millions of dollars. At the close of every fiscal year there are outstanding appropriations and balances that have not been called for in consequence of those appropriations never being squarely worked up to in the course of the public service. Each fiscal year terminates 30th of June, and each regular session of Congress begins the first Monday of December, and during every session appropriations are voted for every branch of the public service, to the end of the fiscal year, according to estimates furnished from the Department to which they appertain. These estimates are to some extent conjectural, and they are almost always understated and fall short of the actual expenditures, the Department for the excess operating upon credit. Early in each session the Secretary of the Treasury submits to Congress his statement of the actual receipts into the Treasury from all sources, and the actual expenditures up to that time, so far as he can be informed of them; and also estimates of the probable receipts and expenditures both of the residue of the current and the whole of the next fiscal year. In every annual estimate he sets forth the total of the appropriations made that will be uncalled for at the close of the fiscal year, and deducts it from the aggregate estimated amount of the expenditure of the year, although that amount thus deducted has been actually appropriated by laws of Congress, and exists as a portion of the public debt, for the payment of which provision in fact has thus been made. The amount of uncalled-for appropriations, estimated to remain at the end of each fiscal year, is a part of and adds an equivalent amount to the public debt at that date.

Mr. Chase estimated these uncalled-for appropriations to be on the 1st of July, 1863, $200,000,000; 1st July, 1864, $350,000,000; the 1st July, 1865, $400,000,000; so that to his amount of public debt, as stated for the end of the fiscal year, the 30th June instant, must be added $350,000,000, as uncalled-for appropriations. The Secretary deducts that amount, when he should have included it in the aggregate of Treasury liabilities. Another portion of the public debt not included by the Secretary are the deficiencies in previous appropriations, or the excess of the expenditures over the sums voted, or for which no provision had been made, being an aggregate of $105,000,000 already voted at this session.

Since the Secretary sent to Congress his last annual estimates more than a half million of white soldiers and fifty thousand negro soldiers have been recruited, and the aggregate of bounties paid and due to them exceeds $150,000,000. One hundred thousand hundred-day men have also been called into the service, and the cost of their equipment, subsistence, transportation, pay, &c., within the present fiscal year, will exceed $50,000,000.

The Secretary has advertised for a loan of $75,000,000, the interest to be in gold and silver, the proposals to be received within the fiscal year, which will add that much more to the public debt. His report of date 14th May shows that the amount of interest on portions of the public debt, payable in gold and silver, to be $49,472,714, to purchase which with greenbacks would require more than $90,000,000; and to that sum must be added twenty-three millions and a fraction for interest payable in currency.

Other debts and appropriations, not included in my computation, I will set down at $100,000,000, though they will probably amount to two or three times that sum. Thus the public debt, 1st July next, will stand:

Amount stated by the Secretary, 14th May.....	$1,730,870,926
Uncalled-for appropriations, 1st July.....	350,000,000
Deficiencies in former appropriations.....	105,000,000
Bounties.....	150,000,000
Cost of the hundred days' men.....	50,000,000
Amount of advertised loan.....	75,000,000

All other debts and appropriations.....	100,000,000

Internal Revenue—Mr. Davis.

SENATE.

foreign nations and their subjects, $2,000,000,000, and it makes an aggregate of public debt of $4,600,870,928. This vast, astounding public debt has been created within the past four years, while the debt of Great Britain, which the people of the United States have heretofore contemplated with amazement and revulsion; is $3,914,037,634, and has been aggregating for nearly two centuries. In 1856 her total of property was $33,402,720,000, is now more than $35,000,000,000, while that of all the United States, in 1860, was $16,159,616,063. It is thus seen that our public debt on the 1st of July next will be upwards of twenty-eight per cent., or more than one fourth of the aggregate property of the whole people of all the United States in 1860; and that of England is less than nine per cent., and less than one eighth part of the aggregate of her property. The ravages of war have greatly reduced the productiveness and value of our property; and one of its great classes, 3,953,587 slaves, worth more than $1,800,000,000, has been rendered worthless by the unjust and unconstitutional measures of the President and Congress. It may be safely assumed that our public debt to-day amounts to one third of the present value of all the property of the United States. When the war terminates, and the country returns, as it must return, to a gold and silver circulation, and that becomes the measure of the value of all property and all production, how greatly will those values shrink toward the amount of the public debt, and how proportionably onerous will it become to the people of the United States!

The Secretary of the Treasury has been able to keep the great machine, the Government, running for some time, by issuing an average daily irredeemable paper currency of over $2,500,000. Let us examine how he will get through the next fiscal year, and what will be the probable increase of the public debt at its close. It has been said by Senators who know, that there are now in the military service over 1,000,000 men, and that 700,000 have been put in the field since 17th October last. It was a generally received fact at the beginning of this war that the whole cost of our armies, including everything except ordnance and fortifications, could be proximately ascertained by allowing $1,000 per head per annum for the whole number, and that it was in truth something above that rate. That cost has since been materially augmented by increased pay and by the enhanced price in a depreciated currency of all military supplies, transportation, &c. The Secretary's estimates of demands for the next year are, estimated balance of former appropriations, unexpended, $350,000,000; for the civil service, $27,973,194; for pensions and Indians, $9,631,304; for the War Department, $536,204,127; for the Navy Department, $142,618,785; for interest on the public debt, $85,387,677, making an aggregate of $1,151,815,083; but as usual he is largely under the true mark. The greatness of his under-estimate will be undeniable and striking when it is considered that the estimates were made about the 1st of December last, and in the interim the pay of the soldiers has been increased, one hundred thousand hundred days' men have been accepted by the President from the Governors of several of the States, and more than fifty thousand negro soldiers, in addition to over five hundred thousand white troops, have been mustered into the service. The amount of the Army appropriation bill for the next year, that has already passed the Senate, foots up $518,725,716, and having gone back to the House it will probably be increased to $520,000,000; and another military appropriation bill of $25,000,000 for the hundred days' men has passed.

The Secretary's estimate for the military service of next year has even now been transcended more than $9,000,000. If we estimate for the heavy increased expenditures in that branch, and remember that the deficiencies voted for it at the present session amount to near $100,000,000, and that the present strength of the Army is over 1,000,000 men, costing an average of more than $1,000 per head, and that his under-estimate for this year is $741,092,037, the Army expenditures for the next year cannot be fairly estimated at less than $800,000,000. It will be above that mark by many millions. The Secretary's estimate of $6,129,042 for Indian affairs and pensions will prove greatly inadequate. The number of our killed and wounded on every battle-field since the beginning of the year is unquestionably above 100,000, and before its close will swell to 150,000. We will have the largest and most costly pension roll that the sun ever looked down upon. I would advance that item of the Secretary's estimates to $30,000,000, with the certainty of a largely progressing and mournful increase. He also deducts $400,000,000 as the estimated amount of appropriations that will not have been called for at the end of the fiscal year, 30th June, 1865. The Secretary's item of $85,387,677 for interest on the public debt also must be advanced. In his exposure of 14th May, he states the amount of interest upon the public debt payable in legal currency to be more than $20,000,000, and that payable in coin to be $49,472,714, which will be increased about $4,000,000 for interest on his advertised loan of $75,000,000. He will have to borrow other large sums and pay the interest in the same medium, as he can get money only on that condition. I will then set down $150,000,000 in greenbacks for the payment of interest on the public debt the ensuing year, and that amount will prove insufficient. The requirements for the whole service will be as follows:

For the War Department.....	$800,000,000
For the Navy, Secretary's estimate.....	142,618,785
For civil service, Secretary's estimate.....	27,973,194
For pensions and Indian department.....	30,000,000
Interest on public debt.....	150,000,000
For deficiencies.....	100,000,000
	$1,250,591,979

The Secretary's total estimate for the next year's service is $1,151,815,083; mine is $1,250,591,979. He includes $350,000,000 of appropriations that he had in his previous estimates assumed to be uncalled for at the end of this fiscal year; I excluded it, because I have already computed it as a part of the public debt. He states the amount for the next year's service for which it will be necessary to provide by loans to be $544,978,548, which will be that much added to the public debt; but he deducts $400,000,000 for uncalled appropriations. This sum will not only exist in the form of unsatisfied demands against the United States, but will actually be voted by laws of Congress to be paid out of the Treasury, and therefore show the public debt to be that much more.

According to the principle laid down by the Secretary, that half the expenditures of each year should be raised by taxation and other resources, and the other half could be safely borrowed, $625,295,999 have to be raised by each of those modes, and $1,250,591,978 by both of them for the next year's service. Let us examine how nearly all the sources of our revenue are likely to realize this required amount. The customs on the importation of goods, the internal taxes, sales of public lands, and some few miscellaneous sources constitute the streams of our national revenue. In all times of heavy public disbursements the uniform infirmity of the Treasury estimates is to overstate the anticipated receipts and to understate the expenditures; and under this Administration this infirmity has increased proportionably with the enormous demands upon the Treasury. The last branch of this proposition I have already established. The Secretary's estimate of receipts from internal revenue for the year ending 30th June, 1863, was $85,456,303, but the amount received was only $37,640,787. His estimate from the same source for the present year was $150,000,000, but in his annual report he informs us that the actual receipts for the first quarter ending 30th September, 1863, were $17,599,713. I have seen no statement of the produce of either of the succeeding quarters; but at the same rate the total for the year would be $70,398,852, less than one half of the amount estimated by the Secretary. But suppose it to be true, as it probably is, that the first was the least productive of all the quarters, in the absence of all information, it would be liberal to allow for the whole year $100,000,000. This would show that notwithstanding the Secretary's experience of the workings of the internal revenue system, for one year he had overestimated its fruits $50,000,000, or that when he had expected three dollars from it he had received only two.

But these estimates of the Secretary were made 1st of December last, and the supplies are about to be enlarged by the passage of the bill under consideration, and of a new tariff bill; in both of which there will be some addition to the subjects, and considerable increase in the rates of taxation. There will certainly be a large augmentation in the produce of both bills over that of the existing laws, but what will be the proximate amount of either, and particularly of the internal revenue law, will hardly admit of conjecture. But guided by the lights of experience a limit may be reasonably assumed for both, which they will not transcend, at least for some years.

It must not be forgotten that the business and consumption of the people are the life-giving forces of our revenue system; and that business and consumption is always measured and limited by prosperity and ability to purchase. The continuance of the war, though it may individually, and even locally, by the large production of war supplies, stimulate these elements of a teeming Treasury, will greatly weaken and reduce them generally. The inevitable consequence will be a largely diminishing business and consumption and receding revenue. The supplies are to be derived largely from heavy imposts upon the consumption of spirits and tobacco, in all their forms; and also upon many other articles of luxury. The extravagance, bad habits and vices of the people form the corner-stone of our financial edifice, and their general and radical reform would overthrow it irretrievably. The use of spirits and tobacco wastes more of health and morals than even pecuniary means. They could fall into almost total disuse with various and immense advantage to their devotees; and the confidence expressed by some that the enormous taxes about to be imposed upon them will not materially reduce their consumption will turn out to be a great delusion. How facile and effective too could party opposition be made by combinations both for total abstinence and restricted use.

"Man wants but little here below, Nor wants that little long."

Under our almost universally burdensome and grinding taxes the truth embodied in this couplet we will see verified in our country as we have never seen before. Limited resources, inability to purchase, inexorable necessity will compel an economy with the great body of our people to which they have heretofore been strangers, and that will tell with power on the Treasury of the United States. Experience will prove that the increased rates of the new revenue laws will be essentially neutralized by restricted consumption. In the light of these considerations, and of the facts that the produce of the existing tariff law was for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1863, $69,059,642, and for the first quarter of the present year was $22,562,018, and the Secretary's estimate for the remaining three quarters are $50,000,000, the maximum of revenue from the new tariff bill for the next year may be assumed to be $100,000,000. And the receipts of internal revenue having been during the last year $37,640,787, and their actual and estimated receipts for the year that expires with this month being $100,000,000, the produce under the new bill cannot reasonably be estimated for the next year as large as $200,000,000. But I will concede even that high figure, and the resources of the Treasury will be:

From internal revenue.....	$200,000,000
From customs.....	100,000,000
From lands, estimated by the Secretary.....	1,000,000
From miscellaneous sources, do.....	5,000,000
Balance in Treasury, 1st July, 1864, do.....	5,836,539
Total of receipts for 1865.....	$311,836,539
Total of liabilities, do.....	1,250,591,979
Excess of liabilities over receipts.....	$938,755,440

Amount of receipts for the year required by Secretary.....	$625,295,999
Receipts less than Secretary's requisition.....	313,459,450
Amount added to public debt, 1st July, 1865.....	938,755,440

the United States in favor of the States, of tens of thousands of loyal people of the rebel as well as the faithful States, of foreign Governments, and of multitudes of their subjects. I have conjectured their aggregate amount now to be at least $2,000,000,000; but it will go on increasing so long as the war continues, and by 1st July, 1865, it may be confidently assumed to exceed that sum. The whole debt of the United States will then, beyond reasonable doubt, be more than $5,000,000,000; and the prospect is the most bloody and expensive civil war that the world has ever known will still be raging. This enormous national debt has not only been growing from year to year, but the rate of its increase has augmented with each year, always beyond the estimates of the Secretary, and, like a mountain snow-ball, it is rolling on, its ponderous and ever-growing bulk compounding its capacity for further aggregation. The immediate termination of the war would greatly limit but would not wholly arrest its continuous increase.

The people of this country are still sovereign. They have supinely suffered their agents and servants to seize upon powers that belong only to themselves, but their unalienable sovereign power is liable any day to be resumed by them with resistless energy. They can say to the tax-imposing power of their Government, "Thus far shalt thou come, but no further;" and when they so speak they must be obeyed. There is a limit both to their capacity and will to pay taxes, and the aggregate of $300,000,000 annually will approximate both limits; certain I feel that $400,000,000 would reach if it did not transcend them. This latter sum would exceed the aggregate of the taxes of Great Britain; if levied in gold and silver it neither could nor would be paid by the people of the United States. If the war were to cease on the 1st of July, all the political and social elements of our country have been so widely and profoundly agitated that it would take years for them to become composed and for law and order to resume their empire throughout the whole land. A large military force, both land and naval, would have to be maintained for years. Their cost for the first year of peace might be some $400,000,000, the second year it might be reduced to $300,000,000, the third to $200,000,000, and the fourth to $100,000,000, but never below that sum. In the mean time all the other expenditures of the Government, including the payment of the interest on the public debt and pensions, would require annually $200,000,000. Years of peace would restore the country, increase its population, develop its vast natural resources, and augment its wealth and the capacity of the people to pay taxes. If the war would now stop it is within the range of possibility that by long, long years, ages of peace, and of the severest toil and economy on the part of the people, their contribution in taxes to their utmost ability might meet the interest, and at some remote period extinguish the principal of our huge public debt; but the continuance of the war will produce such an augmentation of it that all efforts to master it will sink powerless and crushed beneath its weight. The people may not repudiate it, but they will not pay it, for the simple and sufficient reason that they did not pay the Continental money of the Revolution: it was not possible.

When the muse of history indites the story of this war, the world will read with amazement that it could have been averted by the Republican members of the two Houses of Congress, or a majority of them and of their party, accepting the terms embodied in these resolutions offered in the Senate by one of my illustrious predecessors, Mr. Crittenden, in January, 1861:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following articles be, and are hereby, proposed and submitted as amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of said Constitution, when ratified by conventions of three fourths of the several States.

"ART. 1. In all the territory of the United States now held or hereafter acquired, situate north of 35° 33', slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, is prohibited while such territory shall remain under territorial government. In all the territory now held, or hereafter acquired, south of said line of latitude, slavery of the African race is hereby recognized as existing, and shall not be interfered with by Congress, but shall be protected as property by all the departments of the territorial government during its continuance; and when any Territory, north or south of said line, within such boundaries as Congress may prescribe, shall contain the population requisite for a member of Congress according to the then Federal ratio of representation of the people of the United States, it shall, if its form of government be republican, be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; with or without slavery, as the constitution of such new State may provide.

"ART. 2. Congress shall have no power to abolish slavery in places under its exclusive jurisdiction, and situate within the limits of States that permit the holding of slaves.

"ART. 3. Congress shall have no power to abolish slavery within the District of Columbia, so long as it exists in the adjoining States of Virginia and Maryland, or either, nor without the consent of the inhabitants, nor without just compensation first made to such owners of slaves as do not consent to such abolishment. Nor shall Congress at any time prohibit officers of the Federal Government or members of Congress, whose duties require them to be in said District, from bringing with them their slaves and holding them as such during the time their duties may require them to remain there, and afterwards taking them from the District.

"ART. 4. Congress shall have no power to prohibit or hinder the transportation of slaves from one State to another, or to a Territory in which slaves are by law permitted to be held, whether that transportation be by land, navigable rivers, or by the sea.

"ART. 5. That in addition to the provisions of the third paragraph of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States, Congress shall have power to provide by law, and it shall be its duty so to provide, that the United States shall pay to the owner who shall apply for it the full value of his fugitive slave in all cases when the marshal, or other officer whose duty it was to arrest said fugitive, was prevented from so doing by violence or intimidation, or when, after arrest, said fugitive was rescued by force and the owner thereby prevented and obstructed in the pursuit of his remedy for the recovery of his fugitive slave under the said clause of the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof. And in all such cases, when the United States shall pay for such fugitive, they shall have the power to reimburse themselves by imposing and collecting a tax on the county or city in which said violence, intimidation, or rescue was committed, equal in amount to the sum paid by them, with the addition of interest and the cost of collection; and the said county or city, after it has paid said amount to the United States, may, for its indemnity, sue and recover from the wrong-doer, or rescuers, by whom the owner was prevented from the recovery of his fugitive slave, in like manner as the owner himself might have sued and recovered.

"ART. 6. No future amendment of the Constitution shall affect the five preceding articles, nor the third paragraph of the second section of the first article of the Constitution, nor the third paragraph of the second section of the fourth article of said Constitution; and no amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress any power to abolish or interfere with slavery in any of the States by whose laws it is or may be allowed or permitted.

"ART. 7. SEC. 1. The elective franchise and the right to hold office, whether Federal, State, territorial, or municipal, shall not be exercised by persons who are, in whole or in part, of the African race."

The most of the principles embodied in this series of resolutions were provided for by the letter of the Constitution, all of them by its spirit; and it was their only office to express in clear language what was intended by the members of the Convention who framed the Constitution to be, and what by its fair construction is in it, except the surrender by the slave States of the right of their people to take their slave property into the territory of the United States north of 36° 30', outside of all the States, and to have compensation for their fugitive slaves. These propositions were known at the time to have been acceptable to all the slave States except South Carolina, and received the active and earnest support of most of them. She could have made no war by herself, and would have been held so quiet and paralyzed in the firm and powerful grip of the Federal Government, sustained by all the other States, that this one wayward sister would soon have returned subdued, if not penitent, to the family circle.

But you, Mr. President, [Mr. CLARK.] and Senators Anthony, Baker, Bingham, Cameron, Chandler, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson, opposed and defeated that peace offering. The struggling sunbeams gleamed through the southern clouds of rebellion, and upon the mists of the northern hemisphere painted a faint and transient bow of peace, which was soon swallowed up by the heavy black clouds of abolitionism that had been so long mustering to make relentless war upon slavery and slave-owners. Its fierce leaders had long waged that war in every other mode, and they felt a savage joy at the portents of an early and bloody shock of arms between the imbibed sections, in which they had made up their minds that the slavery of the negro should be destroyed, though the Union, the best Government ever formed by man, and all the great hopes of the white race perished with it.

Before the rebellion broke out, one of the modes suggested by General Scott for averting the war was, if the concessions which the southern people asked could not be granted, to let the wayward sisters go in peace. It was also one of his maxims, that if a military end could be effected by the loss of five hundred men, and five hundred and one perished in its execution, one man had been murdered. The old iron duke, Wellington, had been a long and most inflexible opponent to what in Great Britain was called Catholic emancipation, or the repeal of the acts of Parliament imposing disabilities upon all the people professing that religion. When he was prime minister the agitation of this subject having reached a point that unless those disabilities were removed by the repeal of the laws imposing them, civil war was inevitable, this great, firm, but humane man thus spoke on the subject in the House of Peers: "My lords, I am one of those who have passed more of my life in war than most men, and principally I may say in civil war, too; and I must say this, that if I could, by any sacrifice whatever, avert one month of civil war in the country to which I am attached, I would sacrifice my life in order to do it." If you, sir, and your party, including that portion of your party consisting of men who profess to be ministers of the gospel of divine mercy and peace, had possessed the humane spirit of the two greatest military captains of this age, who had seen more of the miseries of war than any others living, this horrible civil war would have been avoided; and the American people would have been spared the slaughter of millions of whites, the premature deaths of hundreds of thousands of negroes, and an aggregate of woe which no power short of the recording angel can compass or register. If war is a vast drama of murder, where is the parallel in extent and horrors of that which you have brought upon your country? Whose hands are red with so many prematurely murdered? Who responsible for so many souls rushed forward all unprepared to the judgment seat of God?

At the time that the leaders of the party in power formed their final and fatal decision, that if the people of the slave States persisted in the claim of their constitutional rights, the dispute should have a bloody solution, the question mostly mooted between them was whether those people had the right to take slaves into the Territories of the United States. What was their right? Those Territories were the common property of the nation, and the people of each and all the States had equal rights and privileges in them. To govern and regulate those Territories, so as to give advantages to the interests and institutions of some of the States to the prejudice of others, would be both unjust and without competent authority. All the citizens of the United States have a constitutional right to settle in their common Territories; and by the same warrant the freedom of religious worship, of speech, of the press, the privilege of trial by jury, and the writ of habeas corpus accompany and by no authority can be severed from them. They have an equally clear and common right, springing from the same great fountain, to take with them any and all property whatever; and no congressional or territorial legislation can legitimately infringe any of those rights.

But when any portion of such territory is admitted as a State into the Union it comes in as the equal, and with all the rights and powers of the other States; and any attempt or device to strip it of a part is abortive and of no validity. The people thereof form their own government, without any limit on their power, except it is to be republican. They are possessed of all political sovereignty in subordination to the Federal Constitution. They fashion, according to their own will, their laws and institutions, and declare what shall be and what shall not be property; and make such regulations of it as they choose, within their own limits. Were they so to will, they could abolish and reestablish slavery in their State every year.

Repeal of Fugitive Slave Laws—Mr. Davis.

SENATE.

These are foundation principles, upon which our great structure of blended national and State governments, "E pluribus unum," was reared; and their disregard has produced all our past troubles, and a still raging civil war of which history records no parallel. They form the indispensable condition of our Union, liberty, peace, power, and greatness; to win back and perpetuate which, the people of the free and slave States must return to and inviolably observe those great principles. If they will not or cannot do this, if they will not or cannot preserve both liberty and Union, if one is to succumb, for me, let the Union before liberty perish a thousand times. In the language of Patrick Henry, pronounced by him in thunder-tones at the dawn of our revolutionary struggle, "Give me liberty, or give me death."

REPEAL OF FUGITIVE SLAVE LAWS.

SPEECH OF HON. G. DAVIS,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

June 23, 1864.

The Senate having under consideration the bill to repeal the fugitive slave act of 1850, and all acts and parts of acts for the rendition of fugitive slaves—

Mr. DAVIS said:

Mr. President: I shall endeavor not to abuse the courtesy of the Senate extended to me last night in continuing this subject over for debate until this morning, which I was induced to ask through my friend and colleague in consequence of indisposition, and from which indisposition I have not much recovered. I do not propose to occupy a great deal of the time of the Senate at this late stage of the session on this subject.

Mr. President, the measure under consideration proposes to repeal the fugitive slave laws that have passed Congress, one in 1793 and the other in 1850. Those laws were passed under a mandate of the Constitution. There are two provisions in it, one in relation to fugitives from justice and the other of fugitives from labor, and for the execution of which provision was made in one act passed in 1793, by the Second Congress, and approved by Washington. I will read together these provisions of the Constitution:

"1. A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

"2. No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

Every member of the Senate and of the House of Representatives takes an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. That oath cannot be kept in relation to these two clauses without legislation to give them effect. In fulfillment of its duty, the Second Congress under the Constitution passed a law to make those provisions operative.

It remained the sole law upon the subject in relation to fugitives from labor until 1850, when there was an additional and subsidiary act of Congress passed.

Now, sir, the bill that has passed the House of Representatives, and which is pending before the Senate, is a simple, unconditional repeal of so much of the law of 1793 as relates to fugitives from labor, and of the law of 1850, which relates to no other subject, without substituting any other legislation to give effect to the clause in the Constitution relative to fugitives from labor. Mr. President, I ask you, and the other members of this body, do you conceive by this course you are fulfilling your duty; that by proposing to repeal all the legislation upon that subject and not to reenact any other, you are keeping your oaths to support the Constitution of the United States? Is it not the plain and obvious obligation of that oath that all the necessary legislation by Congress that may be requisite to execute any of the powers, or make available the rights that are assured by the Constitution, shall be passed by the legislative department of the Government?

Is it not as obligatory upon Congress to execute by proper legislation the provision in relation to fugitives from labor as that which provides for fugitives from justice? Are they not alike provisions of the Constitution and of equal obligation? Can either of them be carried into operation without the necessary auxiliary legislation of Congress? Suppose there was a double proposition in this bill, as it came to us from the other House, to repeal all laws in relation to fugitives from justice, as well as those that relate to fugitives from labor: would any member of the Senate think of voting for the unconditional and absolute repeal of all those laws unless there was accompanying it a substitute measure that would perform the same office substantially? Most certainly not. What consideration would restrain all the members of this Senate from giving such a vote as that in relation to fugitives from justice? It would be the provision of the Constitution which directs the manner in which fugitives from justice when they escape into another State shall be surrendered, and which requires from Congress legislation to enable that provision of the Constitution to be executed. It is the solemn obligation of the members of the Senate to continue these laws at least in relation to fugitives from labor, or to substitute them by other laws that will in good faith and substantially execute that provision of the Constitution. Can there be a plainer proposition presented to the human mind and conscience than that it is the sworn duty of the Senate not to repeal these acts until at the same time they are prepared to and are offering to enact others in their stead?

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] has made a report to the Senate on this subject. There was a counter-report made by the minority of the committee, which was drawn by the honorable and able Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW], taking the converse view of the subject. I think the argument of the minority of the committee against the repeal of the laws without the substitution of others is unanswerable, and I think the argument in favor of the repeal by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts is one of the most inconclusive pieces of logic that it has been my fortune ever to read.

One of the first and principal propositions of the majority is this: that the provision of the Constitution in relation to persons held to service or labor does not embrace slaves. Why, sir, by its terms and their import and meaning it clearly embraces slaves, because slaves are persons who are held to labor. Labor was due from the slaves to their masters. Why? Because the law required that that labor should be rendered; and there could be no shorter or clearer argument in support of the position that the members of the Convention understood that labor was due from the slave to the master than that the clause was introduced for the express purpose of enabling the owners of slaves who might escape from one State to another to reclaim them. It was the declared object of this provision in the Convention to enable them to reclaim their fugitive slaves; indeed, that was the only purpose of that provision and of the men who embodied it in the Constitution. The idea that the framers of our Government would introduce that clause to comprehend apprentices only, and not to include slaves, is utterly absurd and against the fact. The phrase "persons held to service or labor," by the constitutions and the laws of the States, would embrace both apprentices and African slaves; but the latter are, and were intended to be, its principal subject.

But, sir, it is an end to this question simply to state that the men who framed the Constitution, every cotemporary individual that had any knowledge of the process of its formation, and of the purposes for which that provision was introduced, and the members of the Second Congress who afterwards proceeded to enforce it by the passage of the law of 1793, understood, knew, intended, and admitted this provision of the Constitution to embrace slaves. But for this object it would neither have been inserted into the Constitution nor thought of by the wise and practical men who made it.

It is objected by the Senator from Massachusetts and by other Senators that this law was unconstitutional, because it did not allow to the fugitive slave trial by jury and the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus. The law in relation to fugitives from justice is open to both of those objections. The mode by which fugitives from justice and fugitives from labor were to be reclaimed by the act of 1793 is almost parallel, and the trial by jury or the writ of habeas corpus was not given by the law to either of those classes of persons.

I will read the first two sections of the act of 1793, which relate to fugitives from justice:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the executive authority of any State in the Union, or of either of the Territories northwest or south of the river Ohio, shall demand any person as a fugitive from justice of the executive authority of any such State or Territory to which such person shall have fled, and shall moreover produce the copy of an indictment found or an affidavit made before a magistrate of any State or Territory as aforesaid, charging the person so demanded with having committed treason, felony, or other crime, certified as authentic by the Governor or chief magistrate of the State or Territory from whence the person so charged fled, it shall be the duty of the executive authority of the State or Territory to which such person shall have fled to cause him or her to be arrested and secured, and notice of the arrest to be given to the executive authority making such demand, or to the agent of such authority appointed to receive the fugitive, and to cause the fugitive to be delivered to such agent when he shall appear. But if no such agent shall appear within six months from the time of the arrest, the prisoner may be discharged. And all costs or expenses incurred in the apprehending, securing, and transmitting such fugitive to the State or Territory making such demand shall be paid by such State or Territory.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any agent, appointed as aforesaid, who shall receive the fugitive into his custody, shall be empowered to transport him or her to the State or Territory from which he or she shall have fled. And if any person or persons shall by force set at liberty or rescue the fugitive from such agent while transporting as aforesaid, the person or persons so offending shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding $500, and be imprisoned not exceeding one year."

Those are the provisions of the act of 1793 in relation to fugitives from justice. Here are two other sections providing for fugitives from labor, which I will proceed to read:

"Sec. 3. And be it also enacted, That when a person held to labor in any of the United States, or in either of the Territories on the northwest or south of the river Ohio, under the laws thereof, shall escape into any other of the said States or Territory, the person to whom such labor or service may be due, his agent or attorney, is hereby empowered to seize or arrest such fugitive from labor, and to take him or her before any judge of the circuit or district courts of the United States residing or being within the State, or before any magistrate of a county, city, or town corporate wherein such seizure or arrest shall be made, and upon proof to the satisfaction of such judge or magistrate, either by oral testimony or affidavit taken before and certified by a magistrate of any such State or Territory that the person so seized or arrested doth, under the laws of the State or Territory from which he or she fled, owe service or labor to the person claiming him or her, it shall be the duty of such judge or magistrate to give a certificate thereof to such claimant, his agent or attorney, which shall be sufficient warrant for removing the said fugitive from labor to the State or Territory from which he or she fled.

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall knowingly and willingly obstruct or hinder such claimant, his agent or attorney, in so seizing or arresting such fugitive from labor, or shall rescue such fugitive from such claimant, his agent or attorney, when so arrested pursuant to the authority herein given or declared; or shall harbor or conceal such person after notice that he or she was a fugitive from labor, as aforesaid, shall, for either of the said offenses, forfeit and pay the sum of $500; which penalty may be recovered by and for the benefit of such claimant, by action of debt, in any court proper to try the same; saving moreover to the person claiming such labor or service his right of action for or on account of the said injuries or either of them."

Mr. President, this provision in relation to fugitives from labor had its origin in the deed of cession by which the State of Virginia ceded the whole of the Northwestern Territory to the Government of the United States. The ordinance of 1787 contains substantially this provision of the Constitution in relation to fugitives from labor, and it was a stipulation in that ordinance in favor of the State of Virginia for which she paid a full, an ample and imperial consideration; and what was it? The whole of the Northwestern Territory, that now constitutes five great States, which promise to be among the most powerful and populous of the whole Union, at that time was territory of the State of Virginia. Every foot of that Territory was subject to be settled by slaveholders carrying their slaves with them, and to be made slave territory; but Virginia, the mother of States, in the exercise of an enlarged philanthropy and patriotism and political wisdom, made a voluntary cession of this magnificent domain to the Government of the United States upon the condition that it should be erected into other States, stipulating that slavery, except as a punishment for crime, should never obtain in all that vast Territory, but asking for herself, as one of the considerations upon which she made this most munificent donation, a provision similar in substance to that which was afterwards embodied in the Constitution for the benefit of all the States and the peace of the Union. In the ordinance of 1787 the effect of this provision was in favor of Virginia only, and was intended to apply to her slaves, and no other subject; and when it was incorporated into the Constitution the purpose was to perpetuate the provision, not only for her benefit, but of all the other States. Good faith with Virginia, as well as harmony among the slave and free States, required that this should be done.

Sir, if the Congress of the United States had refused to stipulate that condition when the ordinance of 1787 was made, the State of Virginia probably would never have made that ample and imperial cession of territory to the General Government. If that provision of the Constitution had not been inserted by its framers, the State of Virginia and the other slave States never would have agreed to it; the better Union would not have been formed and the worse union would not and could not have been continued. The history of the country proves this position to be true, and no man of intelligence and candor can deny it.

Why, sir, the claim was so just, so reasonable, so imperative upon the framers of the Constitution that it was adopted by that illustrious body of men without a dissenting voice. When the vote was taken whether this provision of the Constitution should be accepted as a part of that great fundamental law of the regenerated republican empire that was then about to spring into being, that was to consolidate and continue the ample dominion which was at one day to expand this continent from ocean to ocean and whose power and splendor was about to eclipse all the Powers of the world, this provision was thought so imperiously politic and necessary and obviously just to the slave States that it was accepted by the free States without a single dissenting voice.

Sir, was it accepted in good faith? The men of the North of that day, who had marched with their brethren of the South through the storms and trials of the Revolution, I have no doubt accepted it in the best faith, and if those great and good men who were then in the Convention, who were in the State conventions of the free States that adopted that Constitution, were now upon the theater of action, and were called upon to supervise this portion of their great and sacred work, there is not a single one whose pure and great soul would not be outraged by the supposition that he could be thought capable of violating it. The violation of this sacred covenant, to my mind, is one of the truest and most ignoble evidences of the degeneracy of this day that all of its vast evidences of that character afford.

Sir, that men understanding the origin and the history of this provision, knowing its nature, and that it was the indispensable condition, as so many of our judges, statesmen, and legislators have avowed from time to time, upon which alone the Constitution could have been formed and agreed to, that men who understand the history of this provision and its sacred obligation, after having sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, should recklessly walk up to the repeal of all the laws for the enforcement of this provision, without offering a substitute to carry it into effect and execution, to my mind is one of the strangest exhibitions of moral delinquency that I ever witnessed, or that could possibly be offered by degenerate men.

Sir, it is as competent, and it would be just as much within the scope of the duty and of the moral power of Congress, to repeal all the laws in relation to the reclamation of fugitives from justice as of fugitives from labor. There is a false philanthropy, a spurious humanity, a mock benevolence, a caricature upon religious sympathy, that seeks to make all those sacred principles of human action and all those ennobling principles of human character the pretext for this repeal. If men do not want to keep this covenant why do they not come up as men, men of honor and faith and patriotism, and say to the people of the slave States, who were interested in the execution of this provision of the Constitution, "It is true that in our solemn compact of Government, in our great and fundamental articles of political partnership we did agree to this stipulation, we pledged our honor, faith, and word to its observance, to its maintenance, but it is now against our reason, our conscience, our sense of religion longer to adhere to it; we therefore propose to you in peace and amity, without strife, without bloodshed or civil war, that we by mutual consent modify this fundamental law of our political partnership by striking out the provision in relation to fugitives from labor."

Such a friendly proposition as that would of course have been rejected. If that did not satisfy the party or the States making the proposition thus to abrogate it from the Constitution what ought they then to have said? As men of faith, as men of common honesty, as men disposed to observe the most solemn obligations, and especially the sacred and holy obligations connected with the execution of their fundamental law and the observation of their oaths to uphold, support, and maintain that fundamental law, they ought to have said, "Then let us part in peace; we cannot continue upon this condition of rendering up to their owners fugitive slaves longer under the Constitution and Government in which we have bound ourselves to it; it outrages our consciences, our sense of human rights; it makes us unhappy; so much so that we cannot live under the Constitution which requires us to observe such a covenant, and which guarantees property in slaves to their owners; therefore we propose to you in amity, in peace, as friends and partners who have had a common national origin, common dangers, common oppressions, common glory, common successes, a common language, a common history, a common religion, and as we had hoped were to have a common destiny throughout the future, let us amicably and without the desolation and horrors of civil war agree to a dissolution of the partnership and a final separation; you of the South with your slaves, undisturbed by us, work out your own destiny; and we of the North with our interminable, irrepressible opposition to slavery will separately take charge of ours."

Mr. President, the history of this slavery struggle on the part of the free States is one of the most dishonoring that was ever written or enacted. When the nation was first cradled all the States were slaveholding. The New England States, and Massachusetts especially, had been the first to introduce and to establish slavery. The first fugitive slave law, as I have shown heretofore by undoubted historical evidence, was enacted by Massachusetts; and there never has been enacted a pro-slavery law in any of the southern States that I have had knowledge of, and in my own State in particular, that did not have its origin, its prototype, its enactment, clause by clause, and word for word almost, in the State of Massachusetts. Sir, if that negro surgeon, the friend of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, who tried to have himself martyred in this capital of the nation, had been in the good city of Boston some one hundred years ago and had played the same insolent part there that he did in this city, under the imperative mandate of a law of Massachusetts he would have been taken to the house of correction, and would have been stripped and scourged upon his bare back; and the Senator from Massachusetts dare not deny it.

But the honorable Senator's sympathies and sense of justice and abhorrence of oppression are greatly moved, because by the act of 1793 and by the act of 1850 the fugitive slave is not allowed the right of trial by jury and the writ of habeas corpus. I read to the Senate a few moments since the provision in relation to the reclamation of fugitives from justice, and also of fugitives from labor; and the provisions in respect to both are parallel. A white man that commits a crime in one State and flies to another, under this provision of the Constitution, and the law of 1793, if he is pursued he is reclaimed, just as a fugitive slave is reclaimed. He is not allowed trial by jury in the State to which he has fled. It is to get away from that trial that he flees. These fugitives from justice that fly to other States do not fly there for justice, or for trial by jury, or to meet the responsibilities which the law has denounced against their crimes. It is to evade and escape from its responsibilities that they become exiles and refugees. But the fugitive is pursued, and by a course of proceeding similar to that for the reclamation of fugitives from labor he is seized, under the supervision and with the consent of the Governor of the State to which he has fled, and without the benefit of trial by jury, or the writ of habeas corpus, in the State to which he has fled, he is seized, and carried back without any trial to the State where he had committed his crime, and there he is to be arraigned and tried by a jury, according to the requisitions of the Constitution and the forms prescribed by law. Any attempt to intervene for his protection, for his immunity from punishment by a writ of replevin, if that could be resorted to, or by the writ of habeas corpus, the great writ of liberty, or by trial by jury, in the State to which he had fled, would be rejected; it would be treated as an abstraction to the execution of the law, and would be denied by every court.

All these grievances have existed and exist now without question in relation to white criminals from justice without ever having arrested the attention much less to have moved the philanthropic sympathies of the Senator from Massachusetts. We never heard a word of complaint from him, or any of his compeers in pseudo-negro philanthropy, in relation to such oppressions upon the white race; but he comes up making the most vociferous wailings and denunciations in favor, as he says, of the downtrodden negro. The negro is deprived of no right by this proceeding. When the negro fugitive from labor and the white fugitive from justice escape into other States, they are both pursued by summary process and brought back to the locality from whence they fled, and there detained in the one case and tried in the other as though they had not fled. Both are there entitled to and may have every right which the law give them. The reclaimed fugitive slave may sue for his freedom, have the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus and trial by jury, and every other right to secure him a fair trial.

Sir, I have seen a great many slaves parties to suits; I have seen both slaves and free negroes indicted for many kinds of offense; that is, I have seen them parties to suits for freedom, actions of trespass, and for property, and in almost all other forms in which I have seen white men parties to suits. I have often defended the rights and the causes of negroes, slaves and free, as well as prosecuted against them. I suppose that in the course of forty years' practice in various courts I have known of more than one hundred cases in which negroes, slave and free, have been parties, and I never knew of a case in which a slave or a free negro was so humble, so poor, that he could not have his own choice of his counsel. He generally selected the best lawyer who practiced at the bar, and he had the benefit of his services given with all the zeal and energy and interest which he would give them for the wealthiest man of the land able to remunerate him with the largest fee. I never have seen a negro party to any suit in court, who had a good, or a specious cause even, that did not at once and promptly enlist the interests, the sympathies, the good wishes of the entire court-house, judge, counsel, jury, bystanders, and all, except his adversary and his adversary's counsel. Sir, the idea of kidnapping a free negro in a slave State, in my State—I speak from experience, from a proud consciousness of the truth—the idea of kidnapping a free negro and reducing him to slavery, whether for the want of a fair trial, a just verdict, or the due execution of the law, would be much more difficult than it would be for a white man in a controversy with a white man to obtain any undue advantage in court. It never did occur. It is an utter impossibility.

Sir, I have heretofore spoken very extensively in relation to the property that the owners have in slaves. I am not now going into that subject at all. But here I hold in my hand the evidence of one of the long series of peculiar distinctive, humanitarian, benevolent measures of the State of Massachusetts for the negro. Such a batch of them never originated in any other country or among any other people than the descendants of the Puritans. I have already shown heretofore that she was one of the first to establish the institution of slavery. She adhered to it as long as she could make property out of slavery in any form. She continued to be engaged in the slave trade not only until it was interdicted by act of Congress but afterwards. Her own soil was too sterile and her own climate too rigorous to enable her to make slave labor profitable. After she had reached the conclusion that she could use white labor with more benefit to her industry and her wealth and growth than she could slave labor, we all know that she continued actively and industriously the slave trade, and that she continued to smuggle slaves into the southern States and into Louisiana and the lower Mississippi after the year 1803, when the prohibition forbidding the foreign slave trade had by its terms fully gone into effect. If a condition of things should ever come upon this country again when the foreign slave trade shall be reopened to the southern States, the very first and most diligent and keenest of the traffickers in a trade which the honorable Senator denounces as so very infamous will be the people of Massachusetts. Yes, sir, they will prosecute that or any other pursuit for gain. They have done it in former years without shame, without remorse, without any sense of its injustice, of its abhorrent nature. They did it until they were repressed, excluded from its further execution, not by the Constitution alone, but by the laws, by the courts, and by our cruisers against it; and it took the combined power of all to arrest the traders of Massachusetts in this nefarious traffic.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Repeal of Fugitive Slave Laws—Mr. Davis.

SENATE.

Why, sir, what has been the recent course of Massachusetts in relation to slavery? The honorable Senator has a series of measures in connection with the slave and to regulate the slave. The great object of their combined effect and of the results that are to flow from all of them is to give to his countrymen, the descendants of the Pilgrim fathers, the benefit of slaves and of slave labor in a different form only from that in the southern States. They think that the southern planters have monopolized profits of slavery about long enough, although they have indirectly all the time reaped the largest benefit from it. They have not the face or the power, I suppose, to re-introduce slavery into Massachusetts, mainly because it would not be profitable there. They have the perfect right under the Constitution as it exists to do so whenever they please; but they have made professions to the contrary so long and so vociferously that they shrink abashed from attempting it in that form; but they are trying to do it in another form upon the theater of the rebel States and to bring lucre to the sons of the Pilgrim fathers. They are trying to get possession of all the cotton, sugar, and rice lands of the South. One of their principal objects in waging this war against those people is to get possession of those lands. They do not intend to go themselves or to carry their sons to work in those cotton and sugar and rice fields; but they want to take the contrabands, to have them organized under the guise of law passed by themselves, shaped and molded by their own ingenuity to give them a color of law for depriving those who they say are free of their true liberty, forcing them to make contracts to work for them and to intervene the military power instead of the overseer and the driver to compel them to work according to their will. All this is intended to give a few of the élite of the abolitionists the monopoly of this labor, to keep out a common competition for the employment of such labor, to give them the advantage of an iniquitous system, a sort of close corporation of compulsory labor under color of law by military force, and in that form to reduce the negro again to slavery in another form and to a more oppressive slavery than that from which they have professed to deliver him.

Sir, as I said once before, I have the misfortune to own some slaves. Two of them have joined the Army. When they ceased to serve me and I ceased to be their owner no other man shall be their master if I can prevent it. No Massachusetts man, under the guise of law or an act of Congress or military power, or provost marshals supervising the judgment of courts and the administration of the law, shall ever, if I can prevent it, by the perversion of any system, reduce slaves who have been born and nurtured in my family and who have been treated with kindness and tenderness next to my own children, again to slavery in another form, that they may serve a more cruel, selfish, and exacting taskmaster than they have ever been accustomed to.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts has read in the Senate a great many letters in connection with this and other subjects. Here is one addressed to him, published in a paper, which I have never heard him read. It is short, and I will take the liberty to read it:

CAMBRIDGE, DORCHESTER COUNTY, MARYLAND,
May 7, 1864.

SIR: My feelings prompt me to address you now as a philanthropist, and more particularly as a friend to the poor, down-trodden, and oppressed negro race of our country, and to submit to you the accompanying candid statement of a proceeding toward this unfortunate race that transpired yesterday under the eyes of all the inhabitants of this town, that cannot but excite your heartfelt sympathy, and, I hope, lead to a prompt investigation into the facts as submitted.

I am, myself, a stranger on a visit here, hence I am better adapted to submit unbiased impressions.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
SAMUEL C. BARNEY.

Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, United States Senate.

Statement.

The steamboat Balloon, Captain Tilghman, arrived here on the 5th instant, bearing Lieutenant J. C. Foster with a squad of negro soldiers. The same officer, accompanied by a guard, has been in the habit of periodically visiting this locality and recruiting all slaves or free negroes and carrying them off; and, so far as they were volunteers, far as from my disposition to cavil at the proceeding. But, on the present occasion, I presume, having exhausted the volunteer system, he resorted to the expedient of scouring the county, accompanied by Thomas H. Coburn, deputy provost marshal, stationed here, and a squad of negro soldiers, and literally kidnapping about thirty negroes, (of whom a large portion were free), and wherever found, at work in the field or elsewhere. One slave, while at work in the field, refused to go, and threw himself on the ground, when his hands were bound and he forced to join them. Another free and highly respectable negro, quite independent and working his own farm, was taken in his shirt-sleeves while at work in his own cornfield, and forced to join, leaving his horses and cattle at work, and not even permitted to go to his cottage for a change or addition of clothing. This man's wife is in Baltimore, and is expected this evening—to find her home desolate.

At about five o'clock p. m. yesterday, the aforesaid prizes of some thirty free men and slaves were paraded through the town, (en route for the steamer Balloon, lying at the wharf), guarded by the squad of negro soldiers formed in a hollow square around them, and it was a barrowing sight to witness the aforesaid rebellious slave who had thrown himself on the ground, still bound, among them, and the mother of the aforesaid free negro in much distress at the wharf. Upon embarking the negroes, the steamboat left. I wish this was an exaggerated statement of the transaction, but it is confined to a recital of but two cases of the thirty carried off. It is reported that the steamboat has gone to Easton, where there is a circus to perform to-day, by which attraction it is supposed Lieutenant J. C. Foster expects to largely recruit, volens volens. The same circus is to perform here on Monday, and it is also reported that the steamboat is to return to take advantage of it. But even now there is consternation and a panic among the negroes, and as they resorted to hiding yesterday it is presumable they will be non est on the return of the steamer. There is no surmising by what if any authority on which Lieutenant J. C. Foster is acting. He is supposed to be under the jurisdiction of Colonel Bowman, headquarters Baltimore.

Should any additional circumstances occur incidental to the attraction of the circus at this place on the 9th instant I will advise you.

SAMUEL C. BARNEY.

Now, sir, I will read an extract from the Freeman's Advocate, a publication, I believe, in Boston, in the interest of the free negroes, or the "freedmen" as I believe they call them.

Mr. SUMNER. It is a publication in New York.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, it is quoted by one published in Boston, but it will speak for itself. I read from the National Intelligencer as it is there republished:

"The Freedman's Advocate, a periodical published in the interest of the emancipated slaves of the South, complains in its last number that it is made most evident, by its correspondence with the various Departments, that instances are fearfully multiplying where officers, soldiers, civilians, and speculators seem bent on this one purpose, the defrauding of the poor freedmen, women, and children out of their just wages, and leaving them to the tender mercies of the humane." It freely admits that there are honorable exceptions to this abuse of authority, but adds: "It will require the utmost vigilance on the part of this [the 'Freedmen's'] and all other associations for the relief of freedmen in the coming summer and fall to save them from the certain destruction that awaits them from the heartless cupidity of money-gathering adventurers and traders. The Mississippi valley is swarming with these unprincipled men."

"In commenting on this statement the Boston Recorder, a religious journal, expresses its concurrence with the views of the 'Advocate' in the following terms:

"We have no doubt of this. Why should it not be so, when the North itself is swarming with men who are rackling their brains almost to insanity to see how they can coin money out of the calamities and necessities of the times? Men who are so utterly selfish that they can go into the market or scour the country to get control of the most indispensable articles of food, so as to run up their prices one or two hundred per cent. simply to enrich themselves, no matter how it grinds their neighbors into the dust; men who can do this and never feel that it is the very wickedness of oppression against which the Bible hurls many of its severest threatenings; what will hinder such men from going South for the express purpose of robbing the free blacks of their dribbles of earnings? Of course these men will do it, and possibly some of them will call it a providential opening for them to provide for those of their own house' a fatter portion under the sun. We are indignant at this shameless northern cupidity, which stands with its long sharp shears always open, ready to clip the fleece of black and white alike, so that it can fill its own sack with the proceeds. It is bad enough here among ourselves; but that those just emancipated slaves should thus fall a prey to these sharpers, exchanging one misery (in their own expressive language) for another, is outrageous."

"Another view of the subject. The plan adopted in the Southwest to work the plantations with the hired freedmen needs overhauling. It is not possible to devise any system which will be wholly free from hardships, especially at the beginning of this new policy. But the present mode of carrying on the plantations is open to manifold abuses and oppressions. The blacks have no liberty to select their own place of labor. They are compelled to work on the estate where they are at the rate of seven dollars a month, and half of this in kind at the prices fixed by their employers."

Eighty-four dollars a year, half in kind, and the price of that in kind fixed by their employers!

"This is only the semblance of freedom; and this remuneration is most meager. Less than a fourth of a dollar a day, and only half of that in cash, is enriching the new race of northern planters at an altogether disproportionate rate. We hear of large fortunes accumulating in the hands of many of our people who are overseeing these plantations, and are expected to be back again in a year or two, like nabobs returning from the Indies, lined inside and out with gold, or, at any rate, greenbacks. Can we do nothing better than this one-sided thing for these recent bondmen? If not, we will not say that we had better left them alone, for liberty with nothing else is priceless. But we will say that no such skinning-alive practice will take us out from under the curse of Jehovah. 'Behold, the hire of the laborers who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth; and the cries of them which have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth.'"

"Unless the Christian sentiment of the North, and the Government, acting with this, prevents it, we have the most painful fears that we shall fasten on the necks of the freed blacks another yoke of servitude by our implacable and inveterate avarice, which will be well-nigh as galling to them as their old slavery, and which will involve us in even greater guilt, if this be possible, than that which has made the sin of the South like that of Egypt and Sodom."

Sir, these abuses are shocking to human nature, and I have never heard the loud and vehement denunciations of the Senator from Massachusetts against them, in whole or in part. But sir, I have something more which I desire to read, and then I shall come to a close.

Some time since I brought down the history of Massachusetts and of her slavery to the period of the convention which framed her constitution in 1780. She claims, and I suppose her courts have decided, that her constitution which she then framed, conjointly with the Declaration of Independence abolished slavery. Some years afterwards her courts decided that slavery in Massachusetts was abolished by her constitution, but they were not so stupid as to impute any effect in producing that effect to the Declaration of Independence; that has been a good while ago, some seventy or eighty years. The Senator from Massachusetts and the present generation of the old Bay State claim to be the peculiar and most disinterested and exalted friends of the negro race and of human freedom generally, the greatest devotees to justice and philanthropy and mercy that are now to be found upon the face of the globe. Not only that, but in the phrase so often quoted by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, "all men are equal before the law," the negro has the same rights, the same political and social equality naturally and of right that the white man has. This is their loud profession; this is their continuous declamation.

But, sir, how do their lives and conduct stand in contrast with this high-sounding and noble theoretic philanthropy and benevolence? They are opposed in fact and in practice to the whole of their professions. Neither the honorable Senator from Massachusetts nor any man within the sound of my voice, nor any white man of Caucasian descent in the United States admits the equality of the negro except in hollow and false words. On the contrary he denies it. His whole life and practice and conduct are against that profession and in direct antagonism with it.

Massachusetts now has about thirty thousand more female than male population, I believe, according to the census. I have been at her manufacturing towns; I have been at Lowell, and I have seen at noonday seven thousand well-dressed, intelligent young girls turn out from their employment for refreshment. I have looked with silent but deep interest upon the spectacle. I examined in vain for one of the negro race in the whole throng. I have been into their other manufacturing establishments in Lowell and Boston where the white male population are employed. There are very many working-men and manufacturers in Massachusetts whose intelligence and virtues and every manly characteristic prove them to be of the noblest people. I have been into their workshops. I have been on their Exchange, as it was termed, in Boston, where they meet for the purpose of comparing the prices or the demands of the market, and to talk over all that concerns their vocations and business. I have looked with interest and national pride on such a spectacle, and conversed with many of these intelligent manufacturers and workmen, receiving instruction and profit. But, sir, I looked in vain for a solitary negro among them. I found no negro partnership, no negro community and equality with them. There is a considerable number of free negroes, male and female, in Massachusetts, and has been since 1780. If her present professed interest and brotherhood and sisterhood for them, her recognition of their intellectual, moral, political, and social equality had been true and real, she has had ample time to put this theory into practice and to exhibit to the world all the beauties and ennobling results of the completest mingling of the races. But we see nothing of it. It is but a false, delusive, and sinister theory. If the Senator from Massachusetts and his pharisaic Governor had made an irruption into the Lowell manufactories with a thousand or two of young negroes from South Carolina and Virginia, and had placed them at looms side by side with the fair daughters of New England, the latter would have fled as from a pestilence. If such an experiment had been made with the white male laboring population the negroes would have been thrown overboard as the tea was in Boston harbor.

Why has not the Senator from Massachusetts been practically introducing his theories into his own society? Why has he not encouraged marriage between the races? Why has he not instituted the system of miscegenation? Why is it that the colors are generally as distinct in Massachusetts as they are anywhere in the world? I believe there is a greater proportion of amalgamation in the northern States than there is in the slave States, at least the census tables so report; but that may be because they are fugitives from the slave States. I do not pretend to account for it, but the fact is the proportion of mulattoes is greatest in the free States.

But one Senator after another gets up here and says, "You are a victim of a prejudice, a prejudice against color." Sir, I claim a proud superiority to the African race. I am a Caucasian by descent, I am a Celt by extraction, and every conclusion of my mind, and every emotion of my soul, every pulsation of my heart admonish me that I am of a superior race to them, and I intend to assert and maintain that superiority as long as I have the power. The gentleman professes the contrary, but acts upon the same principle. He is a bachelor, and has long ago reached the years of puberty; why then has he not sought one of Africa's sable daughters and led her to the altar?

When these gentlemen have a coterie of friends, or make a banquet and call their guests to it, are they promiscuously the white and black races?

No, sir, they manifest their prejudice against color, if a prejudice it be, by the inexorable and total exclusion of the black. Who of them intermarry with the black race? Who seek or permit sons-in-law or daughters from what they palaveringly call colored people? Their acceptance of equality with the negro is all a false pretense, nothing but simulation for selfish and despicable purposes. There is no principle, truth, or reality in it.

But Senators rise here and persist in asserting, "You give such a vote because of your prejudice against color." Sir, I have no prejudice against idiosyncrasy; who has not an aversion to it? Where is the man of common sense who would be willing to marry an idiot woman? I have an aversion to deformity, but no prejudice. It is an emotion, a conclusion of soul and of reason that properly exists with all persons. If there was a man deformed as Caliban, what woman of sense, of education, of proper self-respect, possessing the noble characteristics of true womanhood, would be willing to marry such a piece of deformity?

Sir, it is the same kind of feeling, of sentiment, not prejudice, but of rational and proper aversion, that impels the white race to move in other circles and establish other relations in life than with the negro. The distinctive features of the negro race are numerous. I will mention three or four of the more palpable. There is the crisp or woolly hair; the black skin, which is possessed by other races beside the negro; a peculiar and offensive effluvia emitted from their skins. Is it that that is so attractive to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts? If an anatomist or an ethnologist would go into an elaborate and scientific examination of the difference of the physical, mental, and moral organizations of the races they would find the line of separation to be broad and distinct in them all.

I have said here before that no negro people ever invented an alphabet or an arithmetical, algebraical, or any other mode of computation, or ever rose into more than a low stage of civilization; that no negro community, by its own unaided intellect and forces, ever ascended into the high domain of elevated mathematics or of classic language or of general literature. Their inventive capacity is small, and their arts have always been rude and limited. They have ever acted a subordinate part to the white race. Whenever and wherever they have attained even a moderate degree of civilization it has been under the pupillage of the white man and by slow processes. Throughout all the ages in recorded history many negroes have had such intimate relations with the most enlightened nations of the superior races as to have imbibed their arts, literature, and civilization to an extent far beyond any possessed by the great bulk of their race in their self-isolated position; but they not only did not augment this borrowed culture but in the transit of ages invariably lost it. When San Domingo, under the patronage of the infidel philanthropists of France, asserted the freedom of all her population, one third of her population were mulattoes, who, with many of her slaves, were considerably civilized, and many of them had respectable education and attainments. That people had received those advantages from the white race, and, possessed of them, commenced their career of nationality and self-government. They soon manifested their incompetence to the great duty, and perpetually recurring wars among themselves, indisposition to labor, and decaying prosperity and civilization proved how much better the condition of the island was when it was a slave possession of France. The return march of the negroes of San Domingo to the barbarism of their progenitors is unmistakable, though its consummation has been and will be further retarded by the large infusion of white population among them. But for their checking force the process of degeneration of the negroes of San Domingo would be rapid, but it will march on to its consummation.

But, sir, I shall not continue this line of remark. But just in proportion as you mingle the white with the negro race you degrade the white race; and that is one reason of the low state of national energy, intellect, and prosperity in the countries south of us that were of Spanish origin. It is because of the extensive amalgamation with the inferior races, negro and Indian. It is an immutable law of all inferior races, and of every member of them, whether pure or mixed, to desire to pull down the superior race to their own inferiority; and the operation of this law in our country is one cause of the irrational clamor for negro equality. There is in his nature, in his physical and moral and intellectual organization, in the order and nature of his creation, an insuperable barrier to his reaching the high plane that is now occupied by the civilized white man; he craves equality, and equality on that high plane being impossible to him, his constant effort is to pull down the superior race to his own inferiority; and that principle pervades and operates perpetually and actively more in the mixed inferior race than the unmixed.

But, sir, I propose now to read a few passages in relation to the more modern history of slavery and the negro in Massachusetts, and then I shall bring my remarks to a close:

"As early as 1785, her Legislature instituted an inquiry as to the measures proper to be adopted by them to discountenance and prevent any inhabitant of the Commonwealth being concerned in the slave trade."

That was the first movement that Massachusetts ever made to suppress the slave trade, so far as I am informed.

"The inquiry was also extended to the condition of the negroes then in the State, or who might thereafter come or be brought into it. (Journals: volume 5, page 222.) Bills were prepared and referred to the committee on revision of the laws, with instructions to revise all the laws respecting negroes and mulattoes, and report at a future session. (Ibid. 342.)

"In the following year, a joint order was made for a committee to report measures for preventing negroes coming into the Commonwealth from other States. (Ibid. volume 6, page 463.) Another similar order was made by the House of Representatives in 1787. (Ibid. volume 7, page 524.)"

At that time these benevolent, philanthropic, negro-loving people of Massachusetts instituted measures by legislative enactment for the purpose of preventing negroes from coming into that Commonwealth from other States. Let us see how it progressed:

"Earlier in the same year a number of African blacks petitioned the Legislature for aid to enable them to return to their native country. (Ibid. volume 7, page 281.) A Quaker petition against the slave trade was read in the Senate June 20, 1787, and not accepted, but referred to the revising committee, who were directed to report a bill upon the subject-matter of negroes in this Commonwealth at large." (Senate, volume 8, page 81; House of Representatives, volume 8, page 88.)

"The prohibition of the slave trade by Massachusetts was at last effected in 1788. A most flagrant and outrageous case of kidnapping occurred in Boston in the month of February in that year. This infamous transaction aroused the public indignation, and all classes united in urging upon the Legislature the passage of effectual laws to prevent the further prosecution of the traffic, and protect the inhabitants of the State against the repetition of similar outrages.

"The movement was successful; and on the 20th of March, 1788, the Legislature of Massachusetts passed 'An act to prevent the slave trade, and for granting relief to the families of such unhappy persons as may be kidnapped or decoyed away from this Commonwealth.'"

But, sir, mark this provision so characteristic of Massachusetts greed and love of gain and money:

"By this law it was enacted 'that no citizen of this Commonwealth, or other person residing within the same,' shall import, transport, buy, or sell any of the inhabitants of Africa as slaves or servants for term of years, on penalty of £50 for every person so imported and £200 for every vessel fitted out and employed in the traffic. All insurance made on such vessels to be void and of no effect. And to meet the case of kidnapping, when inhabitants were carried off, actions of damage might be brought by their friends—the latter giving bonds to apply the moneys recovered to the use and maintenance of the family of the injured party."

I ask attention to this proviso to this law:

"That this act do not extend to vessels which have already sailed, their owners, factors, or commanders, for and during their present voyage, or to any insurance that shall have been made previous to the passing of the same."

At that very time there were slave ships that had left Massachusetts and had gone to Africa for their cargo of living human beings. The State was passing a law forbidding the slave trade and making void all policies of insurance upon any vessel employed in that traffic; but they expressly provided that the ships that were then gone upon that traffic should not be subject to the provisions of the law prohibiting the trade and making void the policies of insurance. What sort of devotion to liberty, to benevolence and philanthropy was that? It shows how ever alive and attentive these thrifty and trading people are to interest, to pecuniary gain; and it warrants me in asserting that if events should hereafter take such a course that the slave trade from Africa should ever again be opened to any country on God's earth, the adventurous, money-loving people of Massachusetts will be the first to enter into that trade, and will share most largely and profitably of it. But to continue this reading:

"The Massachusetts act of March 26, 1788, entitled 'An act for suppressing and punishing of rogues, vagabonds, common beggars, and other idle, disorderly, and lewd persons,' contains the following very remarkable provision:"

I ask the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to this provision:

"V. *Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, (the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court assembled,) That no person being an African or negro, other than a subject of the Emperor of Morocco, or a citizen of some one of the United States (to be evidenced by a certificate from the Secretary of the State of which he shall be a citizen) shall tarry within this Commonwealth for a longer time than two months, and upon complaint made to any justice of the peace within this Commonwealth that any such person has been within the same more than two months, the said justice shall order the said person to depart out of this Commonwealth, and in case the said African or negro shall not depart as aforesaid, any justice of the peace within this Commonwealth, upon complaint and proof made that such person has continued within this Commonwealth ten days after notice given him or her to depart as aforesaid, shall commit the said person to any house of correction within the county, there to be kept to hard labor agreeable to the rules and orders of the said house, until the sessions of the peace next to be holden within and for the said county; and the master of the said house of correction is hereby required and directed to transmit an attested copy of the warrant of commitment to the said court, on the first day of their said session, and if upon trial at the said court it shall be made to appear that the said person has thus continued within the Commonwealth contrary to the tenor of this act, he or she shall be whipped not exceeding ten stripes, and ordered to depart out of this Commonwealth within ten days; and if he or she shall not so depart, the same process shall be had and punishment inflicted, and so toties quoties."*

Sir, there is the legislation of Massachusetts in 1788, this philanthropic community, this people whose sensibilities are shocked to hear the term "master" used by one man in relation to another, this people who are for universal freedom and equality of the races, social, civil, political, and amalgamation, as their most eloquent advocate, Wendell Phillips, strikes boldly for. He is the most honest abolitionist that I know of, but even he falls short in the most material point: he does not practice amalgamation by having taken a full-blooded negro wife. When he and the Senator from Massachusetts bind themselves by the silken cords of love and hymen to Africa's sable daughters, and urge their progeny on in the course of miscegenation, they may then claim to occupy the platform of negro equality. Short of that their position is one of guilty simulation. For every man of any sense, the most unlettered laborer or clod-hopper in the land knows that there cannot be any equality of races, civilly, politically, and socially, without amalgamation; the thing is impossible. Where amalgamation does not obtain, the community consisting of whites and blacks will separate into two classes and castes, and those castes will be as impassable as they are in Hindoo. They are here in some States made so by legislation, in others with perfect freedom for amalgamation, but no system of legislation to coerce and compel amalgamation would be strong and effective enough to bring it about. Sir, there is a higher law against amalgamation than man and human legislation can enact, and that is the eternal, irrevocable law of the great Author of our common being. It is written upon the heart of every man, and above all it is written upon the heart of the noble Celtic race. They have a stronger aversion, a sterner opposition to amalgamation, I believe, than any other of the Caucasian races; and it is on the noble Celts, on that blood which revolts undyingly and in unconquerable courage against the degradation of amalgamation, that I greatly rely to prevent that degrading and demoralizing propagandism in this land of ours. That race will thwart and defy all the spasmodic rhetoric and attempts of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts and his much greater coadjutor, Wendell Phillips, to inaugurate it.

This law embodying the philanthropy of Massachusetts of 1788 was not enacted, but it was executed. I have here a list of the free negroes that were expelled from Massachusetts under this harsh law, a law that required them to depart after they had been there two months, and if they did not depart they were to be reported to the court of sessions, and if they did not leave the State at the end of ten days after receiving notice to depart they were to be carried to the house of correction, there stripped and scourged and put to involuntary labor; and this cruel process was to be repeated and continued upon this poor, down-trodden race until it compelled perfect and universal obedience by them, and here are the names of some of the negroes that were then expelled by its execution. There are more than one hundred and forty of them from some twenty towns, but I will not read their names.

When was this law repealed? There is nothing in legislation which comes nearer branding color as a crime. They were free negroes in Massachusetts. Their offense, in the language of the modern philanthropists and freedom-shriekers, was the crime of their color, and we see how this crime was met and punished in that State of pseudo-philanthropy. This law of 1788 appears again in the revised laws of 1823. The body of the laws of Massachusetts was revised in 1823, and this act punishing the crime of color and forcing the exile of all that population from that State by the gravest penalties was republished in their code of laws of that year.

In 1821 the Legislature of Massachusetts, alarmed by the increase of a species of population "which threatened to become both injurious and burdensome," (I quote from the language of the law) and fully alive to the necessity of checking it, appointed a committee to report a bill concerning the admission into the State of free negroes and mulattoes. The report of this committee, made to the House of Representatives in 1823, refers to the statute of 1788, but did not propose to repeal it. In 1825 an additional act was passed, but without alteration of the provision against negroes. These statutes, so arbitrary and cruel, continued to grace the statute-book of Massachusetts till April 1, 1834. That law, passed in Massachusetts in 1788, remained upon the statute-book, although it was brought up for special action of the general court, their legislative body, and drawn to the attention of that body year after year, until 1834.

And now, sir, in this day of revolution, of civil war, of the shaking and the falling of States and State constitutions, when the boast is that slavery has been destroyed, we see the disgraceful efforts of the people of Massachusetts to get possession of the rich cotton and sugar and rice lands of the South, and to compass for themselves and for their own enrichment the labor of the freed negro. All this, sir, against their hollow claims of devotion to justice, to philanthropy, to benevolence, to the lifting up of a down-trodden race that they say has been oppressed and degraded for generations! Sir, it is all cant; nothing more, nothing less. If Massachusetts wants to do her duty to our common humanity, and to the negro race in particular, let her permit the negro freedman who is free to act as a freeman. He has sense and instinct and mind enough to make the best arrangements for his own personal welfare. He is either a freeman or a slave. If he is a slave, he belongs to his old master. If he is no longer a slave he is a freeman, and he has as much the civil rights of a freeman as the Senator from Massachusetts. What right has he or the Senate of the United States to get up a system of pupillage, of guardianship, for the free negro, any more than for the free white man, if they are all free before the law?

Sir, it does not proceed from philanthropy, from a sense of justice, but from sinister motives, from the love of gain, from a desire to keep the negro enslaved for the benefit of the man who thus wants to entail him with other shackles, more grievous and galling indeed than those which they say have been broken from his fettered limbs. If Massachusetts desires to legislate for his benefit let her secure to the negro perfect freedom of contract, of action, of employment, and make it penal and prescribe punishment for those who will oppress and wrong him by taking advantage of him in matters of contract and of employment, or in any other mode.

OCCUPANCY OF CONFISCATED ESTATES.

SPEECH OF HON. EDGAR COWAN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

June 27, 1864.

On Mr. TRUMBULL's amendment repealing the joint resolution of July 17, 1862, qualifying the confiscation act and limiting forfeitures under it to the life of the offender.

Mr. COWAN said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I should not have said a word during this discussion except for the fact that among all those who have engaged in it not one of them has taken the pains to state the question clearly and distinctly out of which it arises. The Constitution provides that "No attainer of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture [of estate] except during the life of the person attained." The true question is, whether by any law we can make here the estates of traitors can be forfeited absolutely and for the fee. Because to repeal the joint resolution of 17th July, 1862, would give the act it qualifies that operation; if it did not the repeal would be useless and inoperative.

Now I suppose that no lawyer in this country, before the present war, could have ever hesitated a moment as to the true construction of the clause in question or of the reason which underlaid it. The language is plain and free from all legal ambiguity; it is the same which has been embodied in English statutes for the last two hundred years, and has been the subject of judicial construction without a doubt as to its meaning. No one until recently ever dreamed but that it was intended to restrain the forfeitures in judgments of treason to the lifetime of the traitors, and that after their deaths their lands would descend to their heirs-at-law as in other cases. The reason for this too was simple and obvious, that the punishment of a traitor, as far as possible, might be made to fall upon his own head and not upon the heads of his wife and children, who are presumed to be innocent until they are found guilty. Experience, long and painful, too, had shown that this humane view was far more wise and politic for the State than the older and more barbarous rule which forfeited forever the estates of those who rebelled against it. Under this latter the heirs, feeling that they had been involved in the punishment of an ancestor without having shared in his guilt, of course always were disaffected toward a Government they thought capable of such injustice toward them, and under the smart of it never failed to revolt themselves when a fit opportunity presented. Under the new policy, however, they were reconciled to the State because they were allowed the presumption of innocence in inheriting the estates of their ancestors, and were made loyal to it by the clemency it showed in not treating their misfortunes as crimes.

Recently, however, in the indignation naturally excited in the minds of our people by the wickedness of the rebellion, many have desired to strip all those engaged in it of their entire property, as a terror to those who might in the future contemplate offenses of the same kind. Filled with this notion, attempts are made to carry it out here by enactments which would relieve the courts of all restraint in declaring forfeitures of the property of persons engaged in the rebellion, so that they might condemn a tract of land absolutely as prize of war the same as the ship of an enemy at sea is condemned when it is captured. This would be the effect if the joint resolution be repealed by the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Now, I am ready to aver and prove that this cannot be done without a clear violation of our authority delegated to us by the Constitution here, and by the Constitution alone. We are here to make laws for the people according to the powers expressly given to us in that instrument, and we have no more right to transcend those powers by making laws not warranted by it, or by making laws forbidden by it, than any tyrant has to justify his usurpations; no more, indeed, than the rebels have for disregarding and disobeying it. Let no man, therefore, solace himself with the reflection that he is actuated by good motives while he is violating it, or, in the popular phrase, that the Government is to be saved even at the expense of the Constitution. He must save it according to the Constitution and by the exercise of the powers it confers, because if there is a Government left after the Constitution is gone that Government would be a despotism and not the Government he is intrusted to save. All this is, I think, so plain that all who are not willfully blind must see it. If we for the purpose (as we think) of saving the Government could violate the Constitution to do so, then the President might for the same purpose do so too. Now suppose he were to decide that the great danger to it was the coming presidential election, and that for the purpose of saving it from that danger he would prevent an election altogether, and hold over himself till it was safe to go back to the Constitution and again intrust the people with the right to choose a Chief Magistrate: will any man say that would be saving the Government? Would it not be rather saying that it was impossible to save the Government, and that it was necessary to substitute in its stead a despotism?

It is in this aspect all true men must view it; and there is no man true to the Government or who has faith in its continued existence who would for one moment doubt its capacity to save itself according to the laws of its own creation. Indeed I have no doubt if it is ever lost it will be by violating its fundamental law, the Constitution, and if that is obeyed it can be saved and will endure. The honorable Senator from Illinois admits that all the power possessed by our Government is derived to it under and by virtue of the Constitution, and I consider this admission important as coming from him, for there are some of his school who seem to think that in time of war we get some new accession of power from some other source outside that instrument, which they call war powers, and upon these they are disposed to draw without stint whenever constitutional objections are made to their schemes. But it so happens that we hold and enjoy even our war powers under the Constitution, which provides as well for the chastisement of belligerent enemies as it does for the punishment of the citizens who offend against its criminal code. And if we were at war to-day with a foreign Power, we would be as much bound by the Constitution in all respects while carrying on that war as we are bound by it while proceeding against one of our citizens for murder or any other offense. In the first case we are governed by the laws of war as we find them in the laws of nations, and in the latter by the municipal laws enacted by Congress according to the Constitution. The framers of that instrument found the "laws of nations" all ready made to their hand, and they provided that they should be the law of the new people they were then starting out on its national career. They adopted them as the law of the United States. But they adopted no municipal code ready made, but they provided a Congress and gave it authority to make one according to certain fixed rules and with certain definite limitations; so that we see they adopted one code and provided for making another. The first regulates our intercourse with foreign nations in peace and war, the second regulates the relations and authority of the Government with our own citizens as such.

Here, however, comes the difficulty, a difficulty which has confused so many discussions and left so many minds otherwise clear in much and perplexing uncertainty; it is this: under which of these codes are our relations with rebels regulated? Are we to treat them as foreigners at war with us, or as citizens offending against our criminal code? I answer unhesitatingly that so long as actual war exists we are bound to treat them precisely as though they were a foreign nation; we may do to them and their property, public and private, exactly what we might do to the public and private property of Mexico and Mexicans if we were at war with them, and nothing more. After the war is over and the armed rebellion is put down we have a right to do to them whatever we have a right by law to do to citizens who offend against our laws. And this, too, is the necessity of the case; it is what we are doing now, or what we ought to be doing, because, actual war existing, we are governed by the laws of nations and not by our municipal laws. By the latter we might try, convict, and execute for the crime of treason some of the prisoners we take; but it is well known we do not; indeed we durst not for our sakes as well as for the sake of the law. If we did so they would retaliate and execute our prisoners; and the war having thus broken out of the pale of international law would become one of murder and extermination instead of being civilized and lawful war. If we had once subdued the organized and armed rebellion, so that they could not retaliate, then we might enforce against them our municipal law, or law enacted by Congress; until that event happens we cannot.

The act of 17th July, 1862, being clearly a municipal law in most of its features, it must be subject to the restriction imposed by the Constitution; and if we undertake to punish the rebel as a citizen, then we must accord to him all that a citizen charged with a crime has a right to claim under the Constitution; that is, he must be charged by a grand jury, must be tried by a petit jury, &c., and though his life may be forfeited absolutely, yet his lands cannot.

The joint resolution asserts this principle and makes it part of the act, makes the act itself constitutional; but if we repeal it, then it is not constitutional and the courts could not execute it.

But we are told that this law is not exactly a municipal law; that it is not to operate on the rebel as a citizen but as an enemy and a belligerent; that as we have the right to shoot him on the field of battle, we have also a right to confiscate his estates, &c.; with a great deal more to the same purpose, but all of which means, I suppose, if it be put in legal phrase, "that by the laws of war the private property, real and personal, of belligerent enemies is lawful prize of war." If this is true, then we have the right of course; but if it is the law already, why reenact it here? It is unquestionably the law of war that private property of enemies captured at sea is fair prize of war; but being the law, no one has ever thought of giving it any additional force by putting it into an act of Congress.

Now I propose to show that from the very nature and necessity of the matter Congress cannot enact laws of war; to attempt it would be an absurdity. Under ordinary circumstances it would be enough to say to reasonable men that one nation or one belligerent could not make laws of war, because the laws of war must bind both belligerents; and it is manifestly absurd to suppose that if one belligerent were to lay down the law to govern the struggle the other would be bound to obey it. It could only be the law when both agreed to be bound by it; if they did not then it would be mere idle proclamation, or, as lawyers say, brutum fulmen.

Again, even if a foreign nation or nations were to join with the United States in establishing new rules or laws to be added to the international code, Congress would have nothing whatever to do with the matter.

This can be illustrated in a very simple manner. I have said that the Constitution adopted the international code ready made, by conferring power upon Congress to affix a proper punishment for its violation in certain cases, such as piracy, &c., to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and to make rules concerning captures on land and water, (that is, what disposition shall be made of prizes of war, and not what shall be prize of war as has been argued.) Here the power of Congress ends and the power of the President and Senate begins. The President appoints and the Senate confirms ambassadors to foreign courts; they also make treaties; and lastly the courts decide all cases arising under the laws of nations, especially prize cases.

Now, it is well known that the great Powers of Europe, in congress assembled in Paris, in 1856, proposed certain ameliorations in the laws of nations regulating war, as follows: first, to abolish privateering; second, enemy cargo (except contraband of war) to be covered by neutral flags; third, neutral goods (except contraband of war) not seizable under enemy flags.

The United States were invited to agree to those changes, and the Federal Government was willing to do so, provided another change was made, namely, "that private property of enemies should not be prize of war at sea any more than on land."

Now, allow me to ask, suppose our Government had agreed, by what agency under our Constitution could that result have been brought about? Surely no one will say it would be Congress; but every one must know that the President, through his ministers abroad, would have entered into treaty with the Powers proposing; that we would have been called on to ratify it in this Senate; and that, so far from the House of Representatives having anything to do with it, we would have been bound not to let them know anything about it until our action had been taken.

Here we see beyond dispute that to the President and the Senate is intrusted the power of proposing and agreeing to alterations and amendments to the laws of nations.

Now, I wish to say further in this connection, that in pursuance of the doctrine I have advanced we have established courts to decide cases arising under the laws of nations, and that in deciding those cases an act of Congress would have no binding force whatever, because if it contravened the well-settled principles of public law, the court would be bound to disregard it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There never was such a case in the world.

Mr. COWAN. There never was a clearer proposition, nor one which could be more easily maintained before an intelligent court. I never heard it denied or doubted except on the floor of the Senate, and that at a time when I was satisfied Senators had not examined it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he ever read the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall on that very point, in which he said that the law of nations was subject to the control of the sovereignty; that a nation might make itself odious to other nations by refusing to follow it; but that the power of Congress to confiscate property was clear and unquestioned.

Mr. COWAN. I know precisely the opinion to which the Senator refers—Brown's case—and I know, too, that the case as actually decided gives no countenance whatever to the doctrine for which he contends, no matter what the judge may have said by the way while he was ruling it. Besides, there is a doctrine of Chief Justice Marshall in a subsequent case which is directly in the teeth of his doctrine in Brown's as the Senator understands the latter. The fact is, however, that there is no difficulty in reconciling them.

Let me put a case. Suppose we had acceded to the treaty of Paris, and we had gotten afterwards into a war with Great Britain. Then suppose Congress had enacted a law declaring enemy goods might be taken as prize of war, though covered by a neutral flag. Then, further, suppose one of our cruisers had captured British goods on board of a French vessel, and had brought them into a prize court for condemnation; would it not have been sufficient to prevent such a result to show that we had bound ourselves by treaty not to make prize of goods under such circumstances? And if the act of Congress had been relied on by the captors would not the court have pointed to the Constitution to show that such cases were to be decided by what the court believed and decided to be the law of nations, and not what Congress might have enacted in the premises? And might not the court further say, "We sit here to preserve the peace of nations, to compel the observance of treaties and the just administration of public laws between independent sovereignties; and we cannot, even at the bidding of one or both of the other departments of our Government, decide the law as they would have it or make it; but we must decide it as it is."

Again, it is a remarkable fact that just at the time Mr. Seward was endeavoring to induce the sovereignties of Europe to exempt the private property of belligerent enemies at sea from being made prize of war, just at the same time the honorable Senator from Illinois and others were endeavoring by a congressional enactment to make the private property of enemies on land (which had been exempt long before by international law) lawful prize of war! I doubt whether the friends of any Government ever before showed such a want of consistency as in this instance, when they were struggling to bring about such different results.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Pennsylvania, I suppose, does not mean to misrepresent me. I never attempted on this floor to maintain a proposition to change the laws of nations. By the laws of nations from the beginning of time the persons and property of the enemy were at the control of the conqueror.

Mr. HOWARD. By the laws of war.

Mr. TRUMBULL. By the laws of nations in reference to war, of course.

Mr. HOWARD. The laws of war as recognized by nations.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is international law.

Mr. COWAN. I do not know whether the honorable Senator is aware of it or not, but I assert here that he is trying to make a law to seize the real estate of belligerents as such, to condemn and confiscate it as prize of war, and to do all that I call adding a new provision to the laws of nations and of war. If you take an enemy's private ship at sea it may be condemned as prize by the laws of nations, but if you take an enemy's private plantation, it cannot be forfeited as prize under those laws. They are defective in that respect; indeed they say expressly it cannot be done, and that the title is the same after the conquest as before. This is the difficulty the honorable Senator is trying to remove, and in doing so if he succeeds he must repeal (or violate) the laws of nations and enact a new and different rule here. He says himself that he claims the right to do this on the same grounds precisely that he has a right to shoot a rebel on the field of battle; that is, that it is a war right. Now war rights are regulated by the laws of war, which, as he has well said, are the "laws of nations in reference to war." The truth is he is trying to do that which is forbidden by the laws of war and by the Constitution also if it were attempted as municipal law. Nothing can be clearer than this, and he may just as well submit to these limitations first as last. Let him read the latter if he wants to know what he may rightly inflict upon rebels as citizens for violating their allegiance, and let him read the laws of war for what he may do to them as public enemies. At present I am for confining myself to these latter strictly. I think we are bound to make war according to the rules they furnish us, and I would as soon think of transcending them or violating them as I would think of trampling a statute under foot. The crime is the same in both cases, for both are laws of the land.

The true question is, can we make prize of war of the real and personal estates of those who have been engaged in this rebellion, and can we forfeit their real estates absolutely? We have seen that we cannot do this by due process of municipal law; can we do it by virtue of the laws of war as settled by civilized and Christian nations? I answer that we cannot; that there is to-day no conflict of authority whatever on the question; there is not a book that treats of it or a chapter devoted to it which does not lay down the rule that we cannot—all for the best reason in the world, namely, that we can make war far more successfully by not being able to exercise any such power.

Now, as the authorities for this position have been so often quoted in extenso to the Senate I shall content myself with referring to Wheaton's International Law, 596, 597; Vattel, book 3, chapter 9, section 13; Klüber, part 2, title 2, section 2, chapter 1, sections 250-253; Halleck, 789.

The Normans violated this law when they made the conquest of England, and by confiscating the lands of the Saxons kept the realm in a state of chronic rebellion for generations; and Saxon outlaws in revenge for this spoliation infested the forests and highways, setting the laws at defiance. England herself violated it again when she made the conquest of Ireland, and that country continues in a condition little better than revolt even at this day, almost every estate being surrounded even yet by the descendants of its former owners, and only awaiting a successful rebellion to assert their claims. Other countries have furnished similar examples for thousands of years; showing how dangerous and impolitic it is to confiscate the titles of the nobility only, without going the length of this bill, which would strike at the homesteads of great masses of people. In the first case, a single great landed proprietor in each county might be driven from his estates; while in the last, thousands would be rendered outlaws and desperate by depriving them of their homes. Surely at this day no one can expect anything but endless feud as the result of such a measure.

The honorable Senator from Illinois has said, and the honorable Senator from Michigan has backed him, that in all time, from the beginning, the persons and property of the conquered have been at the control of the conqueror. I beg leave, Mr. President, to dissent. To assert such a proposition is to deny the existence of international law, because if the will of the conqueror is the law, then that is equivalent to saying there is no law at all; it is going back to barbaric times when there was no public law, when the cry was væ victis, and the victor did what he chose.

I assert, however, the victor cannot lawfully now do what he pleases with either the persons or property of his victims. Can he kill his prisoners? Can he sell them into slavery? Surely not. And no more can he lawfully take from them the title to their lands or touch in any way their private property except as matter of necessity; and all this for the benefit of the conqueror even more than for the conquered, because every one conversant with war and the history of war knows that the more strictly it can be confined to a struggle between State and State and between the armed combatants of such States, the more easily will the object of it be attained—that object in all wars being "peace." While, on the other hand, if it be carried on so as to involve the population of the State invaded, to exasperate and embitter them by outrages either upon their persons or property, then peace is impossible. Here, too, we may learn why private personal property at sea still continues liable to seizure in war, because to take it does not exasperate and embitter the contest as plunder on land always does. Besides, the former is found in ships which may be taken by the captor and carried into port and committed to the care of an officer till the proper court determines the lawfulness of the prize, all of which is impossible or nearly so in case of goods and chattels on land. These latter indeed have never been called prize of war, but "booty" or "plunder," names which of themselves indicate that they were spoils which could not very well find their way into the public treasury, and were, besides, not of much avail in enriching the soldiers, who were always more debauched and injured than benefited by them.

But what, Mr. President, has been the consequence of this theory of confiscation to us—this doctrine that war has no law but the will of the victor? Have we derived benefit from it or injury?

Now, sir, I believe that one of our most disastrous blunders in the management of the war was in attempting to organize and legalize this immense system of plunder against the people of the rebellious States under pretense that the avails of that plunder would go into the Treasury and pay the expenses of the war. Nothing could have been more unwise and impolitic, and nothing could have resulted worse, even to the Treasury itself.

The first result was to alienate our friends in those States by making their property a something to be taken rather than protected, because every one knows that officers and agents would not discriminate much in favor of that loyalty which obeys the Government for the time being, and which lives in constant dread of the usurper if it disobeys him, and in constant fear of the legitimate Government unless it openly resists him. They would just as likely plunder such a one as they would one of the real traitors, and such we have found to be the fact. Scarcely a man comes to us from those States who does not report himself the victim of a double oppression; first he is plundered by the rebels because he yields to them a sullen and reluctant obedience; then when the Union Army should come to his rescue it usually comes only to plunder him still more for having obeyed them at all. In this way we have lost most of the support we might have had there, and which was invaluable to us in restoring the Union.

Again, the effect upon our armies and their officers has been most mischievous. They have been tempted away from their proper errand of liberating the people from the usurpers, and of winning them back to their allegiance by giving them that protection which is reciprocal to it, and they have gone after cotton and plunder. Have we not seen day after day, as the result of this, that, and the other expedition, that a great quantity of cotton had been brought in? Indeed, the enemy seems to be almost lost sight of in the presence of this potent commodity, unless he chooses to interrupt the trade in it by inflicting a defeat upon us.

Our officers in the meanwhile have been confederating with "army sharks," and sharing with them in the accursed spoil till all that was noble and manly in their natures is gone in the mad race for plunder. And the common soldier was also taught to stain his hands and harden his heart in this unholy license, till, his honor gone, defeat was no more a disgrace.

Mr. President, nothing can be so painfully humiliating as to refer to the condition of things which is acknowledged to prevail in many places in the occupation of our armies. War is terrible at best, when all the humane and softening influences are brought to bear for its amelioration, but when law is disregarded, restraints are broken down, and the lessons of centuries forgotten, it becomes a scourge without anything to redeem it from execration; and in return for all this what have we gained? I assert that not a dollar has really come into the Treasury from it if the accounts are fairly stated.

Another and worse result has been that we have been by this measure hindered and perhaps prevented from attaining the object for which we struggle, the restoration of the Union; and by imitating the barbarous policy of the rebels we have been aiding them in their wicked enterprise.

It is easy to see that their policy and ours ought to have been entirely different; our mission was to restore a Union, theirs to destroy it; ours to reclaim and conciliate angry and excited populations, theirs to widen the breaches and aggravate differences; so that if in any case we imitated their barbarities we were really playing into their hands. It is one thing to put down a rebellion, and another and quite different thing to excite and maintain one. To achieve the former requires the humane genius of a Hoche, whereas to insure success in the latter nothing is better than to oppose it with the diabolical cruelty of an Alva.

Let the rebels themselves answer how this idea of wholesale confiscation has helped their cause. It did for them what they could not do for themselves; it made them united and desperate against us. Thousands and thousands of their people, who had been constrained to bow the knee to the Baal of disunion, now enthusiastically minister at its altars, because of our folly in threatening to confiscate their property. Indeed, I cannot conceive of anything more hurtful to our cause than to say to the people of the South, "If we succeed in suppressing the rebellion we will confiscate the estates of all those who have been engaged in it."

Mr. WADE. Give them a premium for rebellion. Mr. COWAN. The honorable Senator from Ohio thinks that to refuse to confiscate would be a "premium for rebellion." So thought the world in barbarous ages; but the honorable Senator is a lawyer, and it has been in the line of his reading, so that he must know that the very reason why the old and barbarous rule was abolished was because it operated as a premium to rebellion, while the new rule forbidding forfeitures and confiscations has proved a bounty to loyalty and fidelity, a guarantee of future reconciliation and peace.

Now, I know it is pretended that this law is only to apply to the case of actual traitors, but it is not so; it includes in its terms thousands and tens of thousands of persons who could not possibly be convicted in any court of the crime of treason, because it assumes a fallacy, and that is in this, that all are traitors who hold office under the confederate States, and all those who refuse to lay down their arms after sixty days' notice by the proclamation of the President. This is not true in fact or in law.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Occupancy of Confiscated Estates—Mr. Cowan.

SENATE.

Now, what is the law? In making this inquiry we need not go further than to Blackstone's Commentaries, (volume four, page 77,) where a very brief compend may be found of the common law as it has always prevailed in England; and it may be remarked here that the statute of 11 Henry VII, chapter one, was only declaratory of the common law, which excuses the obedience paid to a king or government de facto:

"When, therefore, a usurper is in possession, the subject is excused and justified in obeying and giving him assistance; otherwise, under a usurpation, no man could be safe, if the lawful prince had a right to hang him for obedience to the powers in being, as the usurper would certainly do for disobedience. Nay, further, as the mass of the people are imperfect judges of title, of which in all cases possession is prima facie evidence, the law compels no man to yield obedience to that prince, whose right is by want of possession rendered uncertain and disputable, till Providence shall think fit to interpose in his favor and decide the ambiguous claim; and therefore, till he is entitled to such allegiance by possession, no treason can be committed against him."

Here, then, is not only the common law but the common sense of the case. It could not be otherwise to merit the name of law, and it only remains to inquire as to the fact.

Let us go back a little and see. At the commencement of the rebellion more than one half the people of the confederate States were opposed to the secession movement, and, wherever they had an opportunity to express their will, a majority in almost every State voted against it. I think it cannot be disputed that there was a majority for the Union in every State except perhaps in South Carolina. How, then, it may be asked, was the will of that majority set aside and contravened? I answer, by the fraud and force of the secessionists, who had so managed that before this time they were in possession of all the departments of the government in all the slave States except Delaware; Maryland, where they had only the Legislature; Kentucky and Missouri, where they had the Governors but not the Legislatures; and in all except those named, having the machinery of the State governments in their hands, they were able by means of that machinery to put the Federal Government out of possession of their several States, and at the same time to put it out of the power of that Government for the time to give that protection to the people which they had a right to expect from it, and which was the consideration of their allegiance due to it. What position did that leave them in? What were they to do? They had no means of resisting their State governments, because those governments had not only the insignia of power over them, but they had the means of enforcing it. What did they do? Just what everybody in all times heretofore has done in like circumstances: they obeyed the governments in fact existing over them, and they looked for relief to the Government of the United States, the only power to which they could look, and which was bound by the Constitution which created it to repel invasions and put down rebellion in the several States. What did that Government do? Did it go immediately to their rescue and punish the usurpers? Not at all, sir. The then President, Mr. Buchanan, was of opinion that he had no right to interfere between them and their State governments, and he and his Congress did nothing whatever to assert their supremacy or to deliver the people who had been overborne, but remained inactive till the expiration of his term, 4th March, 1861, a period of three months.

Now, what were these loyal men to think of this? Does any candid man think it was treason if some of them during that time had reconciled themselves to secession, had accepted office under a rebel State, nay, or had even assisted in organizing the confederacy? How were they to know whether the new Administration of Mr. Lincoln would come down and help them or not, especially as it took several weeks itself after it got in before it was able to decide the question? And yet, sir, these are the men who are to be considered as felons under this act and to have their estates forfeited absolutely because they did not without organization, without leaders, without arms, indeed without even authority, fight against their State governments and stand up for their connection with the Federal Government, when that Government had allowed itself to be ignominiously expelled without striking a blow for them; nay, when it had gone off giving them notice they were to expect no relief from it. Would it have been very strange if, when that Government came back with its offers of protection, these loyal men had said, "It is too late; you left us when we most needed you, and now when we have made our peace and formed new relations we will not return to you?" Surely they might have said this to Mr. Buchanan with great force and propriety.

Well, Mr. Lincoln's administration having resolved to discharge its constitutional obligations by putting down the rebellion, had it any right to expect these people to return to their allegiance till it was in a condition to protect them? Was it not first bound to make that return perfectly safe before it could hope for any assistance from them? They were then in the toils of the confederacy, and to ask them to refuse obedience to it before we were in a condition to keep them from being hanged for that refusal, would be asking rather more than human nature is able to grant. When, then, were we able to protect them? Was it after Bull Run, after the repulse before Richmond, after Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, or indeed after any of the terrible and sanguinary battles in which we have struggled to regain our supremacy? Have we not in some instances induced them to come to us after a temporary success and then left them again to the tender mercies of the rebels?

I think, Mr. President, that our course in regard to these people has been of a character entirely the reverse of that which would have been successful in suppressing the rebellion. We were filled with incorrect ideas of the work we were engaged in, or of the only methods by which we could perform the gigantic task we had undertaken. We started out with exaggerated notions of our own strength, and we disdained to think that our success depended upon the loyal men of the South; we thought we did not need them, and treated them accordingly. Think of such a proposition as that contained in this law, that if they do not lay down their arms in sixty days they will be punished by loss of their estates! How, pray, are they to lay down their arms? Surely we know enough to know that this is mere mockery, and that the rebel president might as well expect a soldier in our armies to lay down his arms upon a promise of his protection.

Mr. President, I have sometimes doubted whether we could be serious when we expect any good results to come from such measures as this, which not only exposes us to ridicule but does harm to our cause. What was wanting in this crisis of our history with new criminal legislation, when the code was complete before? We had a statute punishing treason with death, a just and proper punishment, one well according with the magnitude of the crime as well as with the majesty of the law which inflicted it. For all those who conspired the dismemberment of the Republic, who used the means and perverted the State governments to bring it, this is the fitting punishment, because it is the highest, and falls upon the guilty alone, where it ought. I would have had no additional laws; in war they are not needed. I would have contemplated no reforms within the area of the rebellion; they cannot be made at such a time. What we wanted was men and money; these granted, the true function of Congress was over until peace was restored and all parties again represented. But above all things I would not have played into the hands of the enemy; I would not have done that which the rebels most desired to have done, because I have no doubt that this and all kindred schemes have been the very ones which they most wanted us to adopt. I do not know that Jefferson Davis ever prays; but if he does, I have no doubt he would pray—

Mr. WADE. Pray for just such an advocate.

Mr. COWAN. Pray for just such a statesman as the honorable Senator from Ohio, the most effective ally he ever had or could have.

He would have prayed for measures on our part which were obnoxious to all people of the South, loyal and disloyal, Union and disunion. He would have prayed that we should outrage all their common prejudices and cherished beliefs; that we should do these things by giving ourselves over to the guidance of men whom it was part of their religion to hate; to hate personally and by name, with an intensity rarely witnessed in the world before. He would have prayed for confiscation general and indiscriminate; threatening as well the victims of the usurpation as the usurpers themselves; as well those we were bound to rescue as those we were bound to punish. Fer- vently he would have prayed for our emancipation laws and proclamations as means to fire the southern heart more potent than all others; they would rally the angry population to his standard of revolt as if each had personal quarrel. He would then have a united South; while as the result of the same measures a distracted and divided North.

That is the way I think he would have prayed and would pray now. Is any man so stupid as not to know that the great desire on the part of every rebel is to embark in revolt with him the whole people of the disaffected districts? Is not and has not that been considered enough to insure success to him? And where does history show the failure of any united people, numbering five or six millions, when they engaged in revolution? Nowhere; there is no such case.

What did we do to bring this unity about in the South? We forgot our first resolve in July, 1861, to restore the Union alone, and we went further and gave out that we would also abolish slavery. Now that was just exactly the point upon which all southern men were most tender, and at which they were most prone to be alarmed and offended. That was of all things the one best calculated to make them of one mind against us; there was no other measure, indeed, which could have lost to the Union cause so many of them. It is not a question, either, as to whether they were right or wrong—that was matter for their consideration, not ours—for if we were so desirous of a union with them we ought not to have expected them to give up their most cherished institutions in order to effect it. Unions are made by people taking one another as they are, and I think it has never yet occurred to any man who was anxious to form a partnership with another that he should first attempt to force that other either to change his religion or his politics. Is not the answer obvious; would not the other say to him, "If you do not like my principles why do you wish to be partner with me? Have I not as good a right to ask you to change yours as a condition precedent?"

So it was with the southern people; they were all in favor of slavery, but one half of them were still for union with us as before, because they did not believe we were abolitionists. The other half were in open rebellion because they did believe it. Now, can any one conceive of greater folly on our part than that we should destroy the faith of our friends and verify that of our enemies? Could not anybody have foretold we would have lost one half by that, and then we would have no one left to form a union with? We drove that half over to the rebels and thereby increased their strength a thousand-fold.

Is not all this history now? The great fact is staring us full in the face to-day; we are contending with a united people desperately in earnest to resist us. Our most powerful armies most skillfully led have heretofore failed to conquer them, and I think will fail as long as we pursue this fatal policy.

Now, Mr. President, I appeal to Senators whether it is not time to pause and inquire whether that policy which has certainly united the southern people in their cause and which quite as certainly has divided the northern people in their support of ours ought not to be abandoned at once. Why persist in it longer? Can we do nothing to retrieve our fortune by retracing our steps? Can we not divide the rebels and unite the loyal men of the loyal States by going back to the single idea of war for the Union; or is it now too late? Have we lost irrecoverably our hold on the affections of our countrymen who were for the Union in 1861—even in 1862? Is there no way by which we could satisfy them that we yet mean union, and not conquest and subjugation? And what a difference in the meaning of those two phrases! The first offers the hand of a brother, the second threatens the yoke of a master. Or are we obliged now to exchange the hopes we had of southern Union men for that other and miserable hope in the negro? Is he all that is left of loyalty in the South, and the only ally we can rely upon to aid us in restoring the Union? Ye gods! what have we come to at last? Either to yield to an unholy rebellion, to dismember an empire, or to go into national companionship with the negro. Is this the alternative to which our madness has brought us?

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

SENATE.

Mr. President, these things are enough to drive a sane man mad. After all our pretension, all our boasting, how absurd will we appear in the eyes of all other nations if we fail in this struggle! Especially as almost all the measures about which we have occupied ourselves for the last three years have been based upon our success already assumed as a fixed fact. We provided for confiscating the estates of rebels before we got possession; we emancipated slaves before we got them from their masters, and we provided for the disposition of conquests we have not made; we have disposed of the skin of the bear and the bear itself is yet uncaught. All this we have put upon the record; the statute-book will bear witness against us in all coming time; and we cannot escape the consequences if we fail.

Mr. President, our Government was intended to be one of law, preëminently of law. There was to be nothing in the administration of it left to the arbitrary will of an individual or individuals. This was its merit, or intended so, par excellence. I am for preserving its character in that respect strictly. Let no man, from the President down to the most petty officer, dare to do anything, whether to friend or enemy, except as warranted by law. Let us make war according to law, and let us have peace according to law. If we fight a belligerent enemy, let us do it according to the law of nations. If we punish or restrain a refractory citizen, let us do it by the law of the land, by "due process of law." Had we had faith in our Constitution and laws and our people, we had not been in our present condition. Had we made war and war alone, the loyal people North and South to a man would have been with us. The voice of faction, if not entirely hushed, would have been harmless. The capital of the demagogue would have been worthless, and the nation would have been irresistible. Had we treated the negro as the Constitution treats him, as a person, as another man; had we made no distinction or difference between him and other citizens, we had not aroused against him that tribal antipathy which will be far more likely to destroy him than a false philanthropy will be likely to elevate him in the scale of being. If he was friendly to us, the same use could have been made of him that we have made; we could have enlisted him in our armies now as we have been enlisting him in our Navy for long years. We could have received him as a volunteer, if he was able-bodied, without looking to his complexion, and we could have drafted him without inquiring into the relations which existed between him and his master, any more than we inquire into the relations of the white man of twenty years of age with his parent or his guardian. State laws adjusted all those questions, but to the United States it made no difference whether he owed service to individuals or not, he owed his first duty to the Republic as military service if it was required. All this was lawful, and no loyal man ever did or would have complained of it, kindly done in the proper spirit.

I have only to say in conclusion, sir, that I hope that the joint resolution will not be repealed, and that this and all kindred projects will fail in the future, for the simple reason that they strengthen the rebels by uniting their people with them, and they weaken the Union cause by dividing its friends and distracting them with unnecessary issues. Let us unite upon the single idea of suppressing the armed opposition to the Government. Let the energies of the nation be devoted solely to that purpose, and success may yet come, if success is possible.

LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

ACTS OF THE THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS

OF THE

UNITED STATES,

Passed at the First Session, which was begun and held at the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia, on Monday, the 7th day of December, A. D. 1863, and ended on Monday, the 4th day of July, A. D. 1864.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN, President. HANNIBAL HAMLIN, Vice President, and President of the Senate. DANIEL CLARK was elected President of the Senate, pro tempore, on the 25th day of April, and so acted until the end of the session. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

[The Index to the Laws follows the Index to the Appendix.]

CHAPTER I.—An Act declaring the Assent of Congress to an Act of the Legislature of the State of Illinois therein named.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the operation of the eleventh section, chapter fifteen, of the act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, approved February thirteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, entitled "An act to reduce the charter of the city of Chicago, and the several acts amendatory thereof, into one act, and to revise the same;" which section is as follows: "Said city shall have the power to extend aqueducts or inlet pipes into Lake Michigan, so far as may be deemed necessary to insure a supply of pure water, and to erect a pier or piers in the navigable waters of said lake, for the making, preserving, and working of said pipes or aqueducts: Provided, That such piers shall be furnished with a beacon-light, which shall be lighted at all such seasons and hours as the light on the pier at the entrance of Chicago river."

APPROVED, January 16, 1864.

CHAP. II.—An Act to authorize the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the term of one year from the passage of this act, an officer in the War Department, to be called the Second Assistant Secretary of War, whose salary shall be three thousand dollars per annum, payable in the same manner as that of the Secretary of War, who shall perform all such duties in the office of the Secretary of War belonging to that Department as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War, or as may be required by law.

APPROVED, January 19, 1864.

CHAP. III.—An Act to provide for the Deficiency in the Appropriation for the Pay of Officers and Men actually employed in the Western Department, or Department of Missouri.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of seven hundred thousand six hundred and twelve dollars and thirteen cents, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry into effect the act approved March twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, to secure to the officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri, their pay, bounty, and pension: Provided, however, That in the payment of the money hereby appropriated, such payment shall be made directly to the officers or soldiers by whom the services were rendered, or to their personal representatives, or to their agents appointed by powers of attorney, and no assignment of any sum due to any officer or soldier shall be valid; such payments to be made by paymasters of the United States Army: Provided further, however, That any person holding a power of attorney authorizing the receipt by him of the amount to be paid to any officer or soldier may, upon making and filing an affidavit to the effect that he is acting in the premises purely as agent, without personal interest, and that he will pay over the amount received either to the soldier or (in his absence) to his wife or children, for their benefit, be entitled to receive such amount.

APPROVED, January 22, 1864.

CHAP. IV.—An Act to amend the Law prescribing the Articles to be admitted into the Mails of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That articles of clothing, being manufactured of wool, cotton, or linen, and comprised in a package not exceeding two pounds in weight, addressed to any non-commissioned officer or private serving in the armies of the United States, may be transmitted in the mails of the United States at the rate of eight cents, to be in all cases prepaid, for every four ounces, or any fraction thereof, subject to such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

APPROVED, January 22, 1864.

CHAP. V.—An Act to change the Place of holding the Circuit and District Courts of the United States for the District of West Tennessee, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That hereafter the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of West Tennessee shall be holden at the city of Memphis, in said district, on the first Monday in March and the first Monday in September of each year, and at no other place. And all process, civil and criminal, which may have been, or hereafter may be, issued, returnable to said courts at Jackson or Huntingdon, in said district, shall be returned to said courts, respectively, at the city of Memphis; and all books and records of every kind, pertaining to said courts, shall be transferred from the places where said courts have heretofore been held to the city of Memphis.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the judges of the United States circuit court, and of the United States district court for the several districts of Tennessee, may, whenever in their opinion the public interests require it, appoint special terms of their respective courts at Knoxville, Nashville, and Memphis, to be holden at such times as said judges, respectively, shall deem most conducive to the public good. Notice of each special term appointed under the provisions of this act shall be published in at least one newspaper printed in the town or city in which a term is to be held, for four consecutive weeks.

APPROVED, January 26, 1864.

CHAP. VI.—An Act relating to the Admission of Patients to the Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be authorized, in his discretion, during the existence of the present war, to admit into the Government hospital for the insane such transient insane persons as may be found in the District of Columbia without the means of self-support, to be there detained until they can be sent to their friends or proper places of residence, under the direction of the said Secretary of the Interior, whose duty it shall be to provide therefor; the steps preliminary to their admission to be the same, except as to the affidavit of residence at the time they became insane, as are required in the case of indigent persons who became insane while residing in the District.

APPROVED, January 28, 1864.

CHAP. VII.—An Act making Appropriations for the payment of Invalid and other Pensions of the United States for the year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-five.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-five:

Laws of the United States.

For invalid pensions under various acts, one million dollars.

For pensions to widows, mothers, children, and sisters, under the first section of the act of fourth July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six; act of July twenty-first, eighteen hundred and forty-eight; first section of the act of February third, eighteen hundred and fifty-three; June third, eighteen hundred and fifty-eight; and July fourteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, two million two hundred thousand dollars.

APPROVED, January 29, 1864.

CHAP. VIII.—An Act authorizing the holding of a Special Session of the United States District Court for the District of Indiana.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana shall be holden at the usual place of holding said court on the second Tuesday in March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all suits and proceedings of a civil or criminal nature, now pending in, or returnable to said court, shall be proceeded in, heard, tried, and determined by said court at said special session, in the same manner as at a regular term of said court; and the judge thereof is hereby empowered to order the impaneling of a petit jury for said session, but not a grand jury. And no case shall be considered which stands continued to the May term by order of the court.

APPROVED, February 12, 1864.

CHAP. IX.—An Act making an Appropriation for rebuilding the Stable at the President's.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of twelve thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Commissioner of Public Buildings to cause the stable at the President's to be rebuilt forthwith.

APPROVED, February 13, 1864.

CHAP. XI.—An Act amendatory of and supplementary to an Act to provide Circuit Courts for the Districts of California and Oregon, and for other purposes, approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the term of the circuit court of the United States for the districts in California shall be held in the city of San Francisco, in said State, on the first Monday of February, and on the second Monday of June, and on the first Monday of October, of each year; and in the city of Monterey, in said State, on the first Monday of April, and on the second Monday of August, and on the first Monday of December, of each year; and that a term of said circuit court for the State of Oregon shall be held at the city of Portland, in said State, on the first Monday of January, and on the first Monday of May, and on the first Monday of September, of each year.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the circuit judge is absent, or, from any cause, is unable to hold a term of the circuit court as above provided, it shall be the duty of the district judge of the district to hold such term. No term of the circuit court in one district of the tenth circuit shall be deemed to be ended from the commencement of a term in another district. A circuit court may be held in the different districts at the same time.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the circuit judge of said tenth circuit may, at his discretion, appoint special sessions of the circuit court, to be held at the places where the stated sessions thereof are to be holden, as provided in this act, by an order under his hand and seal, addressed to the marshal and clerk of said court, at least fifteen days previous to the day fixed for the commencement of such special sessions, which order shall be published by the marshal in one or more of the gazettes or newspapers within the district where such sessions are to be holden. At such special sessions it shall be competent for the said court to entertain jurisdiction of and hear and decide all cases in equity, cases in error, or on appeal, issues of law, motions in arrest of judgment, motions for new trial, and all other motions, and to award executions and other final process, and to do and to transact all other business, and direct all other proceedings in all causes pending in the circuit court, except trying any cause by jury, in the same way and with the same force and effect as the same could or might be done at the stated sessions of such court. At said special sessions said court may also try and determine all issues of fact in cases in which, by the stipulation in writing of the parties, or their attorneys, and filed with the clerk, a jury shall be waived.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the clerks of the circuit courts for the district of California shall be appointed by the circuit judge of the tenth circuit. The appointment shall be in writing under the hand and seal of the circuit judge, and shall be filed in the clerk's office and entered at large upon the records of the court. The circuit judge may revoke the appointment at any time by filing in the office of the clerk a notice in writing under his hand and seal, stating that the appointment is revoked. The revocation shall be entered on the records of the court. The clerk, before entering upon the discharge of his duties, shall take the oath of office prescribed by the act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July two, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and such oath shall be indorsed upon his appointment. The clerk shall also execute a bond to the United States with two or more sufficient sureties in such sum as the circuit judge may designate, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties. In case of a vacancy in the office of clerk, the district judge shall have power to fill such vacancy by appointment, which shall continue until an appointment is made by the circuit judge.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the clerks of the circuit courts of the tenth circuit shall have power to appoint one or more deputies, who shall have the same authority, in all respects, as their principal. The appointment shall be in writing, and be signed by the clerk, and shall be filed in his office and be entered at large upon the records of the court. The clerk may revoke the appointment of any deputy at will, by writing filed in the office and entered upon the records. Each deputy, before entering upon his duties, shall take the oath of office prescribed by the act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July two, eighteen hundred and sixty-two. And such oath shall be indorsed upon his appointment. The clerk may take from each of his deputies a bond with sureties for the faithful performance of his duties, but the clerk and the sureties on his official bond shall be liable for all the official acts of each deputy.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the clerks of the circuit courts and district courts of the United States for the districts of California and Oregon shall severally be entitled to charge and receive for the services they may perform double the fees and compensation allowed by the act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February twenty-six, eighteen hundred and fifty-three.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That issues of fact in civil cases may be tried and determined by the said circuit court without the intervention of a jury, whenever the parties or their attorneys of record file a stipulation in writing, with the clerk, waiving a jury. Upon the trial of an issue of fact by the court, its decision shall be given in writing and filed with the clerk. In giving the decision, the facts found and the conclusions of law shall be separately stated. The review of the judgment or decree entered upon such findings by the Supreme Court of the United States upon appeal or writ of error shall be limited to a determination of the sufficiency of the facts found to support the judgment or decree entered, and to the rulings of the court in admitting or rejecting evidence offered, and in the construction of written documents produced and admitted. The Supreme Court may affirm or modify or reverse the judgment or decree entered, or may, in its discretion, order a new trial or further proceedings to be taken.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That a term of the district court of the United States for the southern district of California shall be held in the city of Monterey, in said State, on the first Monday of February, and on the first Monday of June, and on the first Monday of October, of each year; and a term of the district court of the United States for the northern district of California shall be held in the city of San Francisco, in said State, on the first Monday of April, and on the second Monday of August, and on the first Monday of December, of each year; and a term of the district court of the United States for the district of Oregon shall be held at the city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, on the first Monday of March, and on the first Monday of July, and on the first Monday of November, of each year.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That section four of the act entitled "An act to provide circuit courts for the districts of California and Oregon, and for other purposes," approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, and sections four and five of the act entitled "An act to provide for extending the laws and judicial system of the United States to the State of California," approved September twenty-eight, eighteen hundred and fifty, and all provisions of law inconsistent with this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect on the first Monday of May, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

APPROVED, February 19, 1864.

CHAP. XII.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act for enrolling and calling out the National Forces, and for other purposes," approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States shall be authorized, whenever he shall deem it necessary, during the present war, to call for such number of men for the military service of the United States as the public exigencies may require.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the quota of each ward of a city, town, township, precinct, or election district, or of a county, where the county is not divided into wards, towns, townships, precincts, or election districts, shall be, as nearly as possible, in proportion to the number of men resident therein liable to render military service, taking into account as far as practicable, the number which has been previously furnished therefrom; and in ascertaining and filling said quota there shall be taken into account the number of men who have heretofore entered the naval service of the United States, and whose names are borne upon the enrollment lists as already returned to the office of the Provost Marshal General of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if the quotas shall not be filled within the time designated by the President, the provost marshal of the district within which any ward of a city, town, township, precinct, or election district, or county, where the same is not divided into wards, towns, townships, precincts, or election districts, which is deficient in its quota, is situated, shall, under the direction of the Provost Marshal General, make a draft for the number deficient therefrom; but all volunteers who may enlist after the draft shall have been ordered, and before it shall be actually made, shall be deducted from the number ordered to be drafted in such ward, town, township, precinct, or election district, or county. And if the quota of any district shall not be filled by the draft made in accordance with the provisions of this act, and the act to which it is an amendment, further drafts shall be made, and like proceedings had, until the quota of such district shall be filled.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any person enrolled under the provisions of the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, or who may be hereafter so enrolled, may furnish, at any time previous to the draft, an acceptable substitute, who is not liable to draft, nor at the time in the military or naval service of the United States, and such person so furnishing a substitute shall be exempt from draft during the time for which [such] substitute shall not be liable to draft, not exceeding the time for which such substitute shall have been accepted.

Laws of the United States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That any person drafted into the military service of the United States may, before the time fixed for his appearance for duty at the draft rendezvous, furnish an acceptable substitute, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War. That if such substitute is not liable to draft, the person furnishing him shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute is not liable to draft, not exceeding the term for which he was drafted; and if such substitute is liable to draft, the name of the person furnishing him shall again be placed on the roll, and shall be liable to draft on future calls, but not until the present enrollment shall be exhausted; and this exemption shall not exceed the term for which such person shall have been drafted. And any person now in the military or naval service of the United States, not physically disqualified, who has so served more than one year, and whose term of unexpired service shall not at the time of substitution exceed six months, may be employed as a substitute to serve in the troops of the State in which he enlisted; and if any drafted person shall hereafter pay money for the procuration of a substitute, under the provisions of the act to which this is an amendment, such payment of money shall operate only to relieve such person from draft in filling that quota; and his name shall be retained on the roll in filling future quotas; but in no instance shall the exemption of any person, on account of his payment of commutation money for the procuration of a substitute, extend beyond one year; but at the end of one year, in every such case, the name of any person so exempted shall be enrolled again, if not before returned to the enrollment list under the provisions of this section.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That boards of enrollment shall enroll all persons liable to draft under the provisions of this act, and the act to which this is an amendment, whose names may have been omitted by the proper enrolling officers; all persons who shall arrive at the age of twenty years before the draft; all aliens who shall declare their intentions to become citizens; all persons discharged from the military or naval service of the United States who have not been in such service two years during the present war; and all persons who have been exempted under the provisions of the second section of the act to which this is an amendment, but who are not exempted by the provisions of this act; and said boards of enrollment shall release and discharge from draft all persons who, between the time of the enrollment and the draft, shall have arrived at the age of forty-five years, and shall strike the names of such persons from the enrollment.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That any mariner or able or ordinary seaman who shall be drafted under this act, or the act to which this is an amendment, shall have the right, within eight days after the notification of such draft, to enlist in the naval service as a seaman, and a certificate that he has so enlisted being made out, in conformity with regulations which may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, and duly presented to the provost marshal of the district in which such mariner or able or ordinary seaman shall have been drafted, shall exempt him from such draft: Provided, That the period for which he shall have enlisted into the naval service shall not be less than the period for which he shall have been drafted into the military service: And provided further, That the said certificate shall declare that satisfactory proof has been made before the naval officer issuing the same that the said person so enlisting in the Navy is a mariner by vocation, or an able or ordinary seaman. And any person now in the military service of the United States who shall furnish satisfactory proof that he is a mariner by vocation or an able or ordinary seaman may enlist into the Navy under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the President of the United States: Provided, That such enlistment shall not be for less than the unexpired term of his military service nor for less than one year. And the bounty money which any mariner or seaman enlisting from the Army into the Navy may have received from the United States, or from the State in which he enlisted in the Army, shall be deducted from the prize money to which he may become entitled during the time required to complete his military service: And provided further, That the whole number of such transfer enlistments shall not exceed ten thousand.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That whenever any such mariner or able or ordinary seaman shall have been exempted from such draft in the military service by such enlistment into the naval service, under such due certificate thereof, then the ward, town, township, precinct, or election district, or county, when the same is not divided into wards, towns, townships, precincts, or election districts, from which such person has been drafted, shall be credited with his services to all intents and purposes as if he had been duly mustered into the military service under such draft.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That all enlistments into the naval service of the United States, or into the marine corps of the United States, that may hereafter be made of persons liable to service under the act of Congress entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, shall be credited to the ward, town, township, precinct, or election district, or county, when the same is not divided into wards, towns, townships, precincts, or election districts, in which such enlisted men were or may be enrolled and liable to duty under the act aforesaid, under such regulations as the Provost Marshal General of the United States may prescribe.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the following persons be and they are hereby exempted from enrollment and draft under the provisions of this act and of the act to which this is an amendment, to wit: such as are rejected as physically or mentally unfit for the service, all persons actually in the military or naval service of the United States at the time of the draft, and all persons who have served in the military or naval service two years during the present war and been honorably discharged therefrom; and no persons but such as are herein exempted shall be exempt.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That section third of the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, and so much of section ten of said act as provides for the separate enrollment of each class, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and it shall be the duty of the board of enrollment of each district to consolidate the two classes mentioned in the third section of said act.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall forcibly resist or oppose any enrollment, or who shall incite, counsel, encourage, or who shall conspire or confederate with any other person or persons forcibly to resist or oppose any such enrollment, or who shall aid or assist, or take any part in any forcible resistance or opposition thereto, or who shall assault, obstruct, hinder, impede, or threaten any officer or other person employed in making or in aiding to make such enrollment, or employed in the performance, or in aiding in the performance of any service in any way relating thereto, or in arresting or aiding to arrest any spy or deserter from the military service of the United States, shall, upon conviction thereof in any court competent to try the offense, be punished by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both of said punishments, in the discretion of the court. And in cases where such assaulting, obstructing, hindering, or impeding shall produce the death of such officer or other person, the offender shall be deemed guilty of murder, and, upon conviction thereof upon indictment in the circuit court of the United States for the district within which the offense was committed, shall be punished with death. And nothing in this section contained shall be construed to relieve the party offending from liability, under proper indictment or process, for any crime against the laws of a State, committed by him while violating the provisions of this section.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall be authorized to detail or appoint such number of additional surgeons for temporary duty in the examination of persons drafted into the military service, in any district, as may be necessary to secure the prompt examination of all such persons, and to fix the compensation to be paid surgeons so appointed while actually employed. And such surgeons so detailed or appointed shall perform the same duties as the surgeon of the board of enrollment, except that they shall not be permitted to vote or sit with the board of enrollment.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is authorized, whenever in his judgment the public interest will be subserved thereby, to permit or require boards of examination of enrolled or drafted men to hold their examinations at different points within their respective enrollment districts, to be determined by him: Provided, That in all districts over one hundred miles in extent, and in such as are composed of over ten counties, the board shall hold their sessions in at least two places in such district, and at such points as are best calculated to accommodate the people thereof.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That provost marshals, boards of enrollment, or any member thereof, acting by authority of the board, shall have power to summon witnesses in behalf of the Government, and enforce their attendance by attachment without previous payment of fees, in any case pending before them, or either of them; and the fees allowed for witnesses attending under summons shall be six cents per mile for mileage, counting one way; and no other fees or costs shall be allowed under the provisions of this section; and they shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations. And any person who shall willfully and corruptly swear or affirm falsely before any provost marshal, or board of enrollment, or member thereof, acting by authority of the board, or who shall before any civil magistrate willfully and corruptly swear or affirm falsely to any affidavit to be used in any case pending before any provost marshal or board of enrollment, shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding five hundred dollars, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than twelve months. The drafted men shall have process to bring in witnesses, but without mileage.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That copies of any record of a provost marshal or board of enrollment, or of any part thereof, certified by the provost marshal, or a majority of said board of enrollment, shall be deemed and taken as evidence in any civil or military court in like manner as the original record: Provided, That if any person shall knowingly certify any false copy or copies of such record, to be used in any civil or military court, he shall be subject to the pains and penalties of perjury.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That members of religious denominations, who shall, by oath or affirmation, declare that they are conscientiously opposed to the bearing of arms, and who are prohibited from doing so by the rules and articles of faith and practice of said religious denominations, shall, when drafted into the military service, be considered non-combatants, and shall be assigned by the Secretary of War to duty in the hospitals, or to the care of freedmen, or shall pay the sum of three hundred dollars to such person as the Secretary of War shall designate to receive it, to be applied to the benefit of the sick and wounded soldiers: Provided, That no person shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this section unless his declaration of conscientious scruples against bearing arms shall be supported by satisfactory evidence that his deportment has been uniformly consistent with such declaration.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That no person of foreign birth shall, on account of alienage, be exempted from enrollment or draft under the provisions of this act, or the act to which it is an amendment, who has at any time assumed the rights of a citizen by voting at any election held under authority of the laws of any State or Territory, or of the United States, or who has held any office under such laws or any of them; but the fact that any such person of foreign birth has voted or held, or shall vote or hold, office as aforesaid, shall be taken as conclusive evidence that he is not entitled to exemption from military service on account of alienage.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Laws of the United States.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That all claims to exemption shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the party claiming exemption to the truth of the facts stated, unless it shall satisfactorily appear to the board of enrollment that such party is for some good and sufficient reason unable to make such oath or affirmation; and the testimony of any other party filed in support of a claim to exemption shall also be made upon oath or affirmation.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That if any person drafted and liable to render military service shall procure a decision of the board of enrollment in his favor upon a claim to exemption by any fraud or false representation practiced by himself or by his procurement, such decision or exemption shall be of no effect, and the person exempted, or in whose favor the decision may be made, shall be deemed a deserter, and may be arrested, tried by court-martial, and punished as such, and shall be held to service for the full term for which he was drafted, reckoning from the time of his arrest: Provided, That the Secretary of War may order the discharge of all persons in the military service who are under the age of eighteen years at the time of the application for their discharge, when it shall appear upon due proof that such persons are in the service without the consent, either express or implied, of their parents or guardians: And provided further, That such persons, their parents or guardians, shall first repay to the Government and to the State and local authorities all bounties and advance pay which may have been paid to them, anything in the act to which this is an amendment to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall procure, or attempt to procure, a false report from the surgeon of the board of enrollment concerning the physical condition of any drafted person, or a decision in favor of such person by the board of enrollment upon a claim to exemption, knowing the same to be false, shall, upon conviction in any district or circuit court of the United States, be punished by imprisonment for the period for which the party was drafted.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That the fees of agents and attorneys for making out, and causing to be executed, any papers in support of a claim for exemption from draft, or for any services that may be rendered to the claimant, shall not, in any case, exceed five dollars; and physicians or surgeons furnishing certificates of disability to any claimant for exemption from draft shall not be entitled to any fees or compensation therefor. And any agent or attorney who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any greater compensation for his services under this act, and any physician or surgeon who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any compensation for furnishing said certificates of disability, and any officer, clerk, or deputy connected with the board of enrollment who shall receive compensation from any drafted man for any services, or obtaining the performance of such service required from any member of said board by the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall, for every such offense, be fined not exceeding five hundred dollars, to be recovered upon information or indictment before any court of competent jurisdiction, one half for the use of any informer who may prosecute for the same in the name of the United States, and the other half for the use of the United States, and shall also be subject to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That no member of the board of enrollment, and no surgeon detailed or employed to assist the board of enrollment, and no clerk, assistant, or employee, of any provost marshal or board of enrollment, shall, directly or indirectly, be engaged in procuring, or attempting to procure, substitutes for persons drafted, or liable to be drafted, into the military service of the United States. And if any member of a board of enrollment, or any such surgeon, clerk, assistant, or employee shall procure, or attempt to procure, a substitute for any person drafted, or liable to be drafted, as aforesaid, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction, be punished by imprisonment not less than thirty days, nor more than six months, and pay a fine not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars, by any court competent to try the offense.

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That all able-bodied male colored persons, between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, resident in the United States, shall be enrolled according to the provisions of this act, and of the act to which this is an amendment, and form part of the national forces; and when a slave of a loyal master shall be drafted and mustered into the service of the United States, his master shall have a certificate thereof, and thereupon such slave shall be free; and the bounty of one hundred dollars, now payable by law for each drafted man, shall be paid to the person to whom such drafted person was owing service or labor at the time of his muster into the service of the United States. The Secretary of War shall appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress, charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation, not exceeding three hundred dollars for each such colored volunteer, payable out of the fund derived from commutations, and every such colored volunteer, on being mustered into the service, shall be free. And in all cases where men of color have been heretofore enlisted, or have volunteered in the military service of the United States, all the provisions of this act, so far as the payment of bounty and compensation are provided, shall be equally applicable as to those who may be hereafter recruited; but men of color, drafted or enlisted, or who may volunteer into the military service, while they shall be credited on the quotas of the several States, or subdivisions of States, wherein they are respectively drafted, enlisted, or shall volunteer, shall not be assigned as State troops, but shall be mustered into regiments or companies as United States colored troops.

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That the fifteenth section of the act to which this is amendatory be so amended that it will read as follows: That any surgeon, charged with the duty of such inspection, who shall receive from any person whomsoever any money or other valuable thing, or agree, directly or indirectly, to receive the same to his own or another's use, for making an imperfect inspection, or a false or incorrect report, or who shall willfully neglect to make a faithful inspection and true report, and each member of the board of enrollment who shall willfully agree to the discharge from service of any drafted person who is not legally and properly entitled to such discharge, shall be tried by a court-martial, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not less than three hundred dollars and not more than ten thousand dollars, shall be imprisoned at the discretion of the court, and be cashiered and dismissed the service.

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That the words "precinct" and "election district," as used in this act, shall not be construed to require any subdivision for purposes of enrollment and draft less than the wards into which any city or village may be divided, or than the towns or townships into which any county may be divided.

SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, as may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act, is hereby repealed.

APPROVED, February 24, 1864.

CHAP. XIV.—An Act reviving the grade of Lieutenant General in the United States Army.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the grade of Lieutenant General be, and the same is hereby, revived in the Army of the United States; and the President is hereby authorized, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a lieutenant general, to be selected from among those officers in the military service of the United States, not below the grade of major general, most distinguished for courage, skill, and ability, who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, may be authorized, under the direction, and during the pleasure of the President, to command the armies of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the lieutenant general appointed as hereinbefore provided shall be entitled to the pay, allowances, and staff specified in the fifth section of the act approved May twenty-eight, seventeen hundred and ninety-eight; and also the allowances described in the sixth section of the act approved August twenty-three, eighteen hundred and forty-two, granting additional rations to certain officers: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed in any way to affect the rank, pay, or allowances of Winfield Scott, Lieutenant General by brevet, now on the retired list of the Army.

APPROVED, February 29, 1864.

CHAP. XV.—An Act to extend the Time for the withdrawal of Goods from Public Stores and Bonded Warehouses, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all goods, wares, and merchandise, now in public stores or bonded warehouses, on which duties are unpaid, and which shall have been in bond more than one year, and less than three years, at the time of the passage of this act, may be entered for consumption, and the bonds canceled at any time before the first day of September next on payment of duties and charges according to law; and that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed. This act to take effect from and after its passage.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the term "license," in the first proviso to the fifteenth section of the act entitled "An act increasing temporarily the duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved July fourteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, shall be held to extend to all vessels authorized by law to engage in the coasting trade, whether sailing under registers or enrollments and licenses.

APPROVED, February 29, 1864.

CHAP. XVI.—An Act to authorize the Appointment of a Warden of the Jail in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, some suitable person to be warden of the jail in the District of Columbia, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, and who shall receive an annual salary of sixteen hundred dollars, which shall include all fees and emoluments. And said warden shall annually, in the month of November, make a detailed report to the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said warden shall have the exclusive supervision and control of the jails in said District, and be accountable for the safe-keeping of all the prisoners legally committed thereto, and shall have all the power and discharge all the duties heretofore legally exercised and discharged over said jails and the prisoners therein by the marshal of the said District.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the warden of the penitentiary in the said District, upon the order of the supreme court of said District or the Secretary of the Interior, shall transport all convicts sentenced to imprisonment beyond the limits of said District to the place of confinement, receiving therefor the actual expenses of himself, guard, and of each convict. And in case of absence or other disability of said warden, the warden of said jail having the custody of said convicts, shall, upon order as aforesaid, transport them to the place of confinement, receiving therefor the compensation aforesaid.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That said warden shall, before entering upon the duties of the office, execute to the United States a bond for the faithful performance of the duties thereof in the penal sum of five thousand dollars, with sureties to be approved by some judge of the supreme court of said District.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts coming in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

APPROVED, February 29, 1864.

CHAP. XVII.—An Act supplementary to an Act entitled "An Act to provide Ways and Means for the support of the Government," approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in lieu of so much of the loan authorized by the act of March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, to which this is supplementary, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States, not exceeding two hundred millions of dollars during the current fiscal year, and to prepare and issue therefor coupon or registered bonds of the United States, bearing date March first, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, or any subsequent period, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after any period not less than five years, and payable at any period not more than forty years from date, in coin, and of such denominations as may be found expedient, not less than fifty dollars, bearing interest not exceeding six per centum a year, payable on bonds not over one hundred dollars, annually, and on all other bonds semi-annually, in coin; and he may dispose of such bonds at any time, on such terms as he may deem most advisable, for lawful money of the United States, or, at his discretion, for Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, or certificates of deposit, issued under any act of Congress; and all bonds issued under this act shall be exempt from taxation by or under State or municipal authority. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the necessary expenses of the preparation, issue, and disposal of such bonds out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, but the amount so paid shall not exceed one half of one per centum of the amount of the bonds so issued and disposed of.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue to persons who subscribed on or before the twenty-first day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, for bonds redeemable after five years and payable twenty years from date, and have paid into the Treasury the amount of their subscriptions, the bonds by them respectively subscribed for, not exceeding eleven millions of dollars, notwithstanding that such subscriptions may be in excess of five hundred millions of dollars; and the bonds so issued shall have the same force and effect as if issued under the provisions of the act to authorize the issue of United States notes and for other purposes, approved February twenty-sixth, [fifth,] eighteen hundred and sixty-two.

APPROVED, March 3, 1864.

CHAP. XVIII.—An Act to provide for the Protection of Overland Emigration to the States and Territories of the Pacific.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for the protection of emigrants by the overland route to the States and Territories of the Pacific, the sum of forty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, That ten thousand dollars of said appropriation shall be applied to the protection of emigrants on the route from Fort Abercrombie by Fort Benton, and the further sum of ten thousand dollars of said appropriation shall be applied to the protection of emigrants on the route from Niobrara, on the Missouri river, by the valley of the Niobrara and Gallatin, in Idaho.

APPROVED, March 3, 1864.

CHAP. XX.—An Act to increase the Internal Revenue, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the duty provided for in section forty-one of an act entitled "An act to support the Government and to pay interest on the public debt," approved July first, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and in addition to duties payable for licenses, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all spirits that may be distilled and sold, or distilled and removed for consumption or sale previous to the first day of July next, of first proof, the duty of sixty cents on each and every gallon; and said duty shall be a lien and charge on such spirits, and also on the interest of all persons in default in the distillery used for distilling the same, with all the stills, vessels, fixtures, and tools therein, and in the lot or tract of land whereon the said distillery is situated, until the said duty shall be paid: Provided, That the said duty on spirituous liquors, and all other spirituous beverages enumerated in this act, shall be collected at no lower rate than the basis of first proof, and shall be increased in proportion for any greater strength than the strength of first proof.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all spirits or other articles on which duties are imposed by the provisions of this act, or of the act referred to in the first section of this act and amendments thereto, which shall be found in the possession or custody or within the control of any person or persons, for the purpose of being sold by such person or persons, in fraud of the internal revenue laws, as heretofore referred to, or with design to avoid payment of said duties, may be seized by any collector or deputy collector who shall have reason to believe that the same are possessed, had, or held for the purpose or design aforesaid, that the same shall be forfeited to the United States; and also all articles of raw materials found in the possession of any person or persons intending to manufacture the same for the purpose of being sold by them, in fraud of said laws, or with design to evade the payment of said duties, and also all tools, implements, instruments, and personal property whatsoever used in the place or building, or within any yard or inclosure where such articles on which duties are imposed, as aforesaid, shall be found, may also be seized by any collector or deputy collector, as aforesaid, and the same shall be forfeited as aforesaid; and the proceedings to enforce said forfeiture shall be in the nature of a proceeding in rem in the circuit or district court of the United States for the district where such seizure is made, or in any other court of competent jurisdiction; and any person who shall have in his custody or possession any such spirits or other articles, subject to duty as aforesaid, for the purpose of selling the same with the design of avoiding payment of the duties imposed thereon, shall be liable to a penalty of five hundred dollars, or not less than double the amount of duties fraudulently attempted to be evaded, to be recovered and applied as other penalties provided by the act heretofore mentioned. And the spirits and other articles which shall be so seized by any collector or deputy collector shall, during the pendency of such proceedings, be delivered to the marshal of said district, and remain in his care and custody, and under his control, until final judgment in such proceedings shall be rendered: Provided, however, That when the property so seized may be liable to perish or become greatly reduced in value by keeping, or when it cannot be kept without great expense, the owner thereof or the marshal of the district may apply to the assessor of the district to examine said property; and if, in the opinion of said assessor, it shall be necessary that the said property should be sold to prevent such waste or expense, he shall appraise the same; and the owner thereupon shall have said property returned to him upon giving bond in such form as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and in an amount equal to the appraised value, with such sureties as the said appraiser shall deem good and sufficient, to abide the final order, decree, or judgment of the court having cognizance of the case, and to pay the amount of said appraised value to the marshal or otherwise, as he may be ordered and directed by the court, which bond shall be filed by said appraiser with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. But if said owner shall neglect or refuse to give said bond, the appraiser shall issue to the marshal aforesaid an order to sell the same. And the said marshal shall thereupon advertise and sell the said property at public auction in the same manner as goods may be sold on final execution in said district. And the proceeds of the sale, after deducting the reasonable costs of the seizure and sale, shall be paid to the court aforesaid, to abide its final order, decree, or judgment.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all distilled spirits upon which an excise duty is imposed by law may be exported without payment of said duty, and, when the same is intended for exportation, may, without being charged with duty, be removed under such rules and regulations and upon the execution of such transportation bonds or other security as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; said bonds or other security to be taken by the collector of internal revenue of the district from which such removal is made: Provided, That the said spirits shall be transported directly from the distillery or a bonded warehouse to a bonded warehouse established in conformity with the law and Treasury regulations, at a port of entry of the United States, and used for the storage of distilled spirits, and be placed in charge of a proper officer of the customs, who, together with the owner and proprietor of the warehouse, shall have the joint custody of all the distilled spirits stored in said warehouse. And all the labor on the goods so stored shall be performed by the owner or proprietor of the warehouse, under the supervision of the officer of the customs in charge of the same, and at the expense of the said owner or proprietor; and the said spirits shall also be subject to the same rules and regulations, and be chargeable with the same costs and expenses, in all respects, to which other goods that are deposited in public store for exportation from the United States may be subject. And no drawback shall in any case be allowed on any distilled spirits upon which an excise duty shall have been paid either before or after it shall have been placed in a bonded warehouse as aforesaid; but no provision of this act shall be construed to repeal existing laws which provide that distilled spirits may be removed from the place of manufacture or bonded warehouse for the purpose of being redistilled for exportation, or which provide for the manufacture for exportation of medicines, preparations, compositions, perfumery, and cosmetics; or which provide for an allowance or drawback on cordials and other liquors when exported.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the duties provided in the act referred to in the first section of this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all cotton produced or sold and removed for consumption, and upon which no duty has been levied, paid, or collected, a duty of two cents per pound; and such duty shall be and remain a lien thereon until said duty shall have been paid, in the possession of any person whomsoever. And further, if any person or persons, corporation or association of persons remove, carry, or transport the same, or procure any other party or parties to remove, carry, or transport the same from the place of its production, with the intent to evade the duty thereon, or to defraud the Government, before said duty shall have been paid, such person or persons, corporation, or association of persons shall forfeit and pay to the United States double the amount of said duty, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, That all cotton sold by or on account of the Government of the United States shall be free and exempt from duty at the time of and after the sale thereof, and the same shall be marked free, and the purchaser furnished with such a bill of sale as shall clearly and accurately describe the same, which shall be deemed and taken to be a permit authorizing the sale or removal thereof.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every collector to whom any duty upon cotton shall be paid shall mark the bales, or rather [other] packages, upon which the duty shall have been paid, in such manner as may clearly indicate the payment thereof, and shall give to the owner, or other person having charge of such cotton, a permit for the removal of the same, stating therein the amount and payment of the duty, the time and place of payment, the weight and marks upon the bales and packages, so that the same may be fully identified. Whenever any cotton, the product of the United States, shall arrive at any port of the United States from any State in insurrection against the Government, the assessor or assistant assessor, under the act referred to in the first section of this act, shall immediately assess the taxes thereon, and shall, without delay, return the same to the collector or deputy collector of said district, and the said collector or deputy collector shall demand of the owner or other person having charge of such cotton, the tax imposed by this act, and assessed thereon, unless evidence of previous payment of said tax shall be produced, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, by the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall from time to time prescribe; and in case the tax so assessed shall not be paid to such collector within thirty days after demand, the collector or deputy collector, as aforesaid, shall institute proceedings for the recovery of the tax, which shall be a lien upon said cotton from the time when said assessment shall be made.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That from and after the date on which this act takes effect, in computing the allowance or drawback upon articles manufactured exclusively of cotton when exported, there shall be allowed, in addition to the three per centum duty which shall have been paid on such articles, a drawback of two cents per pound upon such articles in all cases where the duty imposed by this act upon the cotton used in the manufacture thereof shall be satisfactorily shown to have been previously paid, the amount of said drawback to be ascertained in such manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, in addition to the duties heretofore imposed by law, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on spirits distilled from grain or other materials, whether of American or foreign production, imported from foreign countries previous to the first day of July next, of first proof, a duty of forty cents on each and every gallon, and no lower rate of duty shall be levied or collected than upon the basis of first proof, and shall be increased in proportion for any greater strength than the strength of first proof; and that upon all such spirits imported prior to the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid an additional tax of forty cents per gallon, to be collected under the direction and according to regulations established by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That consuls of foreign countries in the United States, who are not citizens thereof, shall be, and hereby are, exempt from any income tax imposed by the act referred to in the first section of this act, which may be derived from their official emoluments, or from property in such countries: Provided, That the Governments which such consuls may represent shall extend similar exemption to consuls of the United States.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports," approved March second, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, now in force, shall be taken and deemed as extending to and embracing all laws for the collection of internal duties, stamp duties, licenses, or taxes, which have been or may be hereafter enacted; and all persons duly authorized to assess, receive, or collect such duties or taxes under such laws, are hereby declared to be and to have been "revenue officers," within the true intent and meaning of the said act, and entitled to all the exemptions, immunities, benefits, rights, and privileges therein enumerated and conferred.

APPROVED, March 7, 1864.

CHAP. XXI.—An Act to incorporate the Washington City Savings Bank.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That William B. Todd, William P. Dole, Edward Clark, Edward J. Simms, Joseph J. Coombs, Z. C. Robbins, Thomas S. Gardner, John R. Elvans, and Samuel B. Niles, and their associates and successors, are constituted and created a body-corporate and politic, by the name of The Washington City Savings Bank.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the officers of said corporation shall consist of a president and vice president, who, together with seven trustees, shall constitute a board of managers, four of whom, if the president or vice president be present, shall constitute a legal meeting of such board for the transaction of business.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That said corporation shall meet annually in the month of April, and as much oftener as they may judge expedient, and any seven members of said corporation, the president, secretary, or treasurer being one, shall be a quorum, and the said corporation at their annual meeting shall have power to elect a president and a treasurer, who shall give bond, in the sum of ten thousand dollars, for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office, and all such other officers as may be deemed necessary; which officers shall continue in office one year, and until others are chosen in their stead, and all officers so chosen shall be under oath to the faithful discharge of the duties of their offices, respectively.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That said corporation may receive on deposit, for the use and benefit of the depositors, all sums of money offered for that purpose: Provided, however, That it shall not hold at the same time more than one thousand dollars of any one depositor, other than a religious or charitable corporation. All such sums may be invested in the stock of any bank incorporated by Congress, or may be loaned on interest to any such bank, or may be loaned on bonds or notes, with collateral security of the stock of such banks at not more than ninety per centum of its par value, or they may be invested in the public funds of the United States, of the several States, or loaned on a pledge of any of said funds, or invested in loans on mortgages of real estate: Provided, That the whole amount of stock held by the institution at one time in any one bank, both by way of investment and as a surety for loans, shall not exceed one half of its capital stock of such bank, and that not more than three quarters of the whole sum deposited in the institution shall be at any one time invested in mortgages of real estate. The income or interest of all deposits shall be divided among the depositors, or their legal representatives, according to the terms of interest stipulated; and the principal may be withdrawn at such times, or in such manner, as the corporation shall in its by-laws direct.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no officer, director, or committee charged with the duty of investing the deposits, shall borrow any portion thereof, or use the same, except in payment of the expenses of the corporation; and if any officer, director, agent, or other person connected with said bank, and interested with the funds or deposits thereof, shall embezzle or fraudulently convert the same to his own use, he shall be deemed guilty of larceny, and shall, on conviction thereof, by any court competent to try the offense, be imprisoned in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than ten years.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the subordinate officers and agents of said corporation shall respectively give such security for their fidelity and good conduct as the board of managers may from time to time require, and said board shall fix the salaries of such officers and agents.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the persons named as corporators in the first section of this act shall be authorized to meet and organize said bank by the election of one of their number as president, and one as vice president, and thereupon shall proceed to elect such persons as they shall select, not herein named as corporators, to be added to their board of managers, so that the whole number of trustees, or managers, including the president and vice president, shall not exceed nine persons.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That this corporation shall make an annual report to Congress of their funds and investments. Said returns shall specify the following particulars, namely: the number of depositors; total amount of deposits; amount invested in bank stock and deposited in bank on interest; amount secured by bank stock; amount invested in public funds; loans on security of public funds; loans on mortgage of real estate; loans on personal securities; amount of cash on hand; total dividends of the year; annual expenses of the institution; all of which shall be certified and sworn to by the treasurer; and five or more of the managers shall also certify and make oath that the said return is correct according to their best knowledge and belief.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the books of said corporation shall, at all times during their hours of business, be open for inspection and examination to the Comptroller of the Currency or depositors.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That said corporation may make by-laws for the more orderly management of their business, not repugnant to law; may have a common seal, which they may change at pleasure; that all deeds, grants, covenants, and agreements, made by their treasurer, or any other person by their authority, shall be good and valid; and said corporation shall have power to sue and may be sued, defend, and be held to answer by the name aforesaid.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

APPROVED, March 8, 1864.

CHAP. XXII.—An Act to enable Guardians and Committees of Lunatics, appointed in the several States, to act within the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be lawful for any person, appointed the committee of a lunatic, or the guardian of a minor or lunatic, by the proper authority in any State or Territory of the United States, to institute and prosecute to final judgment any suit or action in the courts of the District of Columbia, as he might have done if his authority as such guardian or committee had been derived from the proper tribunals of said District; and such committee or guardian may in the same manner collect and receive any sum of money due to such lunatic or minor, and may by deed, duly executed, release and convey to any party entitled to the same, whether by purchase or otherwise, any lands or estates situated in the District of Columbia, the property of such lunatic or minor, or to or upon which such lunatic or minor may have a claim or mortgage, in the same manner as he might have done if his authority had been derived from the tribunals of said District: Provided, That such committee or guardian, before making any conveyance of real estate or release of claim, or mortgage thereon, shall file in the orphans' court of said District the official certificate of the judge of the court from which such committee or guardian derived his appointment, that he has given a sufficient bond to account to the minor or lunatic for all sums of money received by virtue of the authority conferred by this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all payments heretofore made within the District of Columbia to the committee or guardian of a lunatic or the guardian of a minor duly appointed at the domicile of the lunatic or minor out of the District of Columbia, in the United States, shall be good and sufficient: Provided, That said guardian or committee shall file in the orphans' court in said District, the official certificate of the judge of the court from which such committee or guardian derived his appointment, that he has given sufficient bond to account to the minor or lunatic for all payments so made: And provided further, That in all cases the evidence of the appointment and authority of such committee or guardian shall be first recorded in the office of the orphans' court of said District.

CHAP. XXIII.—An Act to Apportion the Expenses of the Levy Court of the County of Washington upon the Basis of Population.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act the corporate authorities of the city of Washington, the corporate authorities of the city of Georgetown, and the county authorities of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, shall contribute to the expenses of the levy court of the county of Washington, incurred on account of the orphans' court, the office of coroner, and the jail of said county, whenever hereafter imposed by law, in the following proportions, to wit: the city of Washington twelve fifteenths, the city of Georgetown two fifteenths, and the county of Washington one fifteenth of said expenses.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be, and they are hereby, repealed.

APPROVED, March 8, 1864.

CHAP. XXIV.—An Act to Authorize the Enrollment and License of the Steam-Tugs B. F. Davidson and W. K. Muir.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to grant the enrollment and license of the steam-tugs B. F. Davidson and W. K. Muir, now owned by William Porter and William Lurkins, of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin, upon such terms, not inconsistent with law, as to him shall seem just and proper.

APPROVED, March 8, 1864.

CHAP. XXVII.—An Act to establish a Uniform System of Ambulances in the Armies of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the medical director, or chief medical officer, of each Army corps shall, under the control of the medical director of the army to which such Army corps belongs, have the direction and supervision of all ambulances, medicine, and other wagons, horses, mules, harness, and other fixtures appertaining thereto, and of all officers and men who may be detailed or employed to assist him in the management thereof, in the Army corps in which he may be serving.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the commanding officer of each Army corps shall detail officers and enlisted men for service in the ambulance corps of such Army corps, upon the following basis, viz: one captain who shall be commandant of said ambulance corps; one first lieutenant for each division in such Army corps; one second lieutenant for each brigade in such Army corps; one sergeant for each regiment in such Army corps; three privates for each ambulance, and one private for each wagon; and the officers and non-commissioned officers of the ambulance corps shall be mounted: Provided, That the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates so detailed for each Army corps shall be examined by a board of medical officers of such Army corps as to their fitness for such duty; and that such as are found to be not qualified shall be rejected, and others detailed in their stead.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed and furnished to each Army corps two-horse ambulances, upon the following basis, to wit: three to each regiment of infantry of five hundred men or more; two to each regiment of infantry of more than two hundred and less than five hundred men or more; and one to each regiment of infantry of less than two hundred men; two to each regiment of cavalry of five hundred men or more; and one to each regiment of cavalry of less than five hundred men; one to each battery of artillery, to which battery of artillery it shall be permanently attached; to the headquarters of each Army corps two such ambulances; and to each division train of ambulances two Army wagons; and ambulances shall be allowed and furnished to division brigades and commands not attached to any Army corps, upon the same basis; and each ambulance shall be provided with such number of stretchers and other appliances as shall be prescribed by the Surgeon General: Provided, That the ambulances and wagons herein mentioned shall be furnished, so far as practicable, from the ambulances and wagons now in the service.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That horse and mule litter may be adopted or authorized by the Secretary of War, in lieu of ambulances, when judged necessary, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the medical director of each Army corps.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the captain shall be the commander of all the ambulances, medicine, and other wagons in the corps, under the immediate direction of the medical director, or chief medical officer of the Army corps to which the ambulance corps belongs. He shall pay special attention to the condition of the ambulances, wagons, horses, mules, harness, and other fixtures appertaining thereto, and see that they are at all times in readiness for service; that the officers and men of the ambulance corps are properly instructed in their duties, and that their duties are performed, and that the regulations which may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, or the Surgeon General, for the government of the ambulance corps are strictly observed by those under his command. It shall be his duty to institute a drill in his corps, instructing his men in the most easy and expeditious manner of moving the sick and wounded, and to require in all cases that the sick and wounded shall be treated with gentleness and care, and that the ambulances and wagons are at all times provided with attendants, drivers, horses, mules, and whatever may be necessary for their efficiency; and it shall be his duty also to see that the ambulances are not used for any other purpose than that for which they are designed and ordered. It shall be the duty of the medical director, or chief medical officer of the Army corps, previous to a march, and previous to and in time of action, or whenever it may be necessary to use the ambulances, to issue the proper orders to the captain for the distribution and management of the same, for collecting the sick and wounded and conveying them to their destination. And it shall be the duty of the captain faithfully and diligently to execute such orders; and the officers of the ambulance corps, including the medical director, shall make such reports, from time to time, as may be required by the Secretary of War, the Surgeon General, the medical director of the Army, or the commanding officer of the Army corps in which they may be serving; and all reports to higher authority than the commanding officer of the Army corps shall be transmitted to the medical director of the army to which such Army corps belongs.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the first lieutenant assigned to the ambulance corps for a division shall have complete control, under the captain of his corps and the medical director of the Army corps, of all the ambulances, medicine, and other wagons, horses, mules, and men in that portion of the ambulance corps. He shall be the acting assistant quartermaster for that portion of the ambulance corps, and will receipt for and be responsible for all the property belonging to it, and be held responsible for any deficiency in anything appertaining thereto. He shall have a traveling cavalry forge, a blacksmith, and a saddler, who shall be under his orders, to enable him to keep his train in order. He shall have authority to draw supplies from the depot quartermaster, upon requisitions approved by the captain of his corps, the medical director, and the commander of the Army corps to which he is attached. It shall be his duty to exercise a constant supervision over his train in every particular, and keep it at all times ready for service.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the second lieutenant shall have command of the portion of the ambulance corps for a brigade, and shall be under the immediate orders of the first lieutenant, and he shall exercise a careful supervision over the sergeants and privates assigned to the portion of the ambulance corps for his brigade; and it shall be the duty of the sergeants to conduct the drills and inspections of the ambulances under his orders, of their respective regiments.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the ambulances in the armies of the United States shall be used only for the transportation of the sick and wounded, and, in urgent cases only, for medical supplies; and all persons shall be prohibited from using them, or requiring them to be used, for any other purpose. It shall be the duty of the officers of the ambulance corps to report to the commander of the Army corps any violation of the provisions of this section, or any attempt to violate the same. And any officer who shall use an ambulance, or require it to be used, for any other purpose than as provided in this section, shall, for the first offense, be publicly reprimanded by the commander of the Army corps in which he may be serving, and for the second offense shall be dismissed from the service.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That no person except the proper medical officers, or the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the ambulance corps, or such persons as may be specially assigned, by competent military authority, to duty with the ambulance corps for the occasion, shall be permitted to take, or accompany sick or wounded men to the rear, either on the march or upon the field of battle.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the ambulance corps shall be designated by such uniform, or in such manner as the Secretary of War shall deem proper: Provided, That officers and men may be relieved from service in said corps, and others detailed to the same, subject to the examination provided in the second section of this act, in the discretion of the commanders of the armies in which they may be serving.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the commander of the Army corps to transmit to the Adjutant General the names and rank of all officers and enlisted men detailed for service in the ambulance corps of such Army corps, stating the organizations from which they may have been so detailed; and if such officers and men belong to volunteer organizations, the Adjutant General shall thereupon notify the Governors of the several States in which such organizations were raised, of their detail for such service; and it shall be the duty of the commander of the Army corps to report to the Adjutant General, from time to time, the conduct and behavior of the officers and enlisted men of the ambulance corps, and the Adjutant General shall forward copies of such reports, so far as they relate to officers and enlisted men of volunteer organizations, to the Governors of the States in which such organizations were raised.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed to diminish or impair the rightful authority of the commanders of armies, Army corps, or separate detachments, over the medical and other officers, and the non-commissioned officers and privates of their respective commands.

CHAP. XXXI.—An Act in relation to University Lands in Washington Territory.

Whereas it is declared in the fourth section of the act of Congress approved July seventeenth, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, amendatory of the act approved September twenty-seventh, eighteen hundred and fifty, creating the office of surveyor general of the public lands in Oregon, etc., "that in lieu of the two townships of land granted to the Territory of Oregon, by the tenth section of the act of eighteen hundred and fifty, for universities, there shall be reserved to each of the Territories of Washington and Oregon, two townships of land of thirty-six sections each, to be selected in legal subdivisions, for university purposes, under the direction of the Legislatures of said Territories, respectively;" and whereas it is represented that sales have been made by territorial authorities of lands selected in virtue of the terms of said act of seventeenth July, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, authorizing selections to be "reserved," merely under the conviction that they had the power to dispose of the same as a fee-simple grant: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all cases of sales made to individuals by the territorial authorities prior to the passage of this act, in which it may be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior, that such sales were bona fide and of the class hereinbefore mentioned, and that the tracts so sold are selections in all other respects regular and proper, it shall and may be lawful for the said Secretary to approve such selection as a grant in fee simple, and a transcript, certified under the seal of the General Land Office by the Commissioner thereof, of such approval, shall vest the title in the Territory and in its bona fide vendees.

APPROVED, March 14, 1864.

CHAP. XXXIII.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to regulate Trade and Interchange with the Indian Tribes, and to preserve Peace on the Frontiers," approved June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and thirty-four.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the twentieth section of the act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes and to preserve peace on the frontiers, approved June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows, to wit: "SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall sell, exchange, give, barter, or dispose of any spirituous liquors or wine to any Indian under the charge of any Indian superintendent or Indian agent appointed by the United States, or shall introduce or attempt to introduce any spirituous liquor or wine into the Indian country, such person, on conviction thereof, before the proper district or circuit court of the United States, shall be imprisoned for a period not exceeding two years, and shall be fined not more than three hundred dollars: Provided, however, That it shall be a sufficient defense to any charge of introducing or attempting to introduce liquor into the Indian country if it be proved to be done by order of the War Department, or any officer duly authorized thereunto by the War Department. And if any superintendent of Indian affairs, Indian agent, or sub-agent, or commanding officer of a military post, has reason to suspect or is informed that any white person or Indian is about to introduce or has introduced any spirituous liquor or wine into the Indian country, in violation of the provisions of this section, it shall be lawful for such superintendent, agent, sub-agent, or commanding officer, to cause the boats, stores, packages, wagons, sleds, and places of deposit of such person to be searched; and if any such liquor is found therein, the same, together with the boats, teams, wagons, and sleds used in conveying the same, and also the goods, packages, and peltries of such person shall be seized and delivered to the proper officer, and shall be proceeded against, by libel in the proper court, and forfeited, one half to the informer and the other half to the use of the United States; and if such person be a trader, his license shall be revoked and his bond put in suit. And it shall moreover be the duty for any person in the service of the United States, or for any Indian, to take and destroy any ardent spirits or wine found in the Indian country, except such as may be introduced therein by the War Department. And in all cases arising under this act Indians shall be competent witnesses."

APPROVED, March 15, 1864.

CHAP. XXXIV.—An Act making Appropriations for the Service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-five.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, for the service of the Post Office Department for the year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, out of any moneys in the Treasury arising from the revenues of the said Department, in conformity to the act of the second of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six:

For payment of balances due to foreign countries, two hundred thousand dollars.

For miscellaneous payments, two hundred thousand dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if the revenues of the Post Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations of this act, then the sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the revenue of the Post Office Department for the year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-five.

APPROVED, March 16, 1864.

CHAP. XXXV.—An Act in addition to an Act to amend the Laws relating to the Post Office Department, approved March three, eighteen hundred and sixty-three.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the franking privilege of the President and the Vice President of the United States shall extend to and cover all mail matter sent from, or directed to, either of them.

APPROVED, March 16, 1864.

CHAP. XXXVI.—An Act to enable the People of Nevada to form a Constitution and State Government, and for the Admission of such State into the Union on an equal Footing with the original States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the inhabitants of that portion of the Territory of Nevada included in the boundaries hereinafter designated be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves, out of said Territory, a State government, with the name aforesaid, which said State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatsoever.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said State of Nevada shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries, to wit: Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the thirty-eighth degree of longitude west from Washington with the thirty-seventh degree of north latitude; thence due west along said thirty-seventh degree of north latitude to the eastern boundary line of the State of California; thence in a northwesterly direction along the said eastern boundary line of the State of California to the forty-third degree of longitude west from Washington; thence north along said forty-third degree of west longitude and said eastern boundary line of the State of California to the forty-second degree of north latitude; thence due east along the said forty-second degree of north latitude to a point formed by its intersection with the aforesaid thirty-eighth degree of longitude west from Washington; thence due south down said thirty-eighth degree of west longitude to the place of beginning.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all persons qualified by law to vote for representatives to the General Assembly of said Territory, at the date of the passage of this act shall be qualified to be elected, and they are authorized to vote for and choose representatives to form a convention, under such rules and regulations as the Governor of said Territory may prescribe; and also to vote upon the acceptance or rejection of such constitution as may be formed by said convention, under such rules and regulations as the said convention may prescribe; and if any of said citizens are enlisted in the Army of the United States, and are still within said Territory, they shall be permitted to vote at their place of rendezvous; and [if] any are absent from said Territory, by reason of their enlistment in the Army of the United States, they shall be permitted to vote at their place of service, under the rules and regulations in each case to be prescribed as aforesaid; and the aforesaid representatives to form the aforesaid convention shall be apportioned among the several counties in said Territory in proportion to the population as near as may be; and said apportionment shall be made for said Territory by the Governor, United States district attorney, and chief justice thereof, or any two of them; and the Governor of said Territory shall, by proclamation on or before the first Monday of May next, order an election of the representatives as aforesaid to be held on the first Monday in June thereafter throughout the Territory, and such election shall be conducted in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of said Territory regulating elections therein for members of the House of Representatives, and the number of members to said convention shall be the same as now constitute both branches of the Legislature of the aforesaid Territory.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the members of the convention, thus elected, shall meet at the capital of said Territory on the first Monday in July next, and, after organization, shall declare, on behalf of the people of said Territory, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States. Whereupon the said convention shall be, and it is hereby, authorized to form a constitution and State government for said Territory: Provided, That the constitution, when formed, shall be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and the principles of the Declaration of Independence: And provided further, That said convention shall provide, by an ordinance irrevocable, without the consent of the United States and the people of said State:

First. That there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said State, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted.

Second. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship.

Third. That the people inhabiting said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within said Territory, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States; and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed higher than the land belonging to the residents thereof; and that no taxes shall be imposed by said State on lands or property therein belonging to, or which may hereafter be purchased by, the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That in case a constitution and State government shall be formed for the people of said Territory of Nevada, in compliance with the provisions of this act, that said convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution to the people of said State for their ratification or rejection at an election to be held on the second Tuesday of October, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four, at such places and under such regulations as may be prescribed therein, at which election the lawful voters of said new State shall vote directly for or against the proposed constitution, and the returns of said election shall be made to the acting Governor of the Territory, who, with the United States district attorney and chief justice of said Territory, or any two of them, shall canvass the same, and if a majority of legal votes shall be cast for said constitution in said proposed State, the said acting Governor shall certify the same to the President of the United States, together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances; whereupon it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action whatever on the part of Congress.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That until the next general census shall be taken said State of Nevada shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States, which Representative, together with the Governor and State and other officers provided for in said constitution, may be elected on the same day a vote is taken for or against the proposed constitution and State government.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That sections numbers sixteen and thirty-six, in every township, and where such sections have been sold or otherwise disposed of by any act of Congress, other lands equivalent thereto in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter section, and as contiguous as may be, shall be, and are hereby, granted to said State for the support of common schools.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That provided the State of Nevada shall be admitted into the Union, in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this act, that twenty entire sections of the unappropriated public lands within said State, to be selected and located by direction of the Legislature thereof, on or before the first day of January, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, shall be, and they are hereby, granted, in legal subdivisions of not less than one hundred and sixty acres, to said State, for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the capital of said State, for legislative and judicial purposes, in such manner as the Legislature shall prescribe.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That twenty other entire sections of land, as aforesaid, to be selected and located as aforesaid, in legal subdivisions, as aforesaid, shall be, and they are hereby, granted to said State for the purpose of erecting a suitable building for a penitentiary or State prison in the manner aforesaid.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That five per centum of the proceeds of the sales of all public lands lying within said State, which shall be sold by the United States subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said State for the purpose of making and improving public roads, constructing ditches

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That from and after the admission of the said State of Nevada into the Union, in pursuance of this act, the laws of the United States, not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said State as elsewhere within the United States, and said State shall constitute one judicial district, and be called the district of Nevada.

APPROVED, March 21, 1864.

CHAP. XXXVII.—An Act to enable the People of Colorado to form a Constitution and State Government, and for the Admission of such State into the Union on an equal Footing with the original States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the inhabitants of that portion of the Territory of Colorado included in the boundaries hereinafter designated be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves, out of said Territory, a State government, with the name aforesaid, which said State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatsoever.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said State of Colorado shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries, to wit: Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the thirty-seventh degree of north latitude with the twenty-fifth degree of longitude west from Washington; extending thence due west along said thirty-seventh degree of north latitude to a point formed by its intersection with the thirty-second degree of longitude west from Washington; thence due north along said thirty-second degree of west longitude to a point formed by its intersection with the forty-first degree of north latitude; thence due east along said forty-first degree of north latitude to a point formed by its intersection with the twenty-fifth degree of longitude west from Washington; thence due south along said twenty-fifth degree of west longitude.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all persons qualified by law to vote for representatives to the General Assembly of said Territory, at the date of the passage of this act, shall be qualified to be elected; and they are hereby authorized to vote for and choose representatives to form a convention, under such rules and regulations as the Governor of said Territory may prescribe; and also to vote upon the acceptance or rejection of such constitution as may be formed by said convention, under such rules and regulations as said convention may prescribe; and if any of said citizens are enlisted in the Army of the United States, and are still within said Territory, they shall be permitted to vote at their place of rendezvous; and if any are absent from said Territory, by reason of their enlistment in the Army of the United States, they shall be permitted to vote at their place of service, under the rules and regulations in each case to be prescribed, as aforesaid. And the aforesaid representatives to form the aforesaid convention shall be apportioned among the several counties in said Territory in proportion to the population, as near as may be; and said apportionment shall be made for said Territory by the Governor, United States district attorney, and chief justice thereof, or any two of them. And the Governor of said Territory shall, by proclamation on or before the first Monday of May next, order an election of the representatives aforesaid, to be held on the first Monday in June thereafter throughout the Territory; and such election shall be conducted in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of said Territory regulating elections therein for members of the House of Representatives; and the number of members to said convention shall be the same as now constitute both branches of the Legislature of the aforesaid territory.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the members of the convention, thus elected, shall meet at the capital of said Territory on the first Monday in July next, and, after organization, shall declare, on behalf of the people of said Territory, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States; whereupon the said convention shall be, and it is hereby, authorized to form a constitution and State government for said Territory: Provided, That the constitution, when formed, shall be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence: And provided further, That said convention shall provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State:

First. That there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said State, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted.

Second. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship.

Third. That the people inhabiting said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within said Territory, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States, and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States, residing without the said State, shall never be taxed higher than the land belonging to residents thereof, and that no taxes shall be imposed by said State on lands or property therein belonging to, or which may hereafter be purchased by, the United States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That in case a constitution and State government shall be formed for the people of said Territory of Colorado, in compliance with the provisions of this act, that said convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution to the people of said State for their ratification or rejection, at an election to be held on the second Tuesday of October, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four, at such places and under such regulations as may be prescribed therein, at which election the lawful voters of said new State shall vote directly for or against the proposed constitution; and the returns of said elections shall be made to the acting Governor of the Territory, who, with the United States district attorney and chief justice of the said Territory, or any two of them, shall canvass the same, and if a majority of legal votes shall be cast for said constitution in said proposed State, the said acting Governor shall certify the same to the President of the United States, together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances to that effect; whereupon it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action whatever on the part of Congress.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That until the next general census shall be taken said State of Colorado shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States, which Representative, together with the Governor and State and other officers provided for in said constitution, may be elected on the same day a vote is taken for or against the proposed constitution and State government.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That sections numbered sixteen and thirty-six, in every township, and where such sections have been sold, or otherwise disposed of by any act of Congress, other lands equivalent thereto in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter section, and as contiguous as may be, shall be, and are hereby, granted to said State for the support of common schools.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That provided the State of Colorado shall be admitted into the Union, in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this act, that twenty entire sections of the unappropriated public lands within said State, to be selected and located by direction of the Legislature thereof on or before the first day of January, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, shall be, and they are hereby, granted in legal subdivisions of not less than one hundred and sixty acres to said State, for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the capital of said State for legislative and judicial purposes, in such manner as the Legislature shall prescribe.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That twenty other entire sections of land, as aforesaid, to be selected and located as aforesaid, in legal subdivisions as aforesaid, shall be, and they are hereby, granted to said State for the purpose of erecting a suitable building for a penitentiary or State prison in the manner aforesaid.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That five per centum of the proceeds of the sales of all public lands lying within said State, which shall be sold by the United States subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said State, for the purpose of making and improving public roads, constructing ditches or canals to effect a general system of irrigation of the agricultural land in the State, as the Legislature shall direct.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That from and after the admission of the said State of Colorado into the Union, in pursuance of this act, the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within the said State as elsewhere within the United States, and said State shall constitute one judicial district, and be called the district of Colorado.

APPROVED, March 21, 1864.

CHAP. XXXVIII.—An Act amendatory of the Homestead Law, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in case of any person desirous of availing himself of the benefits of the homestead act of twentieth of May, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, but who, by reason of actual service in the military or naval service of the United States, is unable to do the personal preliminary acts at the district land office which the said act of twentieth May, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, requires, and whose family or some member thereof, is residing on the land which he desires to enter, and upon which a bona fide improvement and settlement have been made, it shall and may be lawful for such person to make the affidavit required by said act before the officer commanding in the branch of the service in which the party may be engaged, which affidavit shall be as binding in law, and with like penalties, as if taken before the register or receiver; and upon such affidavit being filed with the register by the wife or other representative of the party, the same shall become effective from the date of such filing, provided the said application and affidavit are accompanied by the fee and commissions, as required by law.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That besides the ten-dollar fee exacted by the said act, the homestead applicant shall hereafter pay to the register and receiver each, as commissions, at the time of entry, one per centum upon the cash price as fixed by law, of the land applied for, and like commissions when the claim is finally established and the certificate therefor issued as the basis of a patent.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in any case hereafter in which the applicant for the benefit of the homestead, and whose family or some member thereof, is residing on the land which he desires to enter, and upon which a bona fide improvement and settlement have been made, is prevented, by reason of distance, bodily infirmity, or other good cause, from personal attendance at the district land office, it shall and may be lawful for him to make the affidavit required by the original statute before the clerk of the court for the county in which the applicant is an actual resident, and to transmit the same, with the fee and commissions, to the register and receiver.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in lieu of the fee allowed by the twelfth section of the preemption act of fourth September, eighteen hundred and forty-one, the register and receiver shall each be entitled to one dollar for their services in acting upon preemption claims, and shall be allowed, jointly, at the rate of fifteen cents per hundred words for the testimony which may be reduced by them to writing for claimants, in establishing preemption or homestead rights, the regulations for giving proper effect to the provisions of this act to be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That where a preceptor has taken the initiatory steps required by existing laws in regard to actual settlement, and is called away from such settlement by being actually engaged in the military or naval service of the United States, and by reason of such absence is unable to appear at the district land office, to make, before the register or receiver, the affidavits required by the thirteenth section of the preemption act of fourth September, eighteen hundred and forty-one, the time for filing such affidavit and making final proof and entry or location, shall be extended six months after the expiration of his term of service, upon satisfactory proof by affidavit, or the testimony of witnesses, that the said preceptor is so in the service, being filed with the register of the land office for the district in which his settlement is made.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted; That the registers and receivers in the State of California, in the State of Oregon, and in the Territories of Washington, Nevada, Colorado, Idaho, New Mexico, and Arizona, shall be entitled to collect and receive, in addition to the fees and allowances provided by this act, fifty per centum of said fees and allowances as compensation for their services: Provided, That the salary and fees allowed any register or receiver shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of three thousand dollars per annum.

APPROVED, March 21, 1864.

CHAP. XL.—An Act to provide for carrying the Mails from the United States to Foreign Ports, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all steamers and sailing vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, and bound from any port in the United States to any foreign port, or from any foreign port to any port in the United States, shall, before clearance, receive on board and securely convey all such mails as the Post Office Department of the United States, or any minister, consul, or commercial agent of the United States abroad shall offer, and promptly deliver the same to the proper authorities, on arriving at the port of destination, and shall receive for such service such reasonable compensation as may be allowed by law.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That upon the entry of every steamer or sailing vessel from any foreign port, the master or commander thereof shall make return, on oath or affirmation, showing that he has promptly delivered at such foreign port or ports all mails placed on board of the steamer or vessel under his command before clearance from the United States. And in case the master or commander shall fail to make oath or affirmation as aforesaid, showing that he has delivered the mails placed on board his steamer or vessel in good faith, the said steamer or vessel shall not be entitled to the privileges of a steamer or vessel of the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and is hereby, authorized to make contracts, to continue not exceeding four years, for the transportation of all mailable matter other than letters, and of such letters as may be so directed, by the Isthmus of Panama or the Nicaragua route, or both of them: Provided, That the expenditure for the service shall not exceed one hundred and sixty thousand dollars per annum. And in case more than one company is engaged in rendering this service, the Postmaster General shall determine the proportion which shall be paid to each.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all mailable matter which may be conveyed by mail westward beyond the western boundary of Kansas, and eastward from the eastern boundary of California shall be subject to prepaid letter postage rates: Provided, however, That this section shall not be held to extend to the transmission by mail of newspapers from a known office of publication to bona fide subscribers, not exceeding one copy to each subscriber, nor to franked matter, to and from the intermediate points between the boundaries above named, at the usual rates: Provided further, That such franked matter shall be subject to such regulations as to its transmission and delivery as the Postmaster General shall prescribe.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General may, if he shall deem it for the public interests, enter into contracts for any period not exceeding one year, for the transportation of the mails in steamships, by sea, between any of the ports in the United States; and that the sea service already performed by his order on the Atlantic coast and Gulf of Mexico be paid for out of any moneys appropriated for the service of the Post Office Department. Also, for such service already performed upon the Pacific coast a sum not exceeding fifteen hundred dollars, to be paid for out of any moneys appropriated for the service of the Post Office Department.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall paint, print, post, or in any other manner place upon, or attach to, any steamboat or other vessel, or any stage coach or other vehicle, which steamboat or other vessel, or stage coach or other vehicle, is not actually used in carrying the mails of the United States, the words "United States mail," or any other words, letters or characters of like import; or if any person or persons shall give notice, either by publishing in any newspaper or otherwise, that any steamboat or other vessel, or any stage coach or other vehicle, is used in carrying the mails of the United States, when the same is not actually so used, every person so offending or willfully aiding or abetting therein, shall, on conviction thereof in any court of competent jurisdiction, be fined in any sum not less than one hundred nor more than five hundred dollars for every such offense; one half for the use of the United States and the other half to the use of the person informing and prosecuting for the same.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to suspend the operation of so much of the eighth section of the act of the thirty-first of August, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, as authorizes the conveyance of letters otherwise than in the mails on any such mail routes as in his opinion the public interest may require.

APPROVED, March 25, 1864.

CHAP. XLI.—An Act to authorize the President to negotiate a Treaty with the Klamath, Modoc, and other Indian Tribes in Southeastern Oregon.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized to conclude a treaty with the Klamath, Modoc, and Snake Indians in southeastern Oregon for the purchase of the country occupied by them.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the sum of twenty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

APPROVED, March 25, 1864.

CHAP. XLII.—An Act to carry into effect the Convention with Ecuador for the mutual Adjustment of Claims.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for the purpose of carrying into effect the convention with Ecuador for the mutual adjustment of claims, signed at Quito, on the twenty-fifth day of November, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, the commissioner to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be allowed a compensation, in full for his services, of three thousand dollars, and ten dollars a day in commutation of traveling expenses for the time actually and necessarily occupied in going from the place of his residence to Guayaquil and returning to his home after the termination of his duties.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if the President shall elect to appoint the minister resident of the United States in Ecuador to perform the duties of commissioner under the convention aforesaid, said minister shall receive a compensation for his services of fifty per centum of the sum hereinbefore mentioned, pursuant to the provisions of the ninth section of the act of August eighteenth, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, "to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States."

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and hereby is, authorized to make such provision for the contingent expenses of the commission under the said convention, including the moiety of the United States for the compensation of the umpire, and of the secretary who may be chosen by the commissioners, pursuant to the provisions of the convention, as he shall deem just and proper.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That such sums of money as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act be, and they are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

APPROVED, March 28, 1864.

CHAP. XLV.—An Act making Appropriations for the Support of the Military Academy for the year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-five.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-five:

For pay of officers, instructors, cadets, and musicians, one hundred and seventeen thousand one hundred and seventy-six dollars.

For commutation of subsistence, four thousand one hundred and sixty-one dollars.

For pay in lieu of clothing to officers' servants, sixty dollars.

For current and ordinary expenses, as follows: repairs and improvements, fuel and apparatus, forage, postage, telegrams, stationery, transportation, printing, clerks, miscellaneous and incidental expenses, and departments of instruction, forty-one thousand two hundred and eighty dollars.

For gradual increase and expense of library, one thousand dollars.

For expenses of the Board of Visitors, four thousand dollars.

For forage for artillery and cavalry horses, eight thousand six hundred and forty dollars.

For supplying horses for artillery and cavalry exercise, one thousand dollars.

For repairs of officers' quarters, one thousand five hundred dollars.

For targets and batteries for artillery exercise, one hundred dollars.

For furniture for hospital for cadets, including fixed wash-tubs, hot and cold water bath apparatus and water closets, one thousand dollars.

For annual repairs of gas pipes and retorts, three hundred dollars.

For warming apparatus for barracks, fifteen thousand dollars.

For rebuilding public wharf and opening approach to the same from the south, six thousand dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the thirty-fifth section of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March three, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, shall not be deemed hereafter to prohibit the payment to enlisted men employed at the Military Academy of the extra-duty pay heretofore allowed by law to enlisted men when employed at constant labor for not less than ten days continuously.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That from and after the first day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, the annual pay of cadets at the Military Academy at West Point shall be the same as that allowed to midshipmen at the Naval Academy, and the amount necessary for that purpose is hereby appropriated.

Laws of the United States.

38TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That cadets found deficient at any examination shall not be continued at the Military Academy, or be reappointed except upon the recommendation of the academic board.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be applied to the support or pay of any cadets hereafter appointed not in conformity with the express provisions of law regulating appointments of cadets at that Academy.

APPROVED, April 1, 1864.

CHAP. XLVI.—An Act to increase the Pension of the Revolutionary Pensioners now on the Rolls of the Pension Office.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of one hundred dollars per annum to each of the surviving soldiers of the Revolution, now on the pension rolls, during their natural lives, in addition to the pensions to which they are now entitled under former acts of Congress; said payment to date from, and commence on, the first day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and to cease at their death.

APPROVED, April 1, 1864.

CHAP. XLVII.—An Act relating to Acting Assistant Paymasters in the Navy, and regulating the appointment of Cadets in the Naval Academy.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the President of the United States shall nominate any acting assistant paymaster in the volunteer naval service, on account of his faithful, diligent, and efficient discharge of duty in the volunteer service, to be an assistant paymaster in the Navy, it shall be no objection to his appointment and confirmation that he is over twenty-six years of age: Provided, That he be not over thirty years of age: And provided further, That the number of paymasters and assistant paymasters, as authorized by law, be not increased thereby.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the students of the Naval Academy, when examined for admission thereto, shall be between the ages of fourteen and eighteen years.

APPROVED, April 1, 1864.

CHAP. XLVIII.—An Act to provide for the better organization of Indian Affairs in California.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from and after the first day of April, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-four, the State of California shall, for Indian purposes, constitute one superintendency, for which there shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a superintendent of Indian affairs for said superintendency, at a salary of three thousand six hundred dollars per annum, who shall reside at a point within said State, to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior, and who, upon executing a bond, upon such terms and such sum as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and taking the usual oath of office, shall have under his control and management, in like manner and subject to like rules and regulations as are prescribed for superintendents of other superintendencies, the Indians and Indian reservations that are or may hereafter be established in said State: Provided, That the superintendent shall be authorized to appoint a clerk, at a compensation not to exceed eighteen hundred dollars per annum.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be set apart by the President, and at his discretion, not exceeding four tracts of land, within the limits of said State, to be retained by the United States for the purposes of Indian reservations, which shall be of suitable extent for the accommodation of the Indians of said State, and shall be located as remote from white settlements as may be found practicable, having due regard to their adaptation to the purposes for which they are intended: Provided, That at least one of said tracts shall be located in what has heretofore been known as the northern district: And provided further, That if it shall be found impracticable to establish the reservations herein contemplated without embracing improvements made within their limits by white persons lawfully there, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to contract for the purchase of such improvements, at a price not exceeding a fair valuation thereof, to be made under his direction. But no such contract shall be valid, nor any money paid thereon, until, upon a report of said contract and of said valuation to Congress, the same shall be approved and the money appropriated by law for that purpose: And provided further, That said tracts to be set apart as aforesaid may, or may not, as in the discretion of the President may be deemed for the best interests of the Indians to be provided for, include any of the Indian reservations heretofore set apart in said State, and that in case any such reservation is so included, the same may be enlarged to such an extent as in the opinion of the President may be necessary, in order to its complete adaptation to the purposes for which it is intended.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the several Indian reservations in California which shall not be retained for the purposes of Indian reservations under the provisions of the preceding section of this act, shall, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be surveyed into lots or parcels of suitable size, and as far as practicable in conformity to the surveys of the public lands, which said lots shall, under his direction, be appraised by disinterested persons at their cash value, and shall thereupon, after due advertisement, as now provided by law in case of other public lands, be offered for sale at public outcry, and thence afterward shall be held subject to sale at private entry, according to such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided, That no lot shall be disposed of at less than the appraised value, nor at less than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre: And provided further, That said sale shall be conducted by the register and receiver of the land office in the district in which such reservation or reservations may be situated, in accordance with the instructions of the Department regulating the sale of public lands.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint an Indian agent for each of the reservations which shall be established under the provisions of this act, which said agent shall reside upon the reservation for which he shall be appointed, and shall discharge all the duties now or hereafter to be required of Indian agents by law, or by rules and regulations adopted, or to be adopted, for the regulation of the Indian service, so far as the same may be applicable. Each of the agents appointed as aforesaid shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, give bond in such penalties and with such conditions and such security as the President or Secretary of the Interior may require, and shall hold his office for the term of four years, unless sooner removed by the President, and shall receive an annual salary at the rate of eighteen hundred dollars.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That there may be appointed, in the manner prescribed by law, for each of said reservations, if in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior the welfare of said Indians shall require it, one physician, one blacksmith, one assistant blacksmith, one farmer, and one carpenter, who shall each receive compensation at rates to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, not exceeding fifty dollars per month.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That hereafter, when it shall become necessary to survey any Indian or other reservations, or any lands, the same shall be surveyed under the direction and control of the General Land Office, and as nearly as may be in conformity to the rules and regulations under which other public lands are surveyed.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That all Indian agents shall reside at their respective agencies, and shall in no case be permitted to visit the city of Washington except when ordered to do so by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. And it is hereby made the duty of the said Commissioner to report all cases of the violation of this section to the President, with the request that the agents disregarding the provisions herein contained be at once removed from office.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and all offices and employments connected with Indian affairs in California not provided for in this act be, and the same are hereby, abolished.

APPROVED, April 8, 1864.

CHAP. XLIX.—An Act to incorporate the Union Gaslight Company of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Sayles J. Bowen, William Elmer, William Bates, Robert W. Milbank, Andrew M. Kinney, William H. Baldwin, Z. D. Gilman, D. C. Forney, S. P. Brown, John Green, and Gamaliel Gay, and their associates and assigns, be, and they are hereby, created a body corporate, under the name of The Union Gaslight Company of the District of Columbia, with authority to manufacture and sell gas, to be made of coal, zinc, oil, tar, pitch, peat, turpentine, or other material, and to be used in lighting the city of Washington and the streets thereof, and any buildings, manufactories, or houses therein situated, and to lay mains and pipes for the purpose of conducting gas in any of the avenues, streets, lanes, or alleys of the said city: Provided, however, That the said company shall so conduct the manufacture, and lay said mains and pipes, as not to create a nuisance or injure either private or public property: And provided further, That the said mains and pipes shall be laid subject to such conditions and in compliance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the municipal authorities of the city of Washington; and the right to erect and establish any buildings, apparatus, or machinery for the manufacture of gas, shall be subject to such regulations and restrictions as may be from time to time prescribed by the said municipal authorities of Washington.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of the said company shall not be less than five hundred thousand, nor more than one million dollars, and that the said stock shall be divided into shares of one hundred dollars each, and shall be deemed personal property and be transferable in such manner as the by-laws of said company may direct.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That within six days after this act is approved by the President of the United States, the incorporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, or, if any refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the others, shall cause books of subscription to the capital stock of said company to be opened and kept open in some convenient place in the city of Washington, from nine o'clock in the forenoon till three o'clock in the afternoon, for a period of not less than three days, and as much longer as the said incorporators shall prescribe, and the said incorporators shall give public notice of the time and place of opening said books of subscription, by advertisement thereof in the daily papers published in the city of Washington, and subscribers to the capital stock of said company shall be held to be stockholders: Provided, That every subscriber shall pay at the time of subscribing twenty-five per centum of the amount subscribed by him to the treasurer, who shall be appointed by the said incorporators to receive the same, or his subscription shall be null and void.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That when the minimum amount of the capital stock of said company, as prescribed in the second section, shall have been subscribed, and twenty-five per centum thereof paid as aforesaid, the said incorporators, or a majority of them, and in case any refuse to act, then a majority of the others, shall, within fifteen days thereafter, call the first meeting of the stockholders of said company, to be held at some convenient place in the city of Washington, for the election of directors, of the time and place whereof notice shall be given for at least five days in at least two daily newspapers published in the city of Washington, or by written notice thereof, signed by one or more of said corporations, and personally served on each stockholder; and in all meetings of the stockholders each share shall entitle the holder to one vote, to be given either in person or by proxy.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the government and direction of the affairs of the company shall be vested in the board of directors, composed of seven members, who shall be stockholders, and who shall hold their office for the term of one year, and until others are duly elected and qualified to take their places as directors; and the said directors shall elect one of their number to be president of the board, who shall also be president of the company, and a majority of the board shall constitute a quorum to do business; and they shall choose a treasurer, who shall give bond with sufficient surety to said company, in such sum as the said directors may require, for the faithful discharge of his trust. In case of a vacancy in the board of directors by death, resignation, removal, refusal to act, or otherwise, the vacancy occasioned thereby shall be filled by the other directors.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That there shall be an annual meeting of the stockholders, for the election of directors, to be held at such time and place, and under such rules and regulations as the said company in their by-laws shall prescribe, and the directors shall make an annual report in writing of their proceedings to the stockholders.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the directors shall have full power to make all such by-laws as they shall deem necessary for the regulation, management, and disposition of the stock, effects, and property of the said company, and for the proper execution of the business of the company, so as the same shall not be contrary to this charter, to the laws of the United States, or to the ordinances of the city of Washington.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize the said company to issue any note, token, device, scrip, or other evidence of debt to be used as a currency.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall willfully destroy, or in any wise injure the mains, pipes, apparatus, or other works, property, or appurtenances belonging to and used by said company in manufacturing gas or in furnishing the same to consumers thereof, the person or persons so offending shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay to the said company the sum of five dollars, and shall, in addition to said penalty, remain liable to said company for any loss or damage occasioned by the offense.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the said company is hereby incorporated upon the express conditions that it shall furnish gas to all the consumers thereof containing fifty per centum more illuminating power than that which is now furnished by the Washington Gaslight Company, and at a cost not exceeding two dollars and fifty cents per thousand cubic feet; and a failure to comply with these conditions shall operate as a forfeiture of this charter.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall not be authorized to sell gas until it shall have produced to the Mayor of the city of Washington and to the Secretary of the Interior satisfactory evidence that it has laid down, in a proper and workmanlike manner, in the avenues and streets of the said city, gas mains of an average diameter of at least six inches and a total length of not less than twenty-five miles; nor shall the said company connect its gas mains with the pipes supplying the Capitol and other public buildings belonging to the United States, or sell gas, until it shall have produced to the Secretary of the Interior satisfactory evidence that it has erected and in operation good and substantial works and holders capable of manufacturing and storing a quantity of gas, of the quality aforesaid, sufficient to supply the consumption at all times required in the Capitol and public buildings aforesaid. And unless the said company shall have complied with the requirements and conditions in this section prescribed within two years from the passage of this act, the said act shall be null and void: Provided, however, That said company shall have the privilege, at any time within the said two years, of lighting with the gas manufactured by it some one street a distance not exceeding one mile.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That each of the stockholders in the Union Gaslight Company of the District of Columbia shall be held liable in his or her individual capacity for all the debts and liabilities of the said company, however contracted or incurred, to be recovered by suit as other debts or liabilities, before the court or tribunal having jurisdiction of the case.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That this act may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed by the Congress of the United States.

APPROVED, April 8, 1864.

CHAP. L.—An Act to incorporate Providence Hospital of the City of Washington, District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Lucy Gwynn, Teresa Angela Costello, Sarah McDonald, Mary E. Spalding, and Mary Carroll, and their successors in office, are hereby made, declared, and constituted a corporation and body-politic, in law and in fact, under the name and style of the Directors of Providence Hospital, and by that name they shall be and are hereby made capable in law to sue and be sued, to plead and be impleaded, in any court within the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia; to have and use a common seal, and to alter or amend the same at pleasure; to have, purchase, receive, possess, and enjoy, any estate in lands, tenements, annuities, goods, chattels, moneys, or effects, and to grant, devise, or dispose of the same in such manner as they may deem most for the interest of the hospital: Provided, That the real estate held by said corporation shall not exceed in value the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation and body-politic shall have full power to appoint from their own body a president and such other officers as they may deem necessary for the purposes of their creation; and in case of the death, resignation, or refusal to serve, of any of their number, the remaining members shall elect and appoint other persons in lieu of those whose places may have been vacated; and the said corporation shall have full power and all the rights of opening and keeping a hospital in the city of Washington for the care of such sick and invalid persons as may place themselves under the treatment and care of the said corporation.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall also have and enjoy full power and authority to make such by-laws, rules, and regulations, as may be necessary for the general accomplishment of the objects of said hospital: Provided, That they be not inconsistent with the laws in force in the District of Columbia: And provided, further, That this act shall be liable to be amended, altered, or repealed, at the pleasure of Congress.

APPROVED, April 8, 1864.

CHAP. LI.—An Act concerning Notaries Public for the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That notaries public for the District of Columbia may be appointed by the supreme court of said District, whose term of office shall be five years, and who may be removed by said court for cause. There shall be no new appointment of a notary public until the number in this District is reduced to twenty-five; and when the number is so reduced, as vacancies thereafter occur, they may be filled by said court.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That each notary public hereafter appointed, before entering upon the duties of his office, shall take an oath faithfully to discharge the same, and shall give bond to the United States in the sum of two thousand dollars, with security to be approved by the said supreme court, or a judge thereof, for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office. And the said court shall, with reasonable dispatch, by a general order to be published in one or more newspapers printed in the said District, require all persons now holding the commission of notary public in said District to give new bond, as hereinbefore provided for, within a short time to be prescribed therein; and all such persons failing to comply therewith shall be stricken from the list of notaries.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That notaries public shall have authority to demand acceptance and payment of foreign bills of exchange, and to protest the same for non-acceptance and non-payment; and to exercise such other powers and duties as, by the law of nations, and according to commercial usages, or for use and effect beyond the jurisdiction of the said District, as, according to the law of any State or Territory of the United States, or any foreign Government in amity with the United States, may be performed by notaries public.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That notaries public may also demand acceptance of inland bills of exchange, and payment thereof, and of promissory notes, and may protest the same for non-acceptance or non-payment, as the case may require.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That each notary public shall have power to take and to certify the acknowledgment or proof of powers of attorney, mortgages, deeds, and other instruments of writing executed by any married woman, to take depositions, and to administer oaths and affirmations in all matters incident or belonging to the duties of his office, and to take affidavits to be used before any court, judge, or officer within this District.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That each notary public shall keep a fair record of all his official acts, except such as are mentioned in the fifth section of this act; and when required shall give a certified copy of any record in his office to any person, upon payment of the fees therefor.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That each notary public, before he acts as such, shall provide a notarial seal, with which he shall authenticate all his official acts, which seal, together with his records and official documents, shall not be liable to be seized on by any execution. He shall deposit an impression of his official seal in the office of the clerk of the supreme court of said District.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That on the death, resignation, or removal from office of any notary public, his records, together with all his official papers, shall be deposited in the office of the clerk of the supreme court of said District.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the original protest of a notary public, under his hand and official seal, of any bill of exchange or promissory note for non-acceptance or non-payment, stating the presentment by him of such bill of exchange or note for acceptance or payment, and the non-acceptance or non-payment thereof, and the service of notice on any or all of the parties to such bill of exchange or promissory note, and specifying the mode of giving such notice, and the reputed place of residence of the party to whom the same was given, and the post office nearest thereto, shall be prima facie evidence of the facts contained therein. The certificate of a notary public, under his hand and seal of office, drawn from his record, stating the protest and the facts therein recorded, shall be evidence of the facts in like manner as the original protest.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the fees of notaries public shall be as follows: For each certificate and seal, fifty cents; taking depositions or other writings, for each one hundred words, ten cents; administering an oath, fifteen cents; taking acknowledgment of a deed or power of attorney, with certificate thereof, fifty cents; every protest of a bill of exchange or promissory note, and recording the same, one dollar and seventy-five cents; each notice of protest, ten cents; each demand for acceptance or payment, if accepted or paid, one dollar, to be paid by the party accepting or paying the same; each noting of protest, one dollar. And any notary public who shall take a higher fee than is prescribed by this act shall pay a fine of one hundred dollars and be removed from office by the said supreme court.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

APPROVED, April 8, 1864.

CHAP. LII.—An Act to authorize the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind to confer Degrees.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the board of directors of the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to grant and confirm such degrees in the liberal arts and sciences to such pupils of the institution, or others, who, by their proficiency in learning or other meritorious distinction they shall think entitled to them, as are usually granted and conferred in colleges; and to grant to such graduates diplomas or certificates, sealed and signed in such manner as said board of directors may determine, to authenticate and perpetuate the memory of such graduation.

APPROVED, April 8, 1864.

CHAP. LIII.—An Act to amend section nine of the Act approved July seventeenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, entitled "An Act to define the Pay and Emoluments of certain Officers of the Army, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the rank of chaplain without command in the regular and volunteer service of the United States, is hereby recognized. Chaplains shall be borne on the field and staff rolls next after the surgeons, and shall wear such uniform as is or may be prescribed by the Army regulations, and shall be subject to the same rules and regulations as other officers of the Army. They shall be entitled to draw forage for two horses, and, when assigned to hospitals, posts, and forts, they shall be entitled to quarters and fuel within the hospitals, posts, or forts, while they are so assigned, without the privilege of commutation, subject to the same conditions and limitations as are now by law provided in the case of surgeons. When absent from duty with leave, or on account of sickness or other disability, or when held by the enemy as prisoners, they shall be subject to no other diminution or loss of pay and allowances than other officers in the military service are under like circumstances. And chaplains who have been absent from duty, by reason of wounds or sickness, or when held as prisoners in the hands of the enemy, shall be entitled to receive full pay without rations during such absence. In all other respects, the pay of chaplains shall be the same as now provided by law.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the act approved July fourteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, entitled, "An act to grant pensions," is hereby so amended as to include chaplains in the regular and volunteer forces of the Army: Provided, That the pension to which a chaplain shall be entitled for a total disability shall be twenty dollars per month, and all the provisions of the act to which this section is an amendment shall apply to and embrace the widows, children, mothers, and sisters of chaplains of the land forces who have died since the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, or shall die of wounds or disease contracted in the service of the United States, and while such chaplains are or shall be in the line of their duty.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of chaplains in the military service of the United States to make monthly reports to the Adjutant General of the Army, through the usual military channels, of the moral condition and general history of the regiments, hospitals, or posts to which they may be attached; and it shall be the duty of all commanders of regiments, hospitals, and posts to render such facilities as will aid in the discharge of the duties assigned to them by the Government.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all chaplains in the military service of the United States shall hold appropriate religious services at the burial of soldiers who may die in the command to which they are assigned to duty, and it shall be their duty to hold public religious services at least once each Sabbath when practicable.

APPROVED, April 9, 1864.

CHAP. LIV.—An Act to appoint an Appraiser and Assistant Appraiser for the Port of Portland, and for other purposes..

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint an appraiser and assistant appraiser for the port of Portland, Maine, whose duties shall be the same as those of similar officers in other ports; and the ninth section of the act of Congress passed May seventh, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, entitled "An act further to establish the compensation of officers of the customs and to alter certain collection districts, and for other purposes," is hereby amended by adding Portland aforesaid to the ports therein enumerated, and the deputy collectors, not exceeding three in number, and the appraiser of said port shall each receive the compensation of two thousand dollars per annum, and the assistant appraiser shall receive a compensation of fifteen hundred dollars per annum.

APPROVED, April 9, 1864.

CHAP. LVIII.—An Act extending the Time within which the States and Territories may accept the Grant of Lands made by the Act entitled "An Act donating Public Lands to the several States and Territories which may provide Colleges for the Benefit of Agriculture and the Mechanic Arts," approved July second, eighteen hundred and sixty-two.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any State or Territory may accept and shall be entitled to the benefits of the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July second, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, by expressing its acceptance thereof as provided in said act, within two years from the date of the approval of this act, subject, however, to the conditions in said act contained.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the benefit of the provisions of this act, and of the said act approved July second, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, be, and the same are hereby, extended to the State of West Virginia.

APPROVED, April 14, 1864.

CHAP. LXIX.—An Act to enable the People of Nebraska to form a Constitution and State Government, and for the Admission of such State into the Union on an equal Footing with the original States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the inhabitants of that portion of the Territory of Nebraska included in the boundaries hereinafter designated be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government, with the name aforesaid, which State, when so formed, shall be admitted into the Union as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said State of Nebraska shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries, to wit: Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the western boundary of the State of Missouri with the fortieth degree of north latitude; extending thence due west along said fortieth degree of north latitude to a point formed by its intersection with the twenty-fifth degree of longitude west from Washington; thence north along said twenty-fifth degree of longitude to a point formed by its intersection with the forty-first degree of north latitude; thence west along said forty-first degree of north latitude to a point formed by its intersection with the twenty-seventh degree of longitude west from Washington; thence north along said twenty-seventh degree of west longitude to a point formed by its intersection with the forty-third degree of north latitude; thence east along said forty-third degree of north latitude to the Reya Paha river; thence down the middle of the channel of said river, with its meanderings, to its junction with the Niobrara river; thence down the middle of the channel of said Niobrara river; and following the meanderings thereof, to its junction with the Missouri river; thence down the middle of the channel of said Missouri river, and following the meanderings thereof, to the place of beginning.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all persons qualified by law to vote for representatives to the General Assembly of said Territory shall be qualified to be elected; and they are hereby authorized to vote for and choose representatives to form a convention, under such rules and regulations as the Governor of said Territory may prescribe, and also to vote upon the acceptance or rejection of such constitution as may be formed by said convention, under such rules and regulations as said convention may prescribe; and if any of said citizens are enlisted in the Army of the United States, and are still within said Territory, they shall be permitted to vote at their place of rendezvous; and if any are absent from said Territory, by reason of their enlistment in the Army of the United States, they shall be permitted to vote at their place of service, under the rules and regulations in each case to be prescribed as aforesaid; and the aforesaid representatives to form the aforesaid convention shall be apportioned among the several counties in said Territory in proportion to the population as near as may be, and said apportionment shall be made for said Territory by the Governor, United States district attorney, and chief justice thereof, or any two of them. And the Governor of said Territory shall, by proclamation, on or before the first Monday of May next, order an election of the representatives aforesaid to be held on the first Monday in June thereafter throughout the Territory; and such election shall be conducted in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of said Territory regulating elections therein for members of the House of Representatives; and the number of members to said convention shall be the same as now constitute both branches of the Legislature of the aforesaid Territory.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the members of the convention thus elected shall meet at the capital of said Territory on the first Monday in July next, and after organization shall declare, on behalf of the people of said Territory, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States; whereupon the said convention shall be, and it is hereby, authorized to form a constitution and State government: Provided, That the constitution when formed shall be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence: And provided further, That said constitution shall provide, by an article forever irrevocable, without the consent of the Congress of the United States:

First. That slavery or involuntary servitude shall be forever prohibited in said State.

Second. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship.

Third. That the people inhabiting said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within said Territory, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States, and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed higher than the land belonging to residents thereof, and that no taxes shall be imposed by said State on lands or property therein belonging to or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That in case a constitution and State government shall be formed for the people of said Territory of Nebraska, in compliance with the provisions of this act, that said convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution to the people of said State for their ratification or rejection at an election to be held on the second Tuesday of October, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four, at such places and under such regulations as may be prescribed therein, at which election the qualified voters, as hereinbefore provided, shall vote directly for or against the proposed constitution, and the returns of said elections shall be made to the acting Governor of the Territory, who, together with the United States district attorney and chief justice of the said Territory, or any two of them, shall canvass the same, and if a majority of legal votes shall be cast for said constitution in said proposed State, the said acting Governor shall certify the same to the President of the United States, together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances; whereupon it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action whatever on the part of Congress.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That until the next general census shall be taken said State of Nebraska shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States, which Representative, together with the Governor and State and other officers provided for in said constitution, may be elected on the same day a vote is taken for or against the proposed constitution and State government.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That sections numbered sixteen and thirty-six in every township, and when such sections have been sold or otherwise disposed of by any act of Congress, other lands equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter section, and as contiguous as may be, shall be, and are hereby, granted to said State for the support of common schools.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That provided the State of Nebraska shall be admitted into the Union in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this act, that twenty entire sections of the unappropriated public lands within said State, to be selected and located by direction of the Legislature thereof, on or before the first day of January, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, shall be, and they are hereby, granted, in legal subdivisions of not less than one hundred and sixty acres, to said State for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the capital of said State for legislative and judicial purposes, in such manner as the Legislature shall prescribe.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That fifty other entire sections of land, as aforesaid, to be selected and located as aforesaid, in legal subdivisions as aforesaid, shall be, and they are hereby, granted to said State for the purpose of erecting a suitable building for a penitentiary or State prison in the manner aforesaid.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That seventy-two other sections of land shall be set apart and reserved for the use and support of a State university, to be selected in manner as aforesaid, and to be appropriated and applied as the Legislature of said State may prescribe for the purpose named, and for no other purpose.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That all salt springs within said State, not exceeding twelve in number, with six sections of land adjoining, or as contiguous as may be to each, shall be granted to said State for its use, the said land to be selected by the Governor thereof, within one year after the admission of the State, and when so selected to be used or disposed of on such terms, conditions, and regulations as the Legislature shall direct: Provided, That no salt spring or lands, the right whereof is now vested in any individual or individuals, or which hereafter shall be confirmed or adjudged to any individual or individuals, shall, by this act, be granted to said State.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That five per centum of the proceeds of the sales of all public lands lying within said State, which have been or shall be sold by the United States prior or subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said State for the support of common schools.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That from and after the admission of the said State of Nebraska into the Union in pursuance of this act, the laws of the United States, not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said State as elsewhere within the United States; and said State shall constitute one judicial district, and be called the district of Nebraska.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That any unexpended balance of the appropriations for said territorial legislative expenses of Nebraska remaining for the fiscal years eighteen hundred and sixty-three and eighteen hundred and sixty-four, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be applied to and used for defraying the expenses of said convention and for the payment of the members thereof, under the same rules, regulations, and rates as are now provided by law for the payment of the Territorial Legislature.

APPROVED, April 19, 1864.

CHAP. LX.—An Act in addition to an Act for the establishment of certain Arsenals.

Whereas it is necessary that the Government of the United States should at an early day, for the purpose of the arsenal at Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, provided for in the act passed July eleventh, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, obtain the possession of and title to certain lands, now the property of private persons, upon which to locate the said arsenal, with the grounds and buildings needful for and to make a part of the same: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to take and hold full, complete, and permanent possession in behalf of the United States, of all the lands and shores of the island of Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, the same, when so possessed, to be held and kept as a military reservation by the War Department, upon which shall be built and maintained an arsenal for the construction, deposit, and repair of arms and munitions of war, and such other military establishments as have been or may be authorized by law to be placed thereon in connection with such arsenal.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if it shall appear upon examination by the Attorney General of the United States of the titles of the lands on Rock Island taken and occupied by the Secretary of War for an arsenal and other military purposes, as provided in the foregoing section, that any part or parcels thereof are now the property of, and are rightfully possessed by, any individual or corporation as his or their own private property, the value of such private property so taken, and a just compensation for any damages caused by such taking, shall, if mutually agreed on by the Secretary of War and the rightful owner or owners thereof and approved by the President, be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to said rightful owner or owners so agreeing, out of the appropriations made or to be made for the construction of said arsenal: Provided, That before such payment shall be made, the said owner or owners of such private lands so taken, or such of them as shall agree, shall by good and sufficient deed or deeds, in due form of law, and approved by the Attorney General of the United States, fully release and convey to the United States all their and each of their several and respective rights in and titles to such lands so taken.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That if the Secretary of War shall not agree with any private owner or owners of lands so taken for the use of the United States for military purposes, or if any such owner or owners shall refuse to accept the sum to be paid to him or them by the Secretary of the Treasury as and for the true value thereof, or shall from any other cause neglect or fail, for the space of twelve months after such taking to execute and deliver the deed or deeds thereof, needful in the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, to convey to the United States the title of said lands taken, there shall forthwith be selected three competent persons, who shall be named and appointed by the President, and shall by him be constituted a board of commissioners, whose duty it shall be to hear the parties interested, who may appear before them upon reasonable notice of time and place, and ascertain the true value of the land taken, and of the several parcels thereof that shall not have been conveyed to or paid for by the United States as hereinbefore provided, and the names and titles of the claimants thereof, if more than one, and their respective interests therein, and what compensation for the taking of their lands is due to each claimant; and the said board of commissioners shall report the same as early as practicable after their appointment to the circuit court of the United States within and for the district in which such lands are situated; and in case of a difference of opinion in the said board as to the matters referred to them, the report of a majority of the commissioners shall be held to be the report of the board. And the compensation and expenses of the said commissioners shall be fixed and approved by the Secretary of War, and paid by the Secretary of the Treasury upon his requisition.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said circuit court, upon the return and examination of the report of the said commissioners, shall, for the parcels of land taken, as to which there appear to be no conflicting claims for compensation, by decree, order the sums awarded by the commissioners in said report, to be paid to the person or persons who shall, according to said report, be entitled thereto, and who shall apply therefor, and who shall, by writing filed in the said court, waive his or their right to an appeal from the determination of the said board of commissioners, and agree to accept the said sum, in full satisfaction of his or their claims for such lands taken by the United States: Provided, That if the party entitled and applying as aforesaid, or filing a complaint as herein-after provided, shall have an estate for life only in said land, or any estate less than a fee simple, or shall be a married woman, or a minor, or non compos mentis, the court aforesaid shall, in its final judgment or decree, make such order for the payment of the said compensation to the party or for its payment into court; and as to the investment of the principal and disposal of the income, or interest thereof, as shall be just and equitable, and for the protection of the rights of those interested, in accordance with the rules and practice of courts of equity, in cases where a fund in court is to be divided and administered.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That any person or persons aggrieved by the doings of the aforesaid board of commissioners, in the estimation of his or their damages, or in the refusal or omission thereof, may at any time within twelve months from and after the return of said report to the said circuit court, or within three years after the land claim shall have been taken, make application by complaint in writing to the said court sitting as a court of equity, setting forth the title which he or they may have or claim in said lands taken, or in parcels thereof, and the grievance complained of; and the said court after reasonable notice to the district attorney of the United States for that district, who shall appear and act for and in behalf of the United States, shall proceed and hear the parties, and their evidence according to the course of proceedings in equity, and shall determine what right or title, if any, the complainant or complainants had in and to the parcels of land taken, claimed by him or them, and shall ascertain, and by decree fix the sum or sums of money to which as damages or just compensation for such taking the complainants, severally or jointly, if they apply jointly, are entitled: Provided, That if a complainant in any case shall, in writing or by motion, so request, the value of the land taken or his interest therein shall be assessed or determined by a jury upon the law side of the court, upon issues properly framed, under the direction or allowance of the court sitting in equity.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, if the attorney of the United States shall so request, the court may, before ordering issues to be framed for a jury, as provided in the foregoing section, require the complainants applying therefor to undertake and to give security satisfactory to the court therefor, that they will pay the costs of court to be taxed by the court, if the verdict of such jury shall not be in favor of such complainants, and for a sum larger than that allowed by the board of commissioners in their report; and the decision of all questions as to the amount of costs to be paid by or to the complainants shall be within the determination of the court at their discretion, and according to the rules of equity practiced in the courts of the United States.

Laws of the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That either party may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from any final judgment or decree which may be rendered by said circuit court in any case arising under the provisions of this statute, where the amount in controversy exceeds three thousand dollars: Provided, That such appeal shall be taken within ninety days after the rendition of such judgment or decree.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That in all cases of final judgments of decrees by said circuit court, or on appeal by the said Supreme Court, where the same shall be affirmed in favor of the claimant, the sum due thereby shall be paid either to the claimant or into the circuit court aforesaid, as said judgment or decree may determine, by the United States, out of the money appropriated for the construction and maintenance of said arsenal, on presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury of a copy of said judgment or decree signed by the presiding judge, and certified by the clerk of the said circuit court. And such payment shall be a full discharge to the United States for the compensation and damages due for the taking of the lands, in respect of which the said judgment or decree was rendered or made, and shall forever bar any further claim or demand against the United States arising out of the taking of such land. And such payment, or the lawful tender thereof, shall operate as, and shall be deemed and held to be, a full and complete conveyance of the parcel or parcels of land for which it was made to the United States.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That every claim against the United States for the taking of land for public use as herein authorized, shall be forever barred unless within three years from the time of such taking, the claim for compensation therefor shall be adjusted by agreement with the Secretary of War, or be settled by an award of the board of commissioners, or presented by complaint or petition to the circuit court of the United States in the district in which the land is situated: Provided, however, That the claims of persons, who at the time of the taking shall be under the age of twenty-one years, married women, idiots, lunatics, or insane, or beyond seas, shall not be barred if their petition or complaint be filed in said court as aforesaid, within three years after the disability has ceased, but no disability other than those enumerated shall prevent any claim from being barred, nor shall any of the said disabilities operate cumulatively.

APPROVED, April 19, 1864.

CHAP. LXI.—An Act fixing the date of the loss of the United States brig Bainbridge, and for the Relief of the Officers, Seamen, and Marines of the same, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the purpose of fixing the time at which shall commence the pensions, under the existing laws, of the widows and orphan children of the officers, seamen, marines, and others in service who were lost in the United States brig Bainbridge, as well as the time to which the pay of said officers, seamen, marines, and others in the service shall be allowed, the twenty-first day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, shall be deemed and taken to be the day on which the said brig Bainbridge foundered at sea.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the widow or child, or children, and in case there shall be no widow, or child or children, as aforesaid, then the parent or parents, and if there be no parents, the brothers and sisters of the officers, seamen, marines, and others in service, who were lost in said brig Bainbridge, shall be entitled to and receive, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to twelve months' pay of their respective deceased relations, aforesaid, in addition to the pay due to the said deceased at the date of the loss of said vessel.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and are hereby, authorized and directed to settle the accounts of Charles C. Walden, late acting assistant paymaster, in the Navy who was lost in the brig Bainbridge, with all his accounts and vouchers for expenditures and payment made by him, and with all the money, stores, and supplies procured for the use of said vessel, and to allow him a credit for whatever sum appears to be due from him on the books of the Department.

APPROVED, April 19, 1864.

CHAP. LXIII.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to establish and equalize the Grade of Line Officers of the United States Navy," approved July sixteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no line officer of the Navy, upon the active list, below the grade of commodore, nor any other naval officer, shall be promoted to a higher grade, until his mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform all his duties at sea shall be established to the satisfaction of a board of examining officers to be appointed by the President of the United States. And such board shall have power to take testimony, the witnesses when present to be sworn by the president of the board, and to examine all matter on the files and records of the Department in relation to any officer whose case shall be considered by them.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That such examining board shall consist of not less than three officers, senior in rank to the officer to be examined.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That any officer to be acted upon by said board shall have the right to be present, if he desires it; and his statement of his case, on oath, and the testimony of witnesses, and his examination, shall be recorded. And any matter on the files and records of the Department touching each case, as may in the opinion of the board be necessary to assist them in making up their opinion, shall, together with the whole record and finding, be presented to the President for his approval or disapproval of the finding. And no officer shall be rejected until after such public examination of himself and the records of the Department in his case, unless he fails to appear before said board after having been duly notified.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no officer in the naval service shall be promoted to a higher grade therein, upon the active list, until he has been examined by a board of naval surgeons, and pronounced physically qualified to perform all his duties at sea. And all officers whose cases shall have been acted upon by the aforesaid boards, and who shall not have been recommended for promotion by both of them, shall be placed upon the retired list.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all officers not recommended for promotion under the fourth section of an act entitled "An act to establish and equalize the grades of line officers of the United States Navy," approved July sixteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, shall have the right to present themselves for examination, according to the provisions of this act, and if found duly qualified, and such finding be approved by the President of the United States, they shall be promoted to the same grade and place as if they had been recommended by the board, and shall receive the corresponding pay according to the service which they have performed from the date of their rank to that of their promotion. And no further promotions shall be made upon the active list until the number in each grade is reduced to that provided by law.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That any officer in the naval service, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may be advanced, not exceeding thirty numbers, in his own grade, for distinguished conduct in battle, or extraordinary heroism.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall appoint paymasters of the fleet and engineers of the fleet in the same manner and with the same rank and pay as fleet surgeons; and the retired pay of surgeons, pay-masters, engineers, and other staff officers in the Navy shall be the same as that of the retired officers of the line of the Navy with whom they have relative rank.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That all acts or parts of acts which are inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

APPROVED, April 21, 1864.

CHAP. LXIV.—An Act to amend an Act for enrolling and calling out the National Forces so as to increase the Rank, Pay, and Emoluments of the Provost Marshal General.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the rank, pay, and emoluments of the Provost Marshal General, authorized by section five of said act, shall be those of a brigadier general.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

APPROVED, April 21, 1864.

CHAP. LXV.—An Act to change the Name of the District and Port of Presque Isle to the District and Port of Erie.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the district of Presque Isle, in the State of Pennsylvania, shall hereafter be known as the district of Erie, and the port of Presque Isle shall hereafter be known as the port of Erie.

APPROVED, April 21, 1864.

CHAP. LXVI.—An Act in amendment of an Act entitled "An Act relating to Foreign Coins and the Coinage of Cents at the Mint of the United States," approved February twenty-one, eighteen hundred and fifty-seven.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from and after the passage of this act, the standard weight of the cent coined at the Mint of the United States shall be forty-eight grains, or one tenth of one ounce troy; and said cent shall be composed of ninety-five per centum of copper, and five per centum of tin and zinc, in such proportions as shall be determined by the Director of the Mint; and there shall be from time to time struck and coined at the Mint a two-cent piece, of the same composition, the standard weight of which shall be ninety-six grains, or one fifth of one ounce troy, with no greater deviation than four grains to each piece of said cent and two-cent coins; and the shape, mottoes, and devices of said coins shall be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the laws now in force relating to the coinage of cents and providing for the purchase of material and prescribing the appropriate duties of the officers of the Mint and the Secretary of the Treasury be, and the same are hereby, extended to the coinage herein provided for.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all laws now in force relating to the coins of the United States and the striking and coining the same shall, so far as applicable, be extended to the coinage herein authorized, whether said laws are penal or otherwise, for the security of the coin, regulating and guarding the process of striking and coining, for preventing debasement or counterfeiting, or for any other purpose.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Director of the Mint shall prescribe suitable regulations to insure a due conformity to the required weights and proportions of alloy in the said coins; and shall order trials thereof to be made from time to time by the assayer of the Mint, whereof a report shall be made in writing to the Director.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said coins shall be a legal tender in any payment, the one-cent coin to the amount of ten cents, and the two-cent coin to the amount of twenty cents; and it shall be lawful to pay out said coins in exchange for the lawful currency of the United States, (except cents or half cents issued under former acts of Congress,) in suitable sums, by the treasurer of the Mint, and by such other deposit-aries as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, under general regulations proposed by the Director of the Mint and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the expenses incident to such exchange, distribution, and transmission, may be paid out of the profits of said coinage; and the net profits of said coinage, ascertained in like manner as is prescribed in the second section of the act to which this is a supplement, shall be transferred to the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall make, issue, or pass, or cause to be made, issued, or passed, any coin, card, token, or device whatsoever, in metal or its compounds, intended to pass or be passed as money for a one-cent piece or a two-cent piece, such person or persons shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.

APPROVED, April 22, 1864.

CHAP. LXVII.—An Act for a Charter of Masonic Hall Association, in Washington City, District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That B. B. French, of the Grand Encampment of the United States of America; Robert McMurdy, of the General Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the United States; George C. Whiting, of the Grand Consistory; E. L. Stevens, of Osiris Lodge of Perfection, No. 1; Z. D. Gilman, of Washington Commandery, No. 1; W. P. Partello, of Columbia Commandery; W. M. Smith, of Columbia Royal Arch Chapter, No. 15; W. G. Parkhurst, of Washington Royal Arch Chapter, No. 16; James Steele, of Mount Vernon Royal Arch Chapter, No. 20; C. F. Stansbury, of the Grand Lodge of the District of Columbia; Joseph Nairn, of Federal Lodge, No. 1; N. Acker, of Lebanon Lodge, No. 7; E. Kloman, of New Jerusalem Lodge, No. 9; J. M. Turton, of Hiram Lodge, No. 10; T. J. Fisher, of Saint John's Lodge, No. 11; L. Gassenheimer, of National Lodge, No. 12; J. Van Riswick, of Washington Centennial Lodge, No. 14; J. C. McGuire, of B. B. French Lodge, No. 15; F. L. Harvey, of Dawson Lodge, No. 16; J. W. D. Gray, of Harmony Lodge, No. 17; J. M. Hanson, of Acacia Lodge, No. 18; N. D. Larner, of Lafayette Lodge, No. 19, of the Order of Free and Accepted Masons, of the District of Columbia, and their successors to be appointed in the manner hereinafter declared, representing the several masonic bodies before named, be, and they are hereby, incorporated and made a body-politic and corporate, by the name of the Masonic Hall Association of the District of Columbia, and by that name may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, in any court of law or equity, of competent jurisdiction, and may have and use a common seal, and the same change at pleasure, and be entitled to use and exercise all the powers, rights, and privileges incident to such corporation.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall be capable of taking and holding real and personal estate, which estate, personal and real, shall never be divided among the members of the said corporation, but shall descend to their successors, duly elected and appointed in the manner hereinafter declared by the bodies they represent, for the promotion of the principles of the said corporation, and the benevolent purposes of the Order of Free and Accepted Masons, which they represent: Provided, That said corporation shall take and hold no more land than is necessary for a site on which to erect a masonic hall, suitable and convenient for the transaction of the business of the association and the promotion of the principles and purposes aforesaid. But this provision shall not prevent the said corporation from constructing suitable rooms and offices in connection with the said hall, to rent, and renting the same, and receiving rent therefor, to be applied to the promotion of the principles and purposes aforesaid.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said corporation shall not exceed the sum of three hundred thousand dollars, and that the stock shall be divided into shares of twenty dollars each; and shall be deemed personal property, transferable in such manner as the constitution and by-laws of said corporation may direct.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That within twenty days after the passage of this act the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, or if any refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall cause books of subscription to the capital stock of the said corporation to be opened and kept open in such place and for a period to be fixed by said corporators, or a majority of them, public notice of which may be given by advertisement or otherwise as said corporators or a majority of them may determine; and subscribers upon said books to the capital stock of the corporation shall be held to be stockholders: Provided, That every subscriber shall pay, at the time of subscribing, such per centum of the amount by him subscribed to the treasurer elected or appointed by the corporators, or a majority of them, as may be required by said corporators or a majority of them, or his subscription shall be null and void. And when the books of subscription to the capital stock of said corporation shall be closed, the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, and in case any of them refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall, within twenty days thereafter, call the first meeting of the stockholders of said corporation, to meet within ten days thereafter, for the choice of directors, of which public notice shall be given for three days in two public newspapers published daily in Washington city, or by written personal notice served on each stockholder, by the secretary or clerk of the corporation. And in all meetings of the stockholders each share shall entitle the holder to one vote, to be given in person or by proxy.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the government and direction of the affairs of the corporators shall be invested in a board of directors, five in number, elected by the stockholders on the first Monday of December in each year from among the corporators named in the first section of this act, and their successors, elected or appointed in the manner hereinafter declared by the masonic bodies they represent, who shall hold their office for one year and until others are duly elected and qualified to take their places as directors; and the said directors shall elect one of their number to be president of the board, who shall also be president of the corporation, and shall elect a secretary from among their own number, or from the corporators aforesaid, who shall also be secretary of the corporation, and they shall also choose a treasurer, who shall give bonds with surety to said corporation, in such sum as the said directors may require, for the faithful discharge of his trust. A majority of the directors shall form a quorum for the transaction of business, and in case of a vacancy in the board of directors by the death, resignation, or otherwise, of any director, the vacancy occasioned thereby shall be filled by the remaining directors from among the corporators named in the first section of this act, or their successors duly elected or appointed in the manner hereinafter declared by the masonic bodies they represent.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the directors shall have full power to make and prescribe such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they shall deem needful and proper for the disposition and management of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the corporation, not contrary to the charter or to the laws of the United States and the ordinances of Washington city, and shall have power to alter or amend the same as the interests of the corporation, in their opinion, may require. And the said directors shall have power to regulate the payment of interest upon the certificates of stock held by the stockholders, or to the dividends that may accrue, and shall have power to provide for the redemption of the stock held by individuals, upon fair and equitable terms.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That each masonic body or organization, named in the first section of this act, shall be entitled, during the month of November, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and annually thereafter, to meet and select, by ballot, one of its members as a successor to the person then, or last, representing it as member of this corporation, whose annual term expires next thereafter, or which may have expired next before that time, so that said corporation shall forever consist of one corporator from each of the said masonic bodies, named in the first section of this act: Provided, however, That should any of the said several masonic bodies, named in the first section of this act, surrender or forfeit its masonic charter or warrant, or from any cause cease to be recognized by the Order of Free and Accepted Masons, it shall not thereafter be entitled to any representation in said corporation, nor shall the continued corporate existence and rights of this association be in anywise affected thereby, so long as there remain five corporators qualified to act as such.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That any masonic lodge, chapter, council, commandery, or consistory now in existence or that may hereafter be instituted in the District of Columbia, may, by and with the consent of two thirds of the corporators named in the first section, or their successors, be admitted to a representation in said corporation upon an equal footing with the several masonic bodies named in the first section of this act.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That this act may be altered, amended, or repealed, at the pleasure of the Congress of the United States of America.

APPROVED, April 26, 1864.

CHAP. LXVIII.—An Act to authorize the Issuing of a Register to the Steam Vessel John Martin.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue a register to the steam vessel John Martin.

APPROVED, April 26, 1864.

CHAP. LXIX.—An Act fixing certain Rules and Regulations for Preventing Collisions on the Water.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after September one, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, the following rules and regulations for preventing collisions on the water be adopted in the Navy and the mercantile marine of the United States: Provided, That the exhibition of any light on board of a vessel-of-war of the United States may be suspended whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, the commander-in-chief of a squadron, or the commander of a vessel acting singly, the special character of the service may require it.

PRELIMINARY.

ARTICLE 1. In the following rules every steamship which is under sail, and not under steam, is to be considered a sailing ship; and every steamship which is under steam, whether under sail or not, is to be considered a ship under steam.

RULES CONCERNING LIGHTS.

Lights.

ARTICLE 2. The lights mentioned in the following articles, and no others, shall be carried in all weathers between sunset and sunrise.

Lights for Steamships.

ARTICLE 3. All steam vessels when under way shall carry—

(a) At the foremast head, a bright white light, so fixed as to show a uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of twenty points of the compass, so fixed as to throw the light ten points on each side of the ship, viz: from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on either side, and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night, with a clear atmosphere, at a distance of at least five miles.

(b) On the starboard side, a green light, so constructed as to throw a uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass, so fixed as to throw the light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on the starboard side, and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night, with a clear atmosphere, at a distance of at least two miles.

(c) On the port side, a red light, so constructed as to show a uniform unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass, so fixed as to throw the light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on the port side, and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night, with a clear atmosphere, at a distance of at least two miles.

(d) The said green and red side lights shall be fitted with inboard screens, projecting at least three feet forward from the light, so as to prevent these lights from being seen across the bow.

Lights for Steam-Tugs.

ARTICLE 4. Steamships, when towing other ships, shall carry two bright white masthead lights vertically, in addition to their side lights, so as to distinguish them from other steamships. Each of these masthead lights shall be of the same construction and character as the masthead lights which other steamships are required to carry.

Lights for Sailing Ships.

ARTICLE 5. Sailing ships under way or being towed shall carry the same lights as steamships under way, with the exception of the white masthead lights, which they shall never carry.

Exceptional Lights for Small Sailing Vessels.

ARTICLE 6. Whenever, as in the case of small vessels during bad weather the green and red lights cannot be fixed, these lights shall be kept on deck, on their respective sides of the vessel, ready for instant exhibition, and shall on the approach of or to other vessels, be exhibited on their respective sides in sufficient time to prevent collision, in such manner as to make them most visible, and so that the green light shall not be seen on the port side, nor the red light on the starboard side.

To make the use of these portable lights more certain and easy, they shall each be painted outside with the color of the light they respectively contain, and shall be provided with suitable screens.

Lights for Ships at Anchor.

ARTICLE 7. Ships, whether steamships or sailing ships, when at anchor in roadsteads or fairways, shall, between sunset and sunrise, exhibit where it can be best seen, but at a height not exceeding twenty feet above the hull, a white light in a globular lantern of eight inches in diameter, and so constructed as to show a clear uniform and unbroken light visible all around the horizon, and at a distance of at least one mile.

Lights for Pilot Vessels.

ARTICLE 8. Sailing pilot vessels shall not carry the lights required for other sailing vessels, but shall carry a white light at the masthead, visible all around the horizon, and shall also exhibit a flare-up light every fifteen minutes.

Lights for Fishing Vessels and Boats.

ARTICLE 9. Open fishing boats and other open boats shall not be required to carry side lights required for other vessels, but shall, if they do not carry such lights, carry a lantern having a green slide on the one side and a red slide on the other side, and on the approach of or to other vessels, such lantern shall be exhibited in sufficient time to prevent collision, so that the green light shall not be seen on the port side, nor the red light on the starboard side. Fishing vessels and open boats when at anchor, or attached to their nets and stationary, shall exhibit a bright white light. Fishing vessels and open boats shall, however, not be prevented from using a flare-up in addition, if considered expedient.

RULES GOVERNING FOG SIGNALS.

Fog Signals.

ARTICLE 10. Whenever there is a fog, whether by day or night, the fog signals described below shall be carried and used, and shall be sounded at least every five minutes, viz:

(a) Steamships under way shall use a steam whistle placed before the funnel, not less than eight feet from the deck.

(b) Sailing ships under way shall use a fog horn.

(c) Steamships and sailing ships when not under way shall use a bell.

STEERING AND SAILING RULES.

Two Sailing Ships Meeting.

ARTICLE 11. If two sailing ships are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helms of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other.

Two Sailing Ships Crossing.

ARTICLE 12. When two sailing ships are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, then, if they have the wind on different sides, the ship with the wind on the port side shall keep out of the way of the ship with the wind on the starboard side, except in the case in which the ship with the wind on the port side is close-hauled, and the other ship free, in which case the latter ship shall keep out of the way. But if they have the wind on the same side, or if one of them has the wind aft, the ship which is to windward shall keep out of the way of the ship which is to leeward.

Two Ships under Steam Meeting.

ARTICLE 13. If two ships under steam are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helms of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other.

Two Ships under Steam Crossing.

ARTICLE 14. If two ships under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

Sailing Ship and Ship under Steam.

ARTICLE 15. If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship.

Ships under Steam to Slacken Speed.

ARTICLE 16. Every steamship, when approaching another ship, so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or, if necessary, stop and reverse; and every steamship shall, when in a fog, go at a moderate speed.

Vessels Overtaking Other Vessels.

ARTICLE 17. Every vessel overtaking any other vessel shall keep out of way of the said last-mentioned vessel.

Construction of Articles 12, 14, 15, and 17.

ARTICLE 18. Where, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course subject to the qualifications contained in the following article:

Proviso to Save Special Cases.

ARTICLE 19. In obeying and construing these rules due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation, and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case rendering a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

No Ship under any Circumstances to Neglect Proper Precautions.

ARTICLE 20. Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any ship, or the owner, or master, or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper lookout, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case.

CHAP. LXX.—An Act to provide for the Collection of Hospital Dues from Vessels of the United States sold or transferred in Foreign Ports or Waters.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in case of the sale or transfer of any vessel of the United States in a foreign port or water, the consul, vice consul, commercial agent, or vice commercial agent of the United States within whose consulate or district such sale or transfer shall have been made, or in whose hands the papers of such vessel shall be, be and he is hereby authorized and required to collect of the master or agent of such vessel, all moneys that shall have become due to the United States under and by virtue of the act entitled "An act for the relief of sick and disabled seamen," approved July sixteenth, seventeen hundred and ninety-eight, and shall remain unpaid at the time of such sale or transfer; and that the said consul, vice consul, commercial agent, or vice commercial agent, (as the case may be,) be, and he is hereby, instructed and required to retain possession of the papers of such vessel until such money shall have been paid as herein provided; and in default of which, such sale or transfer shall be void, excepting as against the vendor: Provided, That this act shall not take effect until the expiration of sixty days from and after its passage.

APPROVED, April 29, 1864.

CHAP. LXXI.—An Act to increase the Compensation of Inspectors of Customs in certain Ports.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized to increase the compensation of inspectors of customs in such ports as he may think it advisable so to do, and may designate, by adding to the present compensation of said officers a sum not exceeding one dollar per day. But the increase hereby authorized shall not extend beyond July first, eighteen hundred and sixty-five.

APPROVED, April 29, 1864.

CHAP. LXXII.—An Act in Reference to Donation Claims in Oregon and Washington.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever it shall appear that two donation settlers in the State of Oregon or Washington Territory shall hold their conterminous improvements in such a manner as may require a half quarter section to be divided into two equal parts by a line north and south or east and west, it shall and may be lawful for the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue patents recognizing for each claimant such subdivisions; this enactment to include cases existing at the date of this act, where the claim may be proved and established according to law.

APPROVED, April 29, 1864.

CHAP. LXXIII.—An Act for the Relief of Postmasters who have been robbed by Confederate Forces or Rebel Guerrillas.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all cases where loyal postmas-

CHAP. LXXIV.—An Act to aid the Indian Refugees to return to their Homes in the Indian Territory.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the removal and temporary relief of the refugee and destitute Indians in the southern superintendency, viz: for expenses of transportation and subsistence by the way to the Indian Territory, fifty-two thousand dollars; for temporary subsistence in the Indian country of refugee and destitute Indians, to the close of the present fiscal year, one hundred and fifty-three thousand dollars; for seeds, plows, and necessary agricultural implements, to enable them to raise a crop the present season, eighteen thousand dollars.

APPROVED, May 3, 1864.

CHAP. LXXVII.—An Act to vacate and sell the present Indian Reservations in Utah Territory, and to settle the Indians of said Territory in the Uinta Valley.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause the several Indian reservations heretofore made, or occupied as such, in the Territory of Utah, excepting Uinta valley, to be surveyed into tracts or lots, not exceeding eighty acres each, under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and upon the completion of such surveys shall cause said tracts or lots to be sold, upon sealed bids, to be duly invited by public advertisement, for a period not less than three months, in a newspaper of general circulation published in the Territory of Utah, and also a newspaper published in Washington, to the highest and best bidder; said bids may be filed with the Governor of said Territory at the seat of government thereof, and with the Secretary of the Interior in Washington; such bids as may be received by said Governor shall, without opening the same, be forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior, when the same, with the bids filed with him, shall be opened in the presence of the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Public Lands, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and any bidders who may choose to be present at the opening thereof; and the Secretary of the Interior shall apply the proceeds of such sales to the construction of improvements upon the reservations which may be established under the provisions of this act, or by other lawful authority, or to the purchase of stock, agricultural implements, or such other useful articles as to him may seem best adapted to the wants and requirements of the Indians: Provided, That no tract of land shall be sold under the provisions of this section for less than its appraised value in cash, to be duly ascertained by commissioners appointed by the Secretary of the Interior for that purpose.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the superintendent of Indian affairs for the Territory of Utah be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to collect and settle all or so many of the Indians of said Territory as may be found practicable in the Uinta valley, in said Territory, which is hereby set apart for the permanent settlement and exclusive occupation of such of the different tribes of Indians of said Territory as may be induced to inhabit the same.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of making agricultural improvements in the Uinta valley for the comfort of the Indians who may inhabit the same, and to enable them to become self-sustaining by means of agriculture, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of thirty thousand dollars, which sum shall be expended by the superintendent of Indian affairs for said Territory, under the instruction of the Secretary of the Interior.

APPROVED, May 5, 1864.

CHAP. LXXVIII.—An Act for the Prevention and Punishment of Frauds in relation to the Names of Vessels.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every steamboat of the United States shall, in addition to having her name painted on her stern, as now required by law, also have the same conspicuously placed in distinct, plain letters, of not less than six inches in length, on each outer side of the pilot-house, if it has such, and (in case the said boat has side wheels) also on the outer side of each wheel-house; and if any such steamboat shall be found without having her name placed as herein required, she shall be subject to the same penalty and forfeiture as is now provided by law in the case of a vessel of the United States found without having her name and the name of the port to which she belongs painted on her stern, as required by law.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no master, owner, or agent of any vessel of the United States shall in any way change the name of such vessel, or by any device, advertisement, or contrivance, deceive, or attempt to deceive, the public, or any officer or agent of the United States Government, or of any State, or any corporation or agent thereof, or any person or persons, as to the true name of such vessel, on pain of the forfeiture of such vessel: Provided, That this act shall not take effect until the expiration of sixty days from and after its passage.

CHAP. LXXIX.—An Act making a Grant of Lands to the State of Minnesota, to aid in the Construction of the Railroad from Saint Paul to Lake Superior.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and there is hereby, granted to the State of Minnesota for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad in said State from the city of Saint Paul to the head of Lake Superior, every alternate section of public land of the United States, not mineral, designated by odd numbers, to the amount of five alternate sections per mile on each side of the said railroad on the line thereof, within the State of Minnesota; but in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the line or route of said road is definitely fixed, sold, appropriated, reserved, or otherwise disposed of any sections, or any part thereof, granted as aforesaid, or that the right of preemption or homestead settlement has attached to the same, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to select from the lands of the United States nearest to the lines of sections above specified, in alternate sections or parts thereof, so much public land of the United States, not mineral, as shall be equal in amount to such lands as the United States have sold or otherwise appropriated, or to which the rights of preemption or homestead settlement may have attached, as aforesaid; which lands thus selected in lieu of those sold, reserved, or otherwise appropriated or disposed of, or to which the rights of preemption or homestead settlement may have attached, as aforesaid, together with the sections and parts of sections designated as aforesaid, and appropriated as aforesaid, shall be held and disposed of by the said State for the use and purpose aforesaid: Provided, That the land to be so selected shall in no case be located farther than twenty miles from the lines of said road: And provided further, That the lands hereby granted for and on account of said road shall be exclusively applied in the construction of the same, and for no other purpose whatever, and shall be disposed of only as the work progresses through the same, as in this act hereinafter provided: Provided, also, That no part of the land granted by this act shall be applied to aid in the construction of any railroad, or part thereof, for the construction of which any previous grant of land may have been made by Congress: And provided further, That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement, or for any other purpose whatsoever, be, and the same are hereby, reserved to the United States, from the operations of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the route of the said road through such reserved lands; in which case the right of way only shall be granted, subject to the approval of the President of the United States: Provided further, That the minimum price of the even sections and parts of sections of the public lands of the United States, within the limits of ten miles on each side of the line of said road, shall be two dollars and fifty cents per acre.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever said State shall cause to be completed twenty consecutive miles of any portion of said railroad, supplied with all necessary drains, culverts, viaducts, crossings, sidings, bridges, turn-outs, watering-places, depots, equipments, furniture, and all other appurtenances, of a first-class railroad, patents shall issue conveying the right and title to said lands to said State, on each side of the road, so far as the same is completed, and co-terminous with said completed section, not exceeding the amount aforesaid, and patents shall in like manner issue as each twenty miles of said road is completed: Provided, however, That no patents shall issue for any of said lands unless there shall be presented to the Secretary of the Interior a statement, certified by the Governor of the State of Minnesota, that such twenty miles have been completed in the manner required by this act, and setting forth with certainty the points where such twenty miles begin and where the same end.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That when the said road shall be definitely located, and a plat thereof filed with the Secretary of the Interior, the lands hereby granted shall not thereafter be subject to settlement, preemption, or private entry adverse to this grant.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said State, in addition to the grant heretofore mentioned, is hereby authorized to locate the said road over any public lands of the United States, not otherwise appropriated, reserved, or disposed of, and that the right of way over said lands of the United States for the purpose aforesaid is hereby granted to said State to the width of one hundred feet on each side of said road as located.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said lands hereby granted when patented to said State, shall be subject to the disposal of said State for the purposes aforesaid, and for no other; and the said railroad shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from all toll or other charge, for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if said road is not completed within eight years from the time of the passage of this act, as provided herein, no further patents shall be issued for said lands, and no further sale shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the United States mail shall be transported over said road, under the direction of the Post Office Department, at such price as Congress may by law direct: Provided, That until such price is fixed by law the Postmaster General shall have the power to determine the same.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That any railroad which may hereafter be constructed from any point on the Bay of Superior, in the State of Wisconsin, shall be permitted to connect with the said railroad, for the construction of which the said lands are hereby granted, at any point which may be selected by the president and directors of said railroad company so permitted to connect their said road, and the said railroad company so permitted to connect shall have the right and privilege to transport, or have transported, over the track of said railroad, for the construction of which the said lands are hereby granted, all or any of its cars, passengers, or freights, and the said railroad company controlling the said road, for the construction of which the said lands are hereby granted, shall have the same right and privilege to transport or have transported all or any of its cars, freights, or passengers, over the track of the said railroad of the company so permitted to connect, and said transportation shall be paid by the railroad company using, to the railroad company according the same, at the usual rates or charges which may be imposed by the said company upon all other cars, freights, or passengers.

CHAP. LXXX.—An Act granting Lands to aid in the Construction of certain Railroads in the State of Wisconsin.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and is hereby, granted to the State of Wisconsin, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from a point on the Saint Croix river or lake, between townships twenty-five and thirty-one, to the west end of Lake Superior, and from some point on the line of said railroad, to be selected by said State, to Bayfield, every alternate section of public land designated by odd numbers, for ten sections in width on each side of said road, deducting any and all lands that may have been granted to the State of Wisconsin for the same purpose; by the act of Congress of June three, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, upon the same terms and conditions as are contained in the act granting lands to the State of Wisconsin, to aid in the construction of railroads in said State, approved June three, eighteen hundred and fifty-six. But in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the line or route of said road is definitely fixed, sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of, any sections or parts thereof, granted as aforesaid, or that the right of preemption or homestead has attached to the same, then it shall be lawful for any agent or agents, to be appointed by said company, to select, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, from the public lands of the United States nearest to the tier of sections above specified, as much land in alternate sections or parts of sections, as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold or otherwise appropriated, or to which the right of preemption or homestead has attached as aforesaid, which lands (thus selected in lieu of those sold, and to which preemption or homestead right has attached as aforesaid, together with sections and parts of sections designated by odd numbers as aforesaid, and appropriated as aforesaid,) shall be held by said State for the use and purpose aforesaid: Provided, That the lands to be so located shall in no case be further than twenty miles from the line of the said roads, nor shall such selection or location be made in lieu of lands received under the said grant of June three, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, but such selection and location may be made for the benefit of said State, and for the purpose aforesaid, to supply any deficiency under the said grant of June three, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, should any such deficiency exist.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be, and is hereby, granted to the State of Wisconsin, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from the town of Tomah, in the county of Monroe, in said State, to the Saint Croix river or lake, between townships twenty-five and thirty-one, every alternate section of public land designated by odd numbers for ten sections in width on each side of said road, deducting any and all lands that may have been granted to the State of Wisconsin for the same purpose, by the act of Congress granting lands to said State to aid in the construction of certain railroads, approved June three, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, upon the same terms and conditions as are contained in the said act of June three, eighteen hundred and fifty-six. But in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the line or route of said road is definitely fixed, sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of any sections, or parts of sections, granted as aforesaid, or that the right of preemption or homestead has attached to the same, then it shall be lawful for any agent or agents to be appointed by said State to select, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, from the public lands of the United States nearest to the tier of sections above specified, as much land, in alternate sections, or parts of sections, as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold, or otherwise appropriated, or to which the right of preemption or homestead has attached, as aforesaid, which lands (thus selected in lieu of those sold, and to which preemption or homestead right has attached as aforesaid, together with sections and parts of sections, designated by odd numbers as aforesaid, and appropriated as aforesaid,) shall be held by said State for the use and purpose aforesaid: Provided, That the lands to be so located shall in no case be further than twenty miles from the line of the said road, nor shall such selection or location be made in lieu of lands received under the said grant of June three, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, but such selections and locations may be made for the benefit of said State, and for the purpose aforesaid, to supply any deficiency under the said grant of June three, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, should any such deficiency exist.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there be, and is hereby, granted to the State of Wisconsin, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from Portage City, Berlin, Doty's Island, or Fon du Lac, as said State may determine, in a northwestern direction to Bayfield, and thence to Superior, on Lake Superior, every alternate section of public land, designated by odd numbers, for ten sections in width on each side of said road, upon the same terms and conditions as are contained in the act granting lands to said State to aid in the construction of railroads in said State, approved June three, eighteen hundred and fifty-six. But in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the line or route of said road is definitely fixed, sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of any sections or parts thereof, granted as aforesaid, or that the right of preemption or homestead has attached to the same, that it shall be lawful for any agent or agents of said State, appointed by the Governor thereof, to select, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, from the lands of the United States nearest to the tier of sections above specified, as much public land in alternate sections, or parts of sections, as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold or otherwise appropriated, or to which the right of preemption or homestead has attached as aforesaid, which lands (thus selected in lieu of those sold and to which the right of preemption or homestead has attached as aforesaid, together with sections and parts of sections designated by odd numbers as aforesaid, and appropriated as aforesaid) shall be held by said State, or by the company to which she may transfer the same, for the use and purpose aforesaid: Provided, That the lands to be so located shall in no case be further than twenty miles from the line of said road.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sections and parts of sections of lands which shall remain to the United States within ten miles on each side of said roads shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of the public lands when sold; nor shall any of the said reserved lands become subject to private entry until the same have been first offered at public sale at the increased price.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the time fixed and limited for the completion of said roads in the act aforesaid of June three, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, be, and the same is hereby, extended to a period of five years from and after the passage of this act.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That any and all lands reserved to the United States by any act of Congress for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement, or in any manner for any purpose whatsoever, and all mineral lands be, and the same are hereby, reserved and excluded from the operation of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the route of such railroads through such reserved lands, in which case the right of way only shall be granted, subject to the approval of the President of the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That whenever the companies to which this grant is made, or to which the same may be transferred, shall have completed twenty consecutive miles of any portion of said railroads, supplied with all necessary drains, culverts, viaducts, crossings, sidings, bridges, turn-outs, watering-places, depots, equipments, furniture, and all other appurtenances of a first-class railroad, patents shall issue conveying the right and title to said lands to the said company entitled thereto, on each side of the road, so far as the same is completed, and coterminous with said completed section, not exceeding the amount aforesaid, and patents shall in like manner issue as each twenty miles of said road is completed: Provided, however, That no patents shall issue for any of said lands unless there shall be presented to the Secretary of the Interior a statement, verified on oath or affirmation by the president of said company, and certified by the Governor of the State of Wisconsin, that such twenty miles have been completed in the manner required by this act, and setting forth with certainty the points where such twenty miles begin and where the same end; which oath shall be taken before a judge of a court of record of the United States.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the said lands hereby granted shall, when patented as provided in section seven of this act, be subject to the disposal of the companies respectively entitled thereto, for the purposes aforesaid, and no other, and the said railroads be, and shall remain, public highways for the use of the Government of the United States, free from all toll or other charge, for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That if said road mentioned in the third section aforesaid is not completed within ten years from the time of the passage of this act, as provided herein, no further patents shall be issued to said company for said lands, and no further sale shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States.

APPROVED, May 5, 1864.

CHAP. LXXXI.—An Act to amend an Act to incorporate the Inhabitants of the City of Washington, passed May fifteen, eighteen hundred and twenty.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the first paragraph of section eight of an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May fifteenth, eighteen hundred and twenty, be amended so as to read as follows: That the said corporation shall have full power and authority to lay taxes on particular wards, parts, or sections of the city, for their particular local improvements, and to cause the curb-stones to be set, the foot and carriage ways to be graded and paved, or so much thereof as they may deem best, and the necessary sewerage and drainage facilities to be introduced under and upon the whole or any portion of any avenue, street, or alley, and also to cause the same to be suitably paved and repaired, and to be at all times properly cleaned and watered, and also to cause lamps to be erected therein, and to light the same, and to pay the cost thereof out of the funds of the ward in which such improvement shall be made; this provision not to be construed as repealing, but being intended as auxiliary to the power they already possess to make local improvements on the application of the owners of property benefited thereby.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That immediately upon the approval of this act the said corporation shall designate some proper officer thereof whose duty it shall be to see that the provisions of this act are properly executed, and that the principal avenues and streets of the said city are so cleaned and watered as to be at all times reasonably clean and free from dust; and also to keep the pavements and side-walks upon said avenues and streets at all times in suitable and proper repair; and it shall further be the duty of the said corporation to take such measures as they shall deem wise to promote some uniform and general system of drainage for said city.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in all cases in which the streets, avenues, or alleys of the said city pass through or by any of the property of the United States, the Commissioner of the Public Buildings shall pay to the duly authorized officer of the corporation the just proportion of the expense incurred in improving such avenue, street, or alley, which the said property bears to the whole cost thereof, to be ascertained in the same manner as the same is apportioned among the individual proprietors of the property improved thereby.

APPROVED, May 5, 1864.

CHAP. LXXXII.—An Act for the Relief of the Settlers upon certain Lands in California.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any and all persons claiming, whether as preëmtors or settlers, or under any grant or title, any of the lands included within the exterior boundaries of a certain grant for the rancho San Ramon, situate in the county of Contra Costa, in California, made to Bartolo Pacheco and Mariana Castro by Don José Figueroa, Governor of Upper California, on or about the tenth day of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-three, and which claim, or two leagues thereof, has been confirmed by the district court of the United States in separate moieties, one in the name of Horace W. Carpenter, and the other in the name of Rafael Soto de Pacheco and others, by a decree of said court made and entered on or about the fourth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, shall have the right in all courts to contest the correctness of the location of the lands so confirmed, within the said exterior boundaries, notwithstanding any official or approved survey thereof now made or hereafter to be made under the said decree of confirmation, and notwithstanding any stipulation or consent given by the district attorney of the United States authorizing such locations.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in case it shall be found that the United States have title to any of said lands within said exterior boundaries, which have been settled upon and improved by any person, in good faith, under a bona fide claim of title, such occupant, and each settler upon said lands so situated, shall be entitled to enter and receive a patent for one hundred and sixty acres of land, including his improvements, upon payment, at the proper land office, of the Government price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and proving that he was one of the actual and bona fide settlers on said lands, and had made improvements thereon before the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect immediately.

APPROVED, May 5, 1864.

CHAP. LXXXIII.—An Act to regulate the Admeasurement of Tonnage of Ships and Vessels of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every ship or vessel built within the United States, or that may be owned by a citizen or citizens thereof, on or after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, shall be measured and registered in the manner hereinafter provided; also every ship or vessel that is now owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States shall be remeasured and reregistered upon her arrival after said day at a port of entry in the United States, and prior to her departure therefrom, in the same manner as hereinafter described: Provided, That any ship or vessel built within the United States after the passage of this act may be measured and registered in the manner herein provided.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the register of every vessel shall express her length and breadth, together with her depth and the height under the third or spar deck, which shall be ascertained in the following manner: The tonnage deck, in vessels having three or more decks to the hull, shall be the second deck from below; in all other cases the upper deck of the hull is to be the tonnage deck. The length from the forepart of the outer planking, on the side of the stem, to the afterpart of the main stern-post of screw steamers, and to the afterpart of the rudder-post of all other vessels measured on the top of the tonnage deck, shall be accounted the vessel's length. The breadth of the broadest part on the outside of the vessel shall be accounted the vessel's breadth of beam. A measure from the under side of tonnage-deck plank, amidships, to the ceiling of the hold (average thickness) shall be accounted the depth of hold. If the vessel has a third deck, then the height from the top of the tonnage-deck plank to the under side of the upper-deck plank shall be accounted as the height under the spar deck. All measurement to be taken in feet and fractions of feet; and all fractions of feet shall be expressed in decimals.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the register tonnage of a vessel shall be her entire internal cubical capacity in tons of one hundred cubic feet each, to be ascertained as follows: Measure the length of the vessel in a straight line along the upper side of the tonnage deck, from the inside of the inner plank (average thickness), at the side of the stem to the inside of the plank on the stern timbers, (average thickness), deducting from this length what is due to the rake of the bow in the thickness of the deck, and what is due to the rake of the stern-timber in the thickness of the deck, and also what is due to the rake of the stern-timber in one third of the round of the beam; divide the length so taken into the number of equal parts required by the following table, according to the class in such table to which the vessel belongs:

TABLE OF CLASSES.

Class 1.—Vessels of which the tonnage length according to the above measurement is fifty feet or under, into six equal parts.

Class 2.—Vessels of which the tonnage length according to the above measurement is above fifty feet, and not exceeding one hundred feet long, into eight equal parts.

Class 3.—Vessels of which the tonnage length according to the above measurement is above one hundred feet long, and not exceeding one hundred and fifty feet long, into ten equal parts.

Class 4.—Vessels of which the tonnage length according to the above measurement is above one hundred and fifty feet, and not exceeding two hundred feet long, into twelve equal parts.

Class 5.—Vessels of which the tonnage length according to the above measurement is above two hundred feet, and not exceeding two hundred and fifty feet long, into fourteen equal parts.

Class 6.—Vessels of which the tonnage length according to the above measurement is above two hundred and fifty feet long, into sixteen equal parts.

Then, the hold being sufficiently cleared to admit of the required depths and breadths being properly taken, find the transverse area of such vessel at each point of division of the length as follows:

Measure the depth at each point of division from a point at a distance of one third of the round of the beam below such deck, or, in case of a break, below a line stretched in continuation thereof, to the upper side of the floor-timber, at the inside of the limber-strake, after deducting the average thickness of the ceiling, which is between the bilge-planks and limber-strake; then, if the depth at the midship division of the length do not exceed sixteen feet, divide each depth into four equal parts; then measure the inside horizontal breadth, at each of the three points of division, and also at the upper and lower points of the depth, extending each measurement to the average thickness of that part of the ceiling which is between the points of measurement; number these breadths from above, (numbering the upper breadth one, and so on down to the lowest breadth;) multiply the second and fourth by four, and the third by two; add these products together, and to the sum add the first breadth and the last, or fifth; multiply the quantity thus obtained by one third of the common interval between the breadths, and the product shall be deemed the transverse area; but if the midship depth exceed sixteen feet, divide each depth into six equal parts, instead of four, and measure, as before directed, the horizontal breadths at the five points of division, and also at the upper and lower points of the depth; number them from above as before; multiply the second, fourth, and sixth, by four, and the third and fifth by two; add these products together, and to the sum add the first breadth and the last, or seventh; multiply the quantities thus obtained by one third of the common interval between the breadths, and the product shall be deemed the transverse area.

Having thus ascertained the transverse area at each point of division of the length of the vessel, as required above, proceed to ascertain the register tonnage of the vessel in the following manner:

Number the areas successively one, two, three, &c., number one being at the extreme limit of the length at the bow, and the last number at the extreme limit of the length at the stern; then whether the length be divided according to table, into six or sixteen parts, as in classes one and six, or any intermediate number, as in classes two, three, four, and five, multiply the second, and every even-numbered area, by four, and the third and every odd-numbered area (except the first and last) by two; add these products together, and to the sum add the first and last, if they yield anything; multiply the quantities thus obtained by one third of the common interval between the areas, and the product will be the cubical contents of the space under the tonnage deck; divide this product by one hundred, and the quotient, being the tonnage under the tonnage deck, shall be deemed to be the register tonnage of the vessel, subject to the additions hereinafter mentioned.

If there be a break, a poop, or any other permanent closed-in space on the upper decks, on the spar deck, available for cargo, or stores, or for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew, the tonnage of such space shall be ascertained as follows:

Measure the internal mean length of such space in feet, and divide it into an even number of equal parts of which the distance asunder shall be most nearly equal to those into which the length of the tonnage deck has been divided; measure at the middle of its height the inside breadths, namely, one at each end and at each of the points of division, numbering them successively one, two, three, &c.; then to the sum of the end breadths add four times the sum of the even-numbered breadths and twice the sum of the odd-numbered breadths, except the first and last, and multiply the whole sum by one third of the common interval between the breadths; the product will give the mean horizontal area of such space; then measure the mean height between the planks of the decks, and multiply by it the mean horizontal area; divide the product by one hundred, and the quotient shall be deemed to be the tonnage of such space, and shall be added to the tonnage under the tonnage decks, ascertained as aforesaid.

If a vessel has a third deck, or spar deck, the tonnage of the space between it and the tonnage deck shall be ascertained as follows:

Measure in feet the inside length of the space, at the middle of its height, from the plank at the side of the stem, to the plank on the timbers at the stern, and divide the length into the same number of equal parts into which the length of the tonnage deck is divided; measure (also at the middle of its height) the inside breadth of the space at each of the points of division, also the breadth of the stem and the breadth at the stern; number them successively one, two, three, and so forth, commencing at the stem; multiply the second, and all other even-numbered breadths by four, and the third, and all the other odd-numbered breadths (except the first and last) by two; to the sum of these products add the first and last breadths, multiply the whole sum by one third of the common interval between the breadths, and the result will give, in superficial feet, the mean horizontal area of such space; measure the mean height between the plank of the two decks, and multiply
